SIX THOUSAND QUOTATIONS

FROM

Standard Histories and Biographies . .

With Twenty Thousand Cross-References and a General Index, also an Index of Personal Names

These extracts consist chiefly of acts and incidents. They are designed for those who desire ready access to the events, the lessons and the precedents of history, in the preparation of addresses, essays and sermons, also in giving point to arguments in legal cases, in discussing political issues, and in writing for the press.

PREFACE

HISTORICAL statements awaken in the average mind an interest which proves the existence of a hidden element in them, that does not pertain to a mere record of facts. The marvels of history, and its prosy facts as well, not only attest the oneness of human nature and the unity of human experience, but they also forecast a shadowy premonition of coming events. This thought has found its graceful expression in the words of a German writer, who says: "All history is an imprisoned epic—nay, an imprisoned psalm and prophecy."

While historical statements address our curiosity for knowledge, they also stimulate the imagination to give realistic colouring to the picture presented to the mind. Hence it is that historical fields will ever prove chosen grounds for reference and illustration by those who address the public.

This volume is the outgrowth of certain lines of historical readings, originally designed for the author's personal benefit, and to aid in the preparation of sermons and addresses. After nearly twenty-five years of reading and brief indexing of interesting facts and incidents, a mass of quotations has accumulated, and under the natural law of selection this volume represents the "survival of the fittest."

It is not presumed that the field of selection is exhausted, or that omissions have not been made of numerous interesting statements. Many lengthy selections have been excluded by the plan of the book, which permits only brief extracts. It is merely claimed that a large class of historical facts and fancies which have aided the compiler in his work are in this ready reference form offered by the publishers to others who may value historical allusions and quotations in addressing the public either by the pen or the voice. This collection is both religious and secular in its character, and the quotations are especially fitting the needs of preachers, temperance and political speakers, essayists in schools, and writers for the press.

It is also claimed that the topical arrangement of these quotations, and the extensive cross-reference index, and the index of personal names will greatly facilitate their use by requiring only a brief search to find them, and making a previous recollection of the passages unnecessary. In this way they may supply in a large measure the lack of a ready memory to those who are unable to recall historical facts and incidents, or have forgotten the volume in which they may be found. They may be equally serviceable to those who have but little opportunity for historical readings. These quotations are taken from standard histories and biographies, and chiefly relate to the early civilised races and the English and American peoples. Those taken from the Holy Scriptures have been published in a volume by themselves, entitled "Biblical Lights and Side Lights."

It has been the aim of the compiler to present each quotation complete in itself, so that it may not be necessary to examine the authority quoted; yet each may be verified by the reader and the connections studied by following the reference which concludes each article. The articles quote the exact words of the various authors, except where otherwise expressed by brackets. The title, catchword and compiler's addendum, in brackets, will usually so complete the meaning of the quotation that it will not be necessary to make further examination of the historical connections. When more information is desired, it may frequently be found in the large cyclopædias by those who have not at hand the authorities to which reference is made.

A list of authorities quoted in this volume may be found on another page.

HISTORICAL LIGHTS.

1. ABANDONMENT, Inhuman. Moslems. The rapine of the Carmathians [a fanatical Turkish sect] was sanctified by their aversion to the worship of Mecca; they robbed a caravan of pilgrims, and twenty thousand devout Moslems were abandoned on the burning sands to a death of hunger and thirst.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 52.

2. ABANDONMENT, A mortifying. Bp. T. Hall. The infamous Timothy Hall, who had distinguished himself among the clergy of London by reading the declaration [issued by James II. to supplant the Protestant faith], was rewarded with the bishopric of Oxford. . . . Hall came to his see; but the canons of his cathedral refused to attend his installation; the university refused to create him a doctor; not a single one of the academic youth applied to him for holy orders; no cap was touched to him; and in his palace he found himself alone.—MACAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND, ch. 9.

3. ABILITIES misapplied. Frederick II. and Voltaire. [France sent Voltaire to negotiate a difficult alliance.] The negotiation was of an extraordinary description. Nothing can be conceived more whimsical than the conferences which took place between the first literary man and the first practical man of the age, whom a strange weakness had induced to exchange their parts. The great poet would talk of nothing but treaties and guaranties, and the great king of nothing but metaphors and rhymes. On one occasion Voltaire put into his Majesty's hand a paper on the state of Europe, and received it back with verses scrawled on the margin. In secret they both laughed at each other. Voltaire did not spare the king's poems; and the king has left on record his opinion of Voltaire's diplomacy.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 39.

4. ABILITIES, Numerous. Roman Emp. Justinian. The emperor professed himself a musician and architect, a poet and philosopher, a lawyer and theologian; and if he failed in the enterprise of reconciling the Christian sects, the review of the Roman jurisprudence is a noble monument of his spirit and industry.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 43.

5. ABILITIES overrated. Pompey. Unfortunately he had acquired a position by his negative virtues which was above his natural level, and misled him into overrating his capabilities. So long as he stood by Cæsar he had maintained his honor and his authority. He allowed men more cunning than himself to play upon his vanity, and Pompey fell—fell amid the ruins of a Constitution which had been undermined by the villainies of its representatives. His end was piteous, but scarcely tragic, for the cause to which he was sacrificed was too slightly removed from being ignominious. He was no Phœbus Apollo sinking into the ocean, surrounded with glory. He was not even a brilliant meteor. He was a weak, good man, whom accident had thrust into a place to which he was unequal; and ignorant of himself, and unwilling to part with his imaginary greatness, he was flung down with careless cruelty by the forces which were dividing the world.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 23.

6. ABILITIES shown. In Youth. When Philonicus, the Thessalian, offered the horse named Bucephalus in sale to Philip, at the price of thirteen talents, the king, with the prince and many others, went into the field to see some trial made of him. The horse appeared extremely vicious and unmanageable, and was so far from suffering himself to be mounted, that he would not bear to be spoken to, but turned fiercely upon all the grooms. Philip was displeased, and bade them take him away. But Alexander, who had observed him well, said, "What a horse are they losing, for want of skill and spirit to manage him!" Philip at first took no notice of this; but, upon the prince's often repeating the same expression, and showing great uneasiness, he said, "Young man, you find fault with your elders, as if you knew more than they, or could manage the horse better." "And I certainly could," answered the prince. "If you should not be able to ride him, what forfeiture will you submit to for your rashness?" "I will pay the price of the horse." Upon this all the company laughed, but the king and prince agreeing as to the forfeiture, Alexander ran to the horse, and, laying hold on the bridle, turned him to the sun; for he had observed, it seems, that the shadow which fell before the horse, and continually moved as he moved, greatly disturbed him. While his fierceness and fury lasted, he kept speaking to him softly and stroking him; after which he gently let fall his mantle, leaped lightly upon his back, and got his seat very safe. Then, without pulling the reins too hard, or using either whip or spur, he set him a going. As soon as he perceived his uneasiness abated, and that he wanted only to run, he put him in a full gallop, and pushed him on both with the voice and spur. Philip and all his court were in great distress for him at first, and a profound silence took place. But when the prince had turned him and brought him straight back, they all received him with loud acclamations, except his father, who wept for joy, and, kissing him, said, "Seek another kingdom, my son, that may be worthy of thy abilities; for Macedonia is too small for thee."—PLUTARCH.

7. ABILITIES, Useless. John Dryden. Reign of James II. The help of Dryden was welcome to those Roman Catholic divines who were painfully sustaining a conflict against all that was most illustrious in the Established Church. . . . The first service which he was required to perform, in return for his pension, was to defend his [Catholic] Church in prose against Stillfleet. But the art of saying things well is useless to a man who has nothing to say; and this was Dryden's case. He soon found himself unequally paired with an antagonist whose whole life had been one long training for controversy. The veteran gladiator disarmed the novice, inflicted a few contemptuous scratches, and turned away to encounter more formidable combatants.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7.

8. ABNEGATION of Self. Martin Luther. A.D. 1518. [He journeyed on foot to meet the papal ambassador at Augsburg.] "My thoughts," said he afterward, "on the journey were these: Now I must die; and often did I remark, What a reproach will I be to my parents!" When in the neighborhood of Augsburg Luther was overcome by bodily weariness. Faint-hearted friends had often warned him on the way not to enter Augsburg. But in reply to them he said, "In Augsburg, even in the midst of mine enemies, Jesus Christ also reigns. May Christ live, even if Martin should die."—REIN'S LIFE OF LUTHER, ch. 5.

9. ABSENCE condemned. King George II. A.D. 1736. People of all ranks were indignant at the king's long stay in Germany [during all the summer and autumn]. On the gate of St. James' palace this notice was stuck up: "Lost or strayed out of this house a man who has left a wife and six children on the parish. Whoever will give any tidings of him to the church-wardens of St. James' parish, so as he may be got again, shall receive four shillings and sixpence reward.—N.B. This reward will not be increased, nobody judging him to deserve a crown."—KNIGHT'S ENG., ch. 6.

10. ABSENCE, Reasonable. Trial of Charles II. The judges assembled in the vast Gothic hall of Westminster, the palace of the Commons. At the first calling over of the list of members designed to compose the tribunal [to try the king], when the name of Fairfax was pronounced without response, a voice from the crowd of spectators cried out, "He has too much sense to be here." When the act of accusation against the king was read, in the name of the people of England, the same voice again replied, "Not one tenth of them!" The officer commanding the guard ordered the soldiers to fire upon the gallery from whence these rebellious words proceeded, when it was discovered that they had been uttered by Lady Fairfax, the wife of the lord-general.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 42.

11. ABSOLUTION in Advance. Elevation of Julius II. We understand from Burcard, that it was at this time an established custom for every new pope, immediately after his election, and as the first act of his apostolical function, to give a full absolution to all the cardinals of all the crimes they might thereafter commit of whatever nature and degree.—TYTLER'S HIST., vol. 2, ch. 14.

12. ABSOLUTION, Costly. Palaologus (Michael), the usurper of Constantinople, was excommunicated from the Greek Church because of cruelty. [See No. 1335.] The Christian who had been separated from God and the Church became an object of horror; and in a turbulent and fanatical capital, that horror might arm the hand of an assassin or inflame a sedition of the people. Palaologus felt his danger, confessed his guilt, and deprecated his judge; the act was irretrievable; the prize [a kingdom] was obtained; and the most rigorous penance which he solicited would have raised the sinner to the reputation of a saint. The unrelenting patriarch [Arsenius] refused to announce any means of atonement or any hopes of mercy; and condescended only to pronounce, that for so great a crime, great indeed must be the satisfaction. "Do you require," said Michael, "that I should abdicate the empire?" and at these words he offered or seemed to offer the sword of state. Arsenius [the patriarch] eagerly grasped this pledge of sovereignty; but when he perceived that the emperor was unwilling to purchase absolution at so dear a rate, he indignantly escaped to his cell, and left the royal sinner kneeling and weeping at the door. The danger and scandal of this excommunication subsisted above three years, till the popular clamor was assuaged by time and repentance. . . . Arsenius . . . denied with his last breath the pardon which was implored.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 62.

13. ABSOLUTION desired. Death of Charles II. A.D. 1685. [The French ambassador] Barillon hastened to the bed-chamber [of Charles II.], took the duke [of York] aside, and delivered the message of the mistress [of Charles—the Duchess of Portsmouth, who entreated that a priest be called, as the king was a Catholic at heart]. The conscience of James [the Duke of York] smote him. . . . Several schemes were discussed and rejected. At last the duke commanded the crowd to stand aloof, went to the bed and stooped down, and whispered something which none of the spectators could hear, but which they supposed to be some question of State. Charles answered in an audible voice, "Yes, yes, with all my heart." None of the bystanders, except the French ambassador, guessed that the king was declaring his wish to be admitted into the bosom of the Church of Rome. "Shall I bring a priest?" said the duke. "Do, brother," said the sick man. "For God's sake do, and lose no time. But no; you will get into trouble." "If it costs me my life," said the duke, "I will fetch a priest." [The priest was secretly brought and the king absolved.]—MACAULAY'S HIST. OF ENG., ch. 4.

14. ABSTINENCE, Certainty by. Dr. Samuel Johnson. A.D. 1778. Talking of drinking wine, he said: "I did not leave off wine because I could not bear it. I have drunk three bottles of port without being the worse for it. University College has witnessed this." BOSWELL: "Why, then, sir, did you leave it off?" JOHNSON: "Why, sir, because it is so much better for a man to be sure that he is never to be intoxicated, never to lose the power over himself. I shall not begin to drink wine till I grow old and want it." BOSWELL: "I think, sir, you once said to me that not to drink wine was a great deduction from life." JOHNSON: "It is a diminution of pleasure, to be sure; but I do not say a diminution of happiness. There is more happiness in being rational."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 366.

15. ABSTINENCE, Limit of. Diverse. Fôderé states that some workmen buried in a damp quarry were extricated alive after a period of fourteen days; while after the wreck of the Medusa, the sufferers on the raft, exposed to a high temperature and constant exertion, at the end of three days, although they still had a small quantity of wine, were so famished that they commenced devouring the dead bodies of their companions. Dr. Willan has recorded a case in which, under the influence of religious delusion, a young man lived sixty days, taking during that time nothing but a little water flavored with orange juice. Dr. McNaughton, of Albany, gives a similar instance, during which a young man lived fifty-four days on water alone.—AMERICAN CYC., "ABSTINENCE."

16. ABSTINENCE, Prudential. Dr. Samuel Johnson. A.D. 1776. Finding him still persevering in his abstinence from wine, I ventured to speak to him of it. JOHNSON: "Sir, I have no objection to a man's drinking wine, if he can do it in moderation. I found myself apt to go to excess in it, and therefore, after having been for some time without it, on account of illness, I thought it better not to return to it. Every man is to judge for himself, according to the effects which he experiences. One of the Fathers tells us that he found fasting made him so peevish, that he did not practise it."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 275.

17. ABSTINENCE, Twofold. Greek Emp. Andronicus. [Being deposed by his grandson] his calamities were embittered by the gradual extinction of sight; his confinement was rendered each day more rigorous; and during the absence and sickness of his grandson, his inhuman keepers, by threats of instant death, compelled him to exchange the purple for the monastic habit and profession. The monk Antony [as he was now called] had renounced the pomp of the world; yet he had occasion for a coarse fur in the winter season, and as wine was forbidden by his confessor, and water by his physician, the sherbet of Egypt was his common drink.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 63.

18. ABSTINENCE, Unconscious. The Poet Shelley. Mrs. Shelley used to send him something to eat into the room where he habitually studied; but the plate frequently remained untouched for hours upon a bookshelf, and at the end of the day he might be heard asking, "Mary, have I dined?"—SYMOND'S SHELLEY, ch. 4.

19. ABSTRACTION, Art of. "Waistcoat Button." He had long desired to get above a school-fellow in his class, who defied all his efforts, till Scott noticed that whenever a question was asked of his rival, the lad's fingers grasped a particular button on his waistcoat, while his mind went in search of the answer. Scott accordingly anticipated that if he could remove this button, the boy would be thrown out, and so it proved. The button was cut off, and the next time the lad was questioned, his fingers being unable to find the button, and his eyes going in perplexed search after his fingers, he stood confounded, and Scott mastered by strategy the place he could not gain by mere industry. "Often in after-life," said Scott, in narrating the manœuvre to Rogers, "has the sight of him smote me as I passed by him; and often have I resolved to make him some reparation, but it ended in good resolutions."—HUTTON'S LIFE OF SIR W. SCOTT, ch. 1.

20. ABSTRACTION, Blunders by. Sir I. Newton. Several anecdotes are preserved of his absence of mind. On one occasion, when he was giving a dinner to some friends, he left the table to get them a bottle of wine; but on his way to the cellar he fell into reflection, forgot his errand and his company, went to his chamber, put on his surplice, and proceeded to the chapel. Sometimes he would go into the street half dressed, and, on discovering his condition, run back in great haste, much abashed. Often while strolling in his garden he would suddenly stop, and then run rapidly to his room, and begin to write, standing, on the first piece of paper that presented itself. Intending to dine in the public hall, he would go out in a brown study, take the wrong turn, walk awhile, and then return to his room, having totally forgotten the dinner. . . . Having dismounted from his horse to lead him up a hill, the horse slipped his head out of the bridle; but Newton, oblivious, never discovered it, till, on reaching a toll-gate at the top of the hill, he turned to remount, he perceived that the bridle which he held in his hand had no horse attached to it. His secretary records that his forgetfulness of his dinner was an excellent thing for his old housekeeper, who "sometimes found both dinner and supper scarcely tasted of, which the old woman has very pleasantly and mumpingly gone away with." On getting out of bed in the morning, he has been observed to sit on his bedside for hours, without dressing himself, utterly absorbed in thought.—CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIOGRAPHY, p. 257.

21. ABSTRACTION, Dangerous. Archimedes. [When the Romans captured Syracuse] Archimedes was in his study, engaged in some mathematical researches; and his mind, as well as his eye, was so intent upon his diagram, that he neither heard the tumultuous noise of the Romans, nor perceived that the city was taken. A soldier suddenly entered his room, and ordered him to follow him to Marcellus; and Archimedes refusing to do it, until he had finished his problem, and brought his demonstration to bear, the soldier, in a passion, drew his sword and killed him.—PLUTARCH.

22. ABUSE, Absence of. Savages. It is said of the Ainus savages, who are inhabitants of the North Pacific, that they give striking proof of their amiability of disposition, in that they have no words of abuse in their language.—AM. CYC., "AINUS."

23. ABUSE, Personal. Milton, by Salmasius. If any one thinks that classical studies of themselves cultivate the taste and the sentiments, let him look into Salmasius's Responsio. There he will see the first scholar of his age not thinking it unbecoming to taunt Milton with his blindness, in such language as this: "A puppy, once my pretty little man, now blear-eyed, or rather a blindling; having never had any mental vision, he has now lost his bodily sight; a silly coxcomb, fancying himself a beauty; an unclean beast, with nothing more human about him than his guttering eyelids; the fittest doom for him would be to hang him on the highest gallows, and set his head on the Tower of London." These are some of the incivilities, not by any means the most revolting, but such as I dare reproduce, of this literary warfare.—PATTISON'S MILTON, ch. 9.

24. ABUSE, Slandorous. Napoleon I. The English press teemed with . . . abuse. . . . He was a . . . demon in human form. He was a robber and a miser, plundering the treasuries of nations that he might hoard his countless millions; and he was also a profligate and a spend-thrift, squandering upon his lusts the wealth of empires. He was wallowing in licentiousness, his camp a harem of pollution, ridding himself, by poison, of his concubines . . . at the same time he was physically an imbecile—a monster whom God in His displeasure had deprived of the passions and powers of healthy manhood. He was an idol whom the entranced people . . . worshipped. . . . He was also a sanguinary, heartless, merciless butcher.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 9.

25. ABUSE, Success by. Politics. Some pretty rough politicians used to find the way to Washington from the Western States, fifty or sixty years ago. Matthew Lyon was one of these, a man of great note in his day. Josiah Quincy once asked him how he obtained an election to the House of Representatives so soon after his emigration to Kentucky. He answered, "By establishing myself at a cross-roads, which everybody in the district passed from time to time, and abusing the sitting member."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOGRAPHY, p. 756.

26. ACCESS, Humble. To Rom. Emp. Diocletian. The sumptuous robes of Diocletian and his successors were of silk and gold; and it is remarked with indignation, that even their shoes were studded with the most precious gems. The access to their sacred person was every day rendered more difficult by the institution of new forms and ceremonies. . . . When a subject was at length admitted to the Imperial presence, he was obliged, whatever might be his rank, to fall prostrate on the ground, and to adore, according to the Eastern fashion, the divinity of his lord and master.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 13.

27. ACCIDENT, Destiny by. Brawl. [Duchy of Bethlem Gabor.] An unexpected accident had given a singular turn to the dispute as to the succession of Juliers. This duchy was still ruled conjointly by the Electorate House of Brandenburg and the Palatine of Neuburg; and a marriage between the Prince of Neuburg and a Princess of Brandenburg was to have in-separably united the interests of the two houses. But the whole scheme was upset by a box on the ear, which, in a drunken brawl, the Elector of Brandenburg unfortunately inflicted upon his intended son-in-law. From this moment the good understanding between the two houses was at an end. The Prince of Neuburg embraced popery. The hand of a princess of Bavaria rewarded his apostasy, and the strong support of Bavaria and Spain was the natural result of both. To secure to the Palatine the exclusive possession of Juliers, the Spanish troops from the Netherlands were marched into the Palatinate. To rid himself of these guests, the Elector of Brandenburg called the Flemings to his assistance, whom he sought to propitiate by embracing the Calvinist religion.—THIRTY YEARS' WAR, § 92.

28. ACCIDENT, Distress by. Henry II. of France. [Henry's daughter Elizabeth was to be married to Philip, and his sister Margaret to the Duke of Savoy.] Magnificent rejoicings took place at Paris during the summer of 1559 in celebration of these royal nuptials. Lists were erected in front of the palace of the Tournelles, and a splendid tournament was held, at which, on the 27th of June, the king himself, supported by the Duke of Guise and two other princes, maintained the field against all antagonists. Henry, who was an admirable cavalier, triumphantly carried off the honors of the day; but toward the close of it, having unfortunately chosen to run a course with Montgomery, captain of his Scottish guards, the lance of the stout knight shivered in the encounter, and the broken truncheon, entering the king's eye, penetrated to the brain. Henry languished eleven days in great suffering, and expired . . . in the forty-first year of his age.—STUDENTS' HIST. OF FRANCE, ch. 15, § 7.

29. ACCIDENT, Revolution by. "Sicilian Vespers." As the citizens of Palermo flocked to vespers on one of the festivals of Easter week, March 30, 1282, a French soldier grossly insulted a young and beautiful Sicilian maiden in the presence of her betrothed husband; the latter instantly drew his dagger and stabbed the offender to the heart. This was the signal for a violent explosion of popular fury; cries of "Death to the French!" resounded on all sides; upward of two hundred were cut down on the spot, and the massacre was continued in the streets of Palermo through the whole night. From the capital the insurrection spread to Messina, from Messina to the other towns of the island; everywhere the French were ruthlessly butchered, without distinction of age, sex, or condition; the total number of the slain is said to have exceeded eight thousand. Such was the terrible catastrophe of the "Sicilian Vespers."—STUDENTS' HIST. OF FRANCE, ch. 9, § 10.

30. ACCIDENT, Saved by. Thomas Paine. During the Reign of Terror Thomas Paine was imprisoned, but was saved from the guillotine, apparently by an accident. The door of his room was marked for the executioner, but the sign was made on it while it was open; and at night, when the terrible messenger usually arrived, the mark was on the inside, and, as he himself says, "the destroying angel passed by."—STEVENS'S METHODISM, Book 7, ch. 1.

31. ACCIDENT, Significant. Norman Duke William. [Battle of Hastings.] When he prepared to arm himself, he called first for his good hauberk, and a man brought it on his arm, and placed it before him; but in putting his head in, to get it on, he unawares turned it the wrong way, with the back part in front. He soon changed it; but when he saw those who stood by were sorely alarmed, he said, "I have seen many a man who, if such a thing had happened to him, would not have borne arms, or entered the field the same day; but I never believed in omens, and I never will. I trust in God, for He does in all things His pleasure, and ordains what is to come to pass according to His will. I have never liked fortune-tellers, nor believed in diviners; but I commend myself to Our Lady. Let not this mischance give you trouble. The hauberk which was turned wrong, and then set right by me, signifies that a change will arise out of the matter which we are now stirring. You shall see the name of the duke changed into king. Yea, a king shall I be, who hitherto have been but duke." [He was unharmed in battle.] —DECISIVE BATTLES, § 309.

32. ACCIDENT utilized. Son of Ali. A familiar story is related of the benevolence of one of the sons of Ali. In serving at table, a slave had inadvertently dropped a dish of scalding broth on his master; the heedless wretch fell prostrate, to deprecate his punishment, and repeated a verse of the Koran: "Paradise is for those who command their anger:"—"I am not angry:"—"and for those who pardon offences:"—"I pardon your offence:"—"and for those who return good for evil:"—"I give you your liberty, and four hundred pieces of silver." —GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50.

33. ———. Norman Invasion. When Duke William himself landed, as he stepped on the shore he slipped, and fell forward upon his two hands. Forthwith all raised a loud cry of distress. "An evil sign," said they, "is here." But he cried out lustily, "See, my lords, by the splendor of God, I have taken possession of England with both my hands. It is now mine, and what is mine is yours." —DECISIVE BATTLES, § 297.

34. ACCOMPLISHMENTS, Worthy. Themistocles. [The prudent Athenian general] was laughed at, in company where free scope was given to raillery, by persons who passed as more accomplished in what was called gentle breeding; he was obliged to answer them with some asperity: "'Tis true I never learned how to tune a harp or play upon a lute, but I know how to raise a small and inconsiderable city to glory and greatness." —PLUTARCH.

35. ACKNOWLEDGMENT, Slender. Postage. The only acknowledgment of his twenty-five years' services which John Adams carried with him in his unwelcome and mortifying retirement, was the privilege which had been granted to Washington on his withdrawal from the presidency, and after his death to his widow, and bestowed likewise upon all subsequent ex-presidents and their widows, of receiving his letters free of postage for the remainder of his life. —AM. CYC., "JOHN ADAMS."

36. ACQUAINTANCE, Brief. Am. Indians. The English [colonists] received a friendly welcome . . . on the island of Roanoke. . . "The people were most gentle and loving and faithful, void of all guile and treason, and such as live after the manner of the Golden Age." [They afterward learned] the practice of inviting men to a feast, that they might be murdered in the hour of confidence. —BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., ch. 3.

37. ACQUAINTANCE, Unwelcome. Samuel Johnson. He gave us an entertaining account of Bet Flint, a woman of the town, who, with some eccentric talents and much effrontery, forced herself upon his acquaintance. "Bet (said he) wrote her own life in verse, which she brought to me, wishing that I would furnish her with a preface to it. (Laughing.) I used to say of her, that she was generally slut and drunkard—occasionally, whore and thief. She had, however, genteel lodgings, a spinnet on which she played, and a boy that walked before her chair." —BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 461.

38. ACROSTIC, Political. Reign of Charles II. It happened by a whimsical coincidence that, in 1671, the cabinet consisted of five persons, the initial letters of whose names made up the word Cabal: Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley, and Lauderdale. —MACAULAY'S HIST. OF ENG., ch. 2.

39. ACTIVITY, Roman. Roman Navy. In the first Punic war the republic had exerted such incredible diligence, that within sixty days after the first stroke of the axe had been given in the forest a fleet of one hundred and sixty galleys proudly rode at anchor in the sea. —GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 3.

40. ACTION, Decisive. Colonel Gordon. [Lord George Gordon was a contemptible demagogue, who brought a clamorous mob of sixty thousand persons to the House of Parliament; he reported for their vengeance the names of the members who spoke against the petition in their behalf which he had presented, while they waited in palace yard with many threatening demonstrations. His crowd twice attempted to force the doors. Expostulation with the fanatic was in vain.] At last, Colonel Gordon, a near relative, went up to him and said: "My Lord George, do you intend to bring your rascally adherents into the House of Commons? If you do, the first man of them that enters—I will plunge my sword, not into him, but into your body." A party of horse-guards at length arrived, and the rabble went home. —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 26.

41. ACTIONS speak. Declaring War. [Ancus, one of the early kings of Rome,] created a college of sacred Heralds, called Fetiales, whose business it was to demand reparation for injuries in a regular and formal manner, and in case of refusal to declare war by hurling a spear into the enemy's land. —LIDDELL'S ROME.

42. ———. "Cutting off . . . tallest Pop-pies." The only Latin town that defied Tarquin's power was Gabii; and Sextus, the king's youngest son, promised to win this place also for his father. So he fled from Rome and presented himself at Gabii; and there he made complaints of his father's tyranny and prayed for protection. The Gabians believed him, and took him into their city, and they trusted him, so that in time he was made commander of their army. Now, his father suffered him to conquer in many small battles, and the Gabians trusted him more and more. Then he sent privately to his father, and asked what he should do to make the Gabians submit. Then King Tarquin gave no answer to the messenger, but, as he walked up and down his garden, he kept cutting off the heads of the tallest poppies with his staff. At last the messenger was tired, and went back to Sextus and told him what had passed. But Sextus understood what his father meant, and he began to accuse falsely all the chief men, and some of them he put to death and some he banished. So at last the city of Gabii was left defenceless, and Sextus delivered it up to his father.—LIDDELL'S ROME.

43. ACTORS and Actresses. Origin of. This craft dates its existence back to some centuries before Christ. The earliest mention we find of it in history is in the time of Solon in Greece. It was then attached to the religious rites, and its appliances and influences used to clothe with greater solemnity and effect the sacred celebrations of the Greeks. So high a place had the profession at this period, that actors were all trained and paid at the expense of the State. . . . From the time of the Cæsars the stage degenerated rapidly, from being disconnected from those religious rites from which it drew its chief distinction, and was finally lost altogether during the dark ages.—AM. CYC., "ACTORS."

44. ACTORS dishonored. Roman Law. The laws of Rome expressly prohibited the marriage of a senator with any female who had been dishonored by a servile origin or theatrical profession.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4.

45. ACTORS, Respect for. Dr. Samuel Johnson. SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS: "I do not perceive why the profession of a player should be despised; for the great and ultimate end of all the employments of mankind is to produce amusement. Garrick produces more amusement than anybody." BOSWELL: "You say, Dr. Johnson, that Garrick exhibits himself for a shilling. In this respect he is only on a footing with a lawyer, who exhibits himself for his fee, and even will maintain any nonsense or absurdity, if the case require it. Garrick refuses a play or a part which he does not like; a lawyer never refuses." JOHNSON: "Why, sir, what does this prove? only that a lawyer is worse. Boswell is now like Jack in 'The Tale of a Tub,' who, when he is puzzled by an argument, hangs himself. He thinks I shall cut him down, but I'll let him hang" (laughing vociferously). SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS: "Mr. Boswell thinks, that the profession of a lawyer being unquestionably honorable, if he can show the profession of a player to be more honorable, he proves his argument."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 211.

46. ADDRESS, Spectacular. Antony. [At the funeral of Cæsar, when] the body was brought into the forum, and Antony spoke the usual funeral eulogium, as he perceived the people affected by his speech, he endeavored still more to work upon their passions, by unfolding the bloody garment of Cæsar, showing them in how many places it was pierced, and pointing out the number of his wounds. This threw everything into confusion. Some called aloud to kill the murderers; others, as was formerly done in the case of that seditious demagogue Clodius, snatched the benches and tables from the neighboring shops, and erected a pile for the body of Cæsar, in the midst of consecrated places and surrounding temples. As soon as the pile was in flames, the people, crowding from all parts, snatched the half-burned brands, and ran round the city to fire the houses of the conspirators; but they were on their guard against such an assault, and prevented the effects.—PLUTARCH.

47. ADDRESS, Successful. Edward IV. While Warwick was winning triumphs on battlefield after battlefield the young king seemed to abandon himself to a voluptuous indolence, to revels with the city wives of London, and to the caresses of mistresses like Jane Shore. Tall in stature and of singular beauty, his winning manners and gay carelessness of bearing secured Edward a popularity which had been denied to nobler kings. When he asked a rich old lady for ten pounds toward a war with France, she answered, "For thy comely face thou shalt have twenty." The king thanked and kissed her, and the old woman made her twenty forty.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 497.

48. ADDRESS, Theatrical. Samuel Johnson. His unqualified ridicule of rhetorical gesture or action is not, surely, a test of truth; yet we cannot help admiring how well it is adapted to produce the effect which he wished. "Neither the judges of our laws, nor the representatives of our people, would be much affected by labored gesticulations, or believe any man the more because he rolled his eyes, or puffed his cheeks, or spread abroad his arms, or stamped the ground, or thumped his breast; or turned his eyes sometimes to the ceiling, and sometimes to the floor."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 89.

49. ADDRESS, Trickster's. Edmund Burke. It was in the December of 1792 that Burke had enacted that famous bit of melodrama out of place, known as the Dagger Scene. The government had brought in an Alien Bill, imposing certain pains and restrictions on foreigners coming to this country. . . . Burke began to storm as usual against murderous atheists. Then, without due preparation, he began to fumble in his bosom, suddenly drew out a dagger, and with an extravagant gesture threw it on the floor of the House, crying that this was what they had to expect from their alliance with France. The stroke missed its mark, and there was a general inclination to titter, until Burke, collecting himself for an effort, called upon them with a vehemence to which his listeners could not choose but respond, to keep French principles from their heads and French daggers from their hearts; to preserve all their blandishments in life, and all their consolations in death; all the blessings of time, and all the hopes of eternity.—MORLEY'S BURKE, ch. 9.

50. ADMINISTRATION, Responsibility of. Reign of Charles. II. To the royal office and royal person they [the commons] loudly and sincerely professed the strongest attachment. But to [Lord Chancellor] Clarendon they owed no allegiance, and they fell on him as furiously as their predecessors had fallen on Strafford. The minister's virtues and vices alike contributed to his ruin. He was the ostensible head of the administration, and was therefore held responsible even for those acts which he had strongly, but vainly, opposed in council.—MACAULAY'S HIST. OF ENG., ch. 2.

51. ADMINISTRATION, An unfortunate. Pres. Martin Van Buren's. The administration of Van Buren has generally been reckoned as unsuccessful and inglorious. But he and his times were unfortunate rather than bad. He was the victim of all the evils which followed hard upon the relaxation of the Jacksonian methods of government. He had neither the will nor the disposition to rule as his predecessor [Andrew Jackson] had done; nor were the people and their representatives any longer in the humor to suffer that sort of government. The period was unheroic; it was the ebb-tide between the belligerent excitements of 1832 and the war with Mexico. The financial panic added opprobrium to the popular estimate of imbecility in the government. "The administration of Van Buren," said a satirist, "is like a parenthesis; it may be read in a low tone of voice, or altogether omitted, without injuring the sense!" But the satire lacked one essential quality—truth.—HIST. U. S., RIDPATE, ch. 55.

52. ADMINISTRATION united. A. Lincoln. Judge Baldwin, of California . . . solicited a pass outside of our lines to see a brother in Virginia. [Being refused by the commanding general and Secretary of War] . . . finally he obtained an interview with Mr. Lincoln, and stated his case. "Have you applied to General Hallock?" . . . "Yes, and met with a flat refusal." . . . "Then you must see Stanton." . . . "I have, and with the same result." . . . "Well, then," said Mr. Lincoln, with a smile, "I can do nothing; for you must know I have very little influence with this Administration."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 748.

53. ADMIRATION changed. Martin Luther. As a reverent pilgrim he arrived at Rome, after a six weeks' journey. Seeing the city from afar, he fell upon the earth and cried out, "Hail! thou sacred Rome!" And yet he found many things different from what he had expected. His experience there made a lasting impression upon him. "I would not have taken one hundred thousand florins not to have seen Rome. Among other coarse talk, I heard one reading mass, and when he came to the words of consecration, he said, 'Thou art bread and shalt remain bread, thou art wine and shalt remain wine.' What was I to think of this? And, moreover, I was disgusted at the manner in which they could 'rattle off' a mass as if it had been a piece of jugglery, for long before I reached the Gospel lesson my neighbor had finished his mass and cried out to me, 'Enough! enough! hurry up and come away,' etc."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 4.

54. ADMIRATION, Objectionable. Oliver Goldsmith. In the summer of 1762 he was one of the thousands who went to see the Cherokee chiefs, whom he mentions in one of his writings. The Indians made their appearance in grand costume, hideously painted and besmeared. In the course of the visit Goldsmith made one of the chiefs a present, who, in the ecstasy of his gratitude, gave him an embrace that left his face well bedaubed with oil and red ochre.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 13.

55. ADMIRATION, Supreme. Colonel Cropper. This worthy veteran, like his general [Washington], had but one toast, which he gave every day and to all companies; it was, "God bless General Washington."—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 2.

56. ADMONITION disregarded. General St. Clair. A.D. 1791. General St. Clair, with an army of two thousand men, set out from Fort Washington to break the power of the Miami confederacy. . . . In what is now Mercer County, Ohio, . . . his camp was suddenly assailed by more than two thousand warriors, led by Little Turtle and several American renegades who had joined the Indians. After a terrible battle of three hours' duration, St. Clair was completely defeated, with a loss of fully one half of his men. . . . The news of the disaster spread gloom throughout the land . . . the government was for awhile in consternation. For once the benignant spirit of Washington gave way to wrath. "Here," said he, "in a tempest of indignation, 'here in this very room . . . I said to him, 'You have careful instructions from the Secretary of War, and I myself will add one word—BEWARE OF A SURPRISE!' He went off with that my last warning ringing in his ears. Yet he has suffered that army to be cut to pieces, hacked, butchered, tomahawked by a surprise—the very thing I guarded him against! How can he answer to his country? The blood of the slain is upon him—the curse of widows and orphans!" [After a period of silence he solemnly added:] "I looked at the despatches hastily, and did not note all the particulars. General St. Clair shall have justice. I will receive him without displeasure—he shall have full justice."—RIDPATE'S HIST. OF U. S., ch. 46.

57. ADOPTION of Captives. American Indians. Sometimes a captive was saved, to be adopted in place of a warrior who had fallen . . . the allegiance and, as it were, the identity of the captive . . . became changed. [His] . . . children and the wife . . . left at home are to be blotted from his memory; he is to be the departed chieftain resuscitated . . . to cherish those whom he cherished; to hate those whom he hated . . . the foreigner thus adopted is esteemed to stand in the same relations of consanguinity.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

58. ADOPTION by the State. Napoleon I. [After the battle of Austerlitz.] He immediately adopted all the children of those [soldiers] who had fallen. They were supported and educated at the expense of the State. They all, as the children of the emperor, were permitted to attach the name of Napoleon to their own.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 31.

59. ADOPTION, Human. Greek Emperors. The most lofty titles, and the most humble postures, which devotion has applied to the Supreme Being, have been prostituted by flattery and fear to creatures of the same nature with ourselves. The mode of adoration, of falling prostrate on the ground, and kissing the feet of the emperor, was borrowed by Diocletian from Persian servitude; but it was continued and aggravated till the last age of the Greek monarchy. Excepting only on Sundays, when it was waived, from a motive of religious pride, this humiliating reverence was exacted from all who entered the royal presence, from the princes invested with the diadem and purple, and from the ambassadors who represented their independent sovereigns, the caliphs of Asia, Egypt, or Spain, the kings of France and Italy, and the Latin emperors of ancient Rome.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 63.

60. ADULATION, Official. Of Charles I. The pleasant words with which the Lord Keeper Finch opened the Parliament [of 1640]: "His Majesty's kingly resolutions are seated in the ark of his sacred breast, and it were a presumption of too high a nature for any Uzzah uncalled to touch it; yet his Majesty is now pleased to lay by the shining beams of majesty, as Phœbus did to Phaeton, that the distance between sovereignty and subjection should not bar you of that filial freedom of access to his person and counsels." But the time had come when this style of language was no longer to be endured by the commons.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 16, p. 203.

61. ADULATION rebuked. Of James I. [James I., dining with Bishops Neile and Andrews, asked their opinion] whether he might not take his subjects' money without the fuss of Parliament? Neile replied, "God forbid you should not, for you are the breath of our nostrils." Andrews hesitated; but the king insisted upon an answer; he said: "Why, then, I think your Majesty may lawfully take my brother Neile's money, for he offers it."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 23, p. 364.

62. ADULATION, Ridiculous. Red Beard. When Henry VIII. met Francis I. on the Field of the Cloth of Gold in 1520, a Venetian observer described the beard of Henry as "being somewhat red, has at present the appearance of being gold."—KNIGHT'S HIST. OF ENG., ch. 17.

63. ADULTERY excused. Mahomet's. In his adventures with Zeinib, the wife of Zeid, and with Mary, an Egyptian captive, the amorous prophet forgot the interest of his reputation. At the house of Zeid, his freedman and adopted son, he beheld, in a loose undress, the beauty of Zeinib, and burst forth into an ejaculation of devotion and desire. The servile, or grateful, freedman understood the hint, and yielded without hesitation to the love of his benefactor. But as the filial relation had excited some doubt and scandal, the angel Gabriel descended from heaven to ratify the deed, to annul the adoption, and gently to reprove the prophet for distrusting the indulgence of his God. One of his wives, Hafna, surprised him on her own bed, in the embraces of his Egyptian captive; she promised secrecy and forgiveness; he swore that he would renounce the possession of Mary. Both parties forgot their engagements; and Gabriel again descended with a chapter of the Koran, to absolve him from his oath, and to exhort him freely to enjoy his captives and concubines, without listening to the clamors of his wives. In a solitary retreat of thirty days, he labored, alone with Mary, to fulfil the commands of the angel. . . . Perhaps the incontinence of Mahomet may be palliated by the tradition of his natural or preternatural gift; he united the manly virtue of thirty of the children of Adam; and the apostle might rival the thirteenth labor of the Grecian Hercules.—GIBBON'S MAHOMET, p. 56.

64. ADULTERY, Punishment for. Roman Law. The edge of the Julian law was sharpened by the incessant diligence of the emperors. The licentious commerce of the sexes may be tolerated as an impulse of nature, or forbidden as a source of disorder and corruption; but the fame, the fortunes, the family of the husband, are seriously injured by the adultery of the wife. The wisdom of Augustus, after curbing the freedom of revenge, applied to this domestic offence the animadversion of the laws; and the guilty parties, after the payment of heavy forfeitures and fines, were condemned to long or perpetual exile in two separate islands.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44.

65. ADULTERY, Shameless. Fifteenth Century. Princes set the example. Charles VII. received Agnes Sorel as a present from his wife's mother, the old Queen of Sicily; and mother, wife, and mistress, he takes them all with him as he marches along the Loire, the happiest understanding subsisting between the three. The English, more serious, seek love in marriage only. Gloucester marries Jacqueline; among Jacqueline's ladies his regards fall on one equally lovely and witty, and he marries her too. But in this respect, as in all others, France and England are far outstripped by Flanders, by the Count of Flanders, by the great Duke of Burgundy. The legend expressive of the Low Countries is that of the famous countess who brought into the world three hundred and sixty-five children. The princes of the land, without going quite so far, seem at the least to endeavor to approach her. A Count of Clèves has sixty-three bastards. John of Burgundy, Bishop of Cambrai, officiates pontifically with his thirty-six bastards and sons of bastards ministering with him at the altar. Philippe-le-Bon had only sixteen bastards, but he had no fewer than twenty-seven wives, three lawful ones and twenty-four mistresses.—MICHELET'S JOAN OF ARC p. 26.

66. ADULTERY, Vengeance for. John XII. John . . . XII. had the address to excite an insurrection of the people, who dethroned his rival Leo VIII., and reinstated him in the pontifical chair. But John did not live to enjoy his triumph; three days after his reinstatement he met the reward of his crimes, and perished by the hand of an indignant husband, who detected him in the arms of his wife.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 4, p. 101.

67. ADULTERY, Victim of. Peregrinus a Lombard Champion. [Rosamond, the Queen of Italy, desired his assistance in a plot to assassinate her royal husband,] but no more than a promise of secrecy could be drawn from the gallant Peregrinus, and the mode of seduction employed by Rosamond betrays her shameless insensibility both to honor and love. She supplied the place of one of her female attendants who was beloved by Peregrinus, and contrived some excuse for darkness and silence, till she could inform her companion that he had enjoyed the Queen of the Lombards, and that his own death, or the death of Alboin [her royal husband] must be the consequence of such treasonable adultery. In this alternative he chose rather to be the accomplice than the victim of Rosamond, whose undaunted spirit was incapable of fear or remorse.—GIBBON'S DECLINE AND FALL, ch. 45.

68. ADVANCE by Battle. Scott's Campaign in Mexico. [In 1847] Gen. Twiggs, in command of the American advance, set out [from Vera Cruz] . . . on the 12th of the month [of April]. Twiggs came upon Santa Anna, who, with an army of fifteen thousand men, had taken possession of the heights and rocky pass of Cerro Gordo. The position, though seemingly impregnable, must be carried, or further advance was impossible. On the morning of the 18th the American army was arranged for an assault which, according to the rules of war, promised only disaster and ruin. But to troops of the United States nothing now seemed too arduous, no deed too full of peril. Before noonday every position of the Mexicans had been successfully stormed and themselves driven into a precipitate rout. Nearly three thousand prisoners were taken, with forty-three pieces of bronze artillery, five thousand muskets, and accoutrements enough to supply an army. The American loss amounted to four hundred and thirty-one, that of the enemy fully a thousand. Santa Anna escaped with his life, but left behind his private papers and his wooden leg.—RIDPATH'S HIST. OF U. S., ch. 57.

69. ADVANCE, Heroic. Battle of Fontenoy. A.D. 1745. William of Cumberland formed a column of fourteen thousand British infantry, thirty or forty abreast; and with measured tread, regardless of every obstacle, undismayed by the cannonade left and right, which mowed down their ranks, this terrible column strode on through the enemy's lines, carrying all before them. But where was their support? A column of infantry, without a horse, without a gun, now reduced probably to ten thousand, could not win a battle against sixty thousand, merely through the supremacy of physical strength and moral endurance. Slowly the compact mass moved back, still facing the enemy. Its ranks were not broken, not a man fled. [Loss about six thousand.].—KNIGHT'S HIST. OF ENG., ch. 7.

70. ADVANCE, Opportunity for an. Gen. Sherman's March to the Sea. [Began November 14, 1864.] His army of veterans numbered sixty thousand men. Believing that Hood's army would be destroyed in Tennessee, and knowing that no Confederate force could withstand him in front, he cut his communications with the North, abandoned his base of supplies, and struck out boldly for the sea-coast, more than two hundred and fifty miles away. As had been foreseen, the Confederates could offer no successful resistance. . . . On the 10th of December he arrived in the vicinity of Savannah . . . he had lost only five hundred and sixty men.—RIDPATH'S HIST. OF U. S., ch. 66.

71. ADVANCE or suffer. Battle of Gettysburg. I remember seeing a general [Pettigrew, I think it was] come up to him [Confederate General Longstreet] and report that "he was unable to bring his men up again" [to charge the Federals]. Longstreet turned upon him and replied, with some sarcasm: "Very well; never mind, then, General; just let them remain where they are; the enemy's going to advance, and will spare you the trouble." [British officer's diary, quoted in.].—POLLARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, p. 354.

72. ADVENT seasonable, The. Needed—Ready. A thorough acquaintance with the history of the world and the state of mankind at the time of our Saviour's birth has led the wisest and most enlightened inquirers to conclude that the Almighty, having designed to illuminate the world by a revelation, there was no period at which it was more certainly required than that in which it was actually sent; nor could any concurrence of circumstances have been more favorable for its extensive dissemination than that which took place at the time of our Saviour's mission. A great part of the known world was at this time under the dominion of the Romans, and subject to all those grievances which are the inevitable result of a system of arbitrary power. Yet this circumstance of the union of so many nations into one great empire was of considerable advantage for the propagation and advancement of Christianity.—TYTLER'S UNIVERSAL HIST., Book 5, ch. 4.

73. ADVENTURE, Courageous. War for the Union. The control of Albemarle Sound had been secured by a daring exploit of Lieutenant Cushing, of the Federal Navy. These waters were commanded by a tremendous iron ram called the Albemarle. In order to destroy the dreaded vessel, a number of daring volunteers, led by Cushing, embarked on a small steamer, and on the night of the 27th of October [1864] entered the Roanoke. The ram was discovered lying at the harbor of Plymouth. Cautiously approaching, the lieutenant, with his own hands, sank a terrible torpedo under the confederate ship, exploded it, and left the ram in ruin. The adventure cost the lives or capture of all of Cushing's party except himself and one other, who escaped.—RIDPATH'S HIST. OF U. S., ch. 66.

74. ADVENTURE, Daring. Napoleon I. [Having escaped from his exile at Elba, his little army arrived near Cannes.] In the course of a few hours this escort of six hundred men, with two or three small pieces of cannon, were safely landed. . . . They were about to march seven hundred miles, through a kingdom containing thirty millions of inhabitants, to capture the strongest capital in Europe. . . . An army of nearly two hundred thousand men, under Bourbon leaders, were stationed in impregnable fortresses by the way.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLÉON B., vol. 2, ch. 24.

75. ADVENTURE, Passion for. Conquest of Florida. Adventurers assembled as volunteers, many of them people of noble birth and good estates. Houses and vineyards, lands and tillage, and rows of olive trees in the Ajarrafe of Seville were sold, as in the times of the crusades, to obtain the means of military equipments. . . . Many . . . who had sold estates for their equipments were obliged to remain behind.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., ch. 2.

76. ADVENTURE, Primitive. George Washington. [Washington's return from a conference with the French commander St. Pierre, at Le Bœuf, near Lake Erie. A.D. 1753.] It was now the dead of winter. . . . With [Christopher] Gist [the guide] as his sole companion, he left the river, and struck into the woods. It was one of the most solitary marches ever made by man. There, in the desolate wilderness, was the future President of the U. S. Clad in the robe of an Indian, with gun in hand, and knapsack strapped to his shoulders; struggling through interminable snows; sleeping with frozen clothes on a bed of pine-brush; breaking through the treacherous ice of rapid streams; guided by day by a pocket compass, and at night by the North Star, seen at intervals through the leafless trees; fired at by a prowling savage from his covert not fifteen steps away; thrown from a raft into the rushing Alleghany; escaping to an island and lodging there until the river was frozen over; plunging again into the forest; reaching Gist's settlement and then the Potomac—the strong-limbed ambassador came back without a wound or scar to the capital of Virginia.—RIDPATH'S HIST. U. S., ch. 30.

77. ADVENTURE, Spirit of. Sir William Parry. In 1817, in a letter to an intimate friend, he happened to write a good deal about an expedition, then much talked of, for exploring the river Congo, in Africa, and expressed a strong desire to make one of the party. When the letter was finished, but before it was put in the post-office, his eye fell upon a paragraph in the newspaper, stating that the government were about to send vessels in quest of a passage round the Northern coast of North America, which would shorten the voyage from England to India from sixteen thousand miles to about seven thousand. Parry reopened his letter, and, mentioning the paragraph, concluded a short postscript with these words: "Hot or cold is all one to me—Africa or the Pole." His correspondent showed this letter to a friend, who was the man in England most devoted to the project in question—Mr. Barrow, secretary to the admiralty. Within a week from that time Lieutenant Parry was thrown into an ecstasy of astonishment and delight by receiving the appointment to command one of the two ships preparing for the enterprise.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 386.

78. ADVENTURER, A born. Hernando Cortez. In the year 1502, at the small country town of Medellin, in Spain, there lived an idle, dissolute youth of seventeen, who was the torment of his parents and the leader of all the mischief going in that neighborhood. . . . Having left the college of Salamanca without permission, [he] was passing his time in love intrigues and dissipation, regardless of the remonstrances of his father and mother. When, therefore, he declared his intention of joining an expedition about to sail for America, the good people of Medellin, especially those who had daughters, were not sorry to hear it. . . . No career attracted him, except one of adventure in the New World, which had been discovered ten years before.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 317.

79. ADVENTURERS disappointed. Theodoric the Ostrogoth. [He attempted the conquest of Italy.] As he advanced into Thrace [Theodoric] found an inhospitable solitude, and his Gothic followers, with a heavy train of horses, of mules, and of wagons, were betrayed by their guides among the rocks and precipices of Mount Sondis, where he was assaulted by the arms and invectives of [another] Theodoric, the son of Triarius. From a neighboring height his artful rival harangued the camp of the Walamirs, and branded their leader with the opprobrious names of child, of madman, of perjured traitor, the enemy of his blood and nation. "Are you ignorant," exclaimed the son of Triarius, "that it is the constant policy of the Romans to destroy the Goths by each other's swords? Are you insensible that the victor in this unnatural contest will be exposed, and justly exposed, to their implacable revenge? Where are those warriors, my kinsmen and thy own, whose widows now lament that their lives were sacrificed to thy rash ambition? Where is the wealth which thy soldiers possessed when they were first allured from their native homes to enlist under thy standard? Each of them was then master of three or four horses; they now follow thee on foot, like slaves, through the deserts of Thrace; those men who were tempted by the hope of measuring gold with a bushel, those brave men who are as free and as noble as thyself." A language so well suited to the temper of the Goths excited clamor and discontent; and the son of Theodoric, apprehensive of being left alone, was compelled to embrace his brethren, and to imitate the example of Roman perfidy.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39.

80. ADVENTURES, Numerous. Capt. John Smith. The new president, though not thirty years of age, was a veteran in every kind of valuable human experience. Born an Englishman; trained as a soldier in the wars of Holland; a traveller in France, Italy, and Egypt; again a soldier in Hungary; captured by the Turks and sold as a slave; sent from Constantinople to a prison in the Crimea; killing a taskmaster who beat him, and then escaping through the woods of Russia to Western Europe; going with an army of adventurers against Morocco; finally returning to England and joining the London Company [afterward rescuing the colony in Virginia], John Smith was altogether the most noted man in the early history of America.—RIDPATH'S HISTORY OF U. S., ch. 9.

81. ADVERSITY, Benefits of. Bunyan in Bedford Jail. Bunyan's confinement . . . was otherwise of inestimable value to him. It gave him leisure to read and reflect. Though he preached often, yet there must have been intervals, perhaps long intervals, of compulsory silence. The excitement of perpetual speech-making is fatal to the exercise of the higher qualities. The periods of calm enabled him to discover powers in himself of which he might otherwise have never known the existence. Of books he had but few; for a time only the Bible and Fox's "Martyrs." But the Bible thoroughly known is a literature of itself—the rarest and richest in all departments of thought or imagination which exists.—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 6.

82. ADVERSITY deplored, Sudden. Charles of Anjou. [He experienced a reversal of his good fortune by the revolt in Sicily.] In the first agony of grief and devotion, he was heard to exclaim, "O God! if Thou hast decreed to humble me, grant me at least a gentle and gradual descent from the pinnacle of greatness!" —GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 62.

83. ADVERSITY, Eminence by. A. Lincoln. He had plenty of employment as a surveyor, and won a good reputation in this new line of business ; but the financial crash of 1837 destroyed his business, and his instruments were finally sold under a sheriff's execution. This reverse again threw him back into political life, and, as the best preparation for it, he vigorously pursued his legal studies. [He had previously failed as a country store-keeper. His goods were bought on credit.]—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 1, p. 26.

84. ADVERSITY, Instructed by. Frederick V. [Elector Palatine of the Bohemians.] Frederick was seated at table in Prague, while his army was thus cut to pieces. . . . A messenger summoned him from table to show him from the walls the whole frightful scene. He requested a cessation of hostilities for twenty-four hours for deliberation ; but eight was all the Duke of Bavaria would allow him. Frederick availed himself of these to fly by night from the capital, with his wife and the chief officers of his army. This flight was so hurried that the Prince of Anhalt left behind him his most private papers, and Frederick his crown. "I know now what I am," said this unfortunate prince to those who endeavored to comfort him ; "there are virtues which misfortune only can teach us, and it is in adversity alone that princes learn to know themselves."—THIRTY YEARS' WAR, § 138.

85. ADVERSITY, Lessons of. Siege of Rome by the Goths. In the last months of the siege the people were exposed to the miseries of scarcity, unwholesome food, and contagious disorders. Belisarius saw and pitied their sufferings ; but he had foreseen, and he watched the decay of their loyalty, and the progress of their discontent. Adversity had awakened the Romans from the dreams of grandeur and freedom, and taught them the humiliating lesson, that it was of small moment to their real happiness whether the name of their master was derived from the Gothic or the Latin language.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41.

86. ADVERSITY, Manhood through. Sir Humphry Davy. The death of his father, an intelligent, speculative man, who left his affairs in great disorder, consigned his mother to a milliner's shop, and changed him from a school-boy into an apothecary's apprentice. A shade of seriousness gathered over him. He had become a man. His private note-books of the first two years of his apprenticeship have been preserved, and they show us, that when his day's work of compounding drugs was done, and in the morning before it begun, he was a hard student. He went through a complete course of arithmetic, algebra, geometry, and trigonometry, besides reading the metaphysical works of Locke, Hartley, Berkeley, Hume, Helvetius, Condorcet, and Reid. He also learned the French language.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 302.

87. ADVERSITY, National. Reign of Edward III. Only fourteen years had gone by since the treaty of Bretigny raised England to a height of glory such as it had never known before. But the years had been years of a shame and suffering which stung the people to madness. Never had England fallen so low. Her conquests were lost, her shores insulted, her commerce swept from the seas. Within she was drained by the taxation and bloodshed of the war. Its popularity had wholly died away.

When the commons where asked in 1354 whether they would assent to a treaty of perpetual peace if they might have it, "the said commons responded all, and altogether, 'Yes, yes !'" The population was thinned by the ravages of pestilence, for till 1369, which saw its last visitation, the black death returned again and again.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 356.

88. ADVERSITY overruled. Eli Whitney. Eli Whitney was a young Massachusetts Yankee, who had come to Georgia to teach, and, having been taken sick, had been invited by this hospitable lady to reside in her house till he should recover. He was the son of a poor farmer, and had worked his way through college without assistance—as Yankee boys often do. From early boyhood he had exhibited wonderful skill in mechanics, and in college he used to repair the philosophical apparatus with remarkable nicety—to the great admiration of professors and students. During his residence with Mrs. Greene he had made for her an ingenious tambour-frame, on a new principle, as well as many curious toys for her children. Hence her advice : "Apply to my young friend, Mr. Whitney ; he can make anything." [He there invented the cotton-gin machine.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 160.

89. ADVERSITY precedes Success. Timour the Tartar. [In his twenty-fifth year he stood forth as the deliverer of his country.] The chiefs of the law and of the army had pledged their salvation to support him with their lives and fortunes ; but in the hour of danger they were silent and afraid ; and, after waiting seven days on the hills of Samarcand, he retreated to the desert with only sixty horsemen. The fugitives were overtaken by a thousand Getes, whom he repulsed with incredible slaughter, and his enemies were forced to exclaim, "Timour is a wonderful man : fortune and the Divine favor are with him." But in this bloody action his own followers were reduced to ten, a number which was soon diminished by the desertion of three Carizmians. He wandered in the desert with his wife, seven companions, and four horses ; and sixty-two days was he plunged in a loathsome dungeon, from whence he escaped by his own courage and the remorse of the oppressor. [Greatness followed.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65.

90. ADVERSITY, Struggle with. "An old Struggler." When he [Sir Walter Scott] was in Ireland . . . a poor woman who had offered to sell him gooseberries, but whose offer had not been accepted, remarked, on seeing his daughter give some pence to a beggar, that they might as well give her an alms, too, as she was "an old struggler." Sir Walter was struck with the expression, and said that it deserved to become classical, as a name for those who take up arms against a sea of troubles, instead of yielding to the waves.—HUTTON'S SCOTT, ch. 15.

91. ADVERSITY a Tonic. Sir W. Scott. [He lost a great property, was fearfully in debt, and his family distressed.] On the 22d he says : "I feel neither dishonored nor broken down by the bad, now truly bad, news I have received. I have walked my last in the domains I have planted—sat the last time in the halls I have built. But death would have taken them from me, if misfortune had spared them. My poor people whom I loved so well! There is just another die to turn up against me in this run of ill-luck, i. e., if I should break my magic wand in the fall from this elephant, and lose my popularity with my fortune. Then Woodstock and Boney [his life of Napoleon] "may both go to the paper-maker, and I may take to smoking cigars and drinking grog, or turn devotee and intoxicate the brain another way." He adds that when he sets to work doggedly, he is exactly the same man he ever was, "neither low-spirited nor distrail"—nay, that adversity is to him "a tonic and bracer." [See Nos. 92 and 94.]—HUTTON'S SCOTT, ch. 15.

92. ADVERSITY, Unaffected by. Sir W. Scott. [He had become a bankrupt by lavish expenditures on his castle, etc.] The heaviest blow was, I think, the blow to his pride. Very early he begins to note painfully the different way in which different friends greet him, to remark that some smile as if to say, "think nothing about it, my lad, it is quite out of our thoughts;" that others adopt an affected gravity, "such as one sees and despises at a funeral," and the best-bred "just shook hands and went on." He writes to Mr. Morritt with a proud indifference, clearly to some extent simulated: "My womenkind will be the greater sufferers, yet even they look cheerily; and, for myself, the blowing off of my hat on a stormy day has given me more uneasiness." To Lady Davy he writes truly enough: "I beg my humblest compliments to Sir Humphry, and tell him, Ill Luck, that direful chemist, never put into his crucible a more indissoluble piece of stuff than your affectionate cousin and sincere well-wisher, Walter Scott." [See Nos. 91 and 94.]—HUTTON'S SCOTT, ch. 15.

93. ADVERSITY utilized. Luther hidden in Warburg Castle. Not long had he been on the burg when he occupied himself with the translation of the Scriptures, as well as with other writings. In a few weeks several works were ready for the press. A treatise "About Confession, and whether the Pope is entitled to command the same" he dedicated to his particular friend and firm patron, Francisco von Sickingen. Besides commenting upon selected portions of Holy Scripture intended to instruct, comfort, and edify Christian people, Luther sent out many a heavy controversial article from the Warburg.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 10.

94. ADVERSITY, Victim of. Sir W. Scott. As Scott had always forestalled his income—spending the purchase-money of his poems and novels before they were written—such a failure as this, at the age of fifty-five, when all the freshness of his youth was gone out of him, when he saw his son's prospects blighted as well as his own, and knew perfectly that James Ballantyne, unassisted by him, could never hope to pay any fraction of the debt worth mentioning, would have been paralyzing, had he not been a man of iron nerve, and of a pride and courage hardly ever equalled. Domestic calamity, too, was not far off. For two years he had been watching the failure of his wife's health with increasing anxiety, and as calamities seldom come single, her illness took a most serious form at the very time when the blow fell, and she died within four months of the failure. Nay, Scott was himself unwell at the critical moment, and was taking sedatives which discomposed his brain. [See Nos. 91 and 92.]—HUTTON'S SCOTT, ch. 15.

95. ADVERSITY in War. Spartans. The Spartans raised two considerable armies, and commenced hostilities by entering the territory of Phocis. They were defeated; Lysander, one of their generals, being killed in battle, and Pausanias, the other, condemned to death for his misconduct. Much about the same time the Persian fleet under the command of Conon vanquished that of Sparta, near Cnidos, a city of Caria. This defeat deprived the Lacedæmonians of the command of the sea. Their allies took the opportunity of this turn of affairs to throw off their yoke, and Sparta, almost in a single campaign, saw herself without allies, without power, and without resources. The reverse of fortune experienced by this republic was truly remarkable. Twenty years had not elapsed since she was absolute mistress of Greece, and held the whole of her states either as tributaries or allies, who found it their highest interest to court her favor and protection. So changed was her present situation, that the most inconsiderable of the states of Peloponnesus spurned at her authority, and left her singly to oppose the united power of Persia and the league of Greece.—UNIVERSAL HISTORY, TYTLER, ch. 2, Book 2.

96. ADVERTISEMENTS, Sanctimonious. Ridiculed. Advertisements in magazines announcing an eligible residence in a neighborhood where the gospel is preached in three places within half a mile; and of a serious man-servant wanted who can shave: such announcements as these were new and strange objects of ridicule in 1808.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 7.

97. ADVICE disdained. Braddock's Defeat. A select force of five hundred men was thrown forward to open the roads in the direction of Fort Du Quesne. . . . The army, marching in a slender column, was extended for four miles along the narrow and broken road. It was in vain that Washington pointed out the danger of ambuscades and suggested the employment of scouting-parties. Braddock was self-willed, arrogant; and proud; thoroughly skilled in the tactics of European warfare, he could not bear to be advised by an inferior. The sagacious Franklin had advised him to move with caution; but he only replied that it was impossible for savages to make any impression on his Majesty's regulars. Now, when Washington ventured to repeat the advice, Braddock flew into a passion, strode up and down in his tent, and said that it was high times when Col. Buckskin could teach a British general how to fight. [The army was surprised and nearly destroyed by the French and Indians. The general was severely wounded, and the troops thrown into a panic.] "What shall we do now, colonel?" said he to Washington. . . . "Retreat, sir—retreat by all means."—RIDPATH'S HIST. U. S., ch. 31.

98. ADVICE ignored. By King James II. Clarendon [the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland] was soon informed, by a concise despatch from Sunderland, that it had been resolved to make without delay a complete change in both the civil and the military government of Ireland, and to bring a large number of Roman Catholics instantly into office. His Majesty, it was most ungraciously added, had taken counsel on these matters with persons more competent to advise him than his inexperienced lord lieutenant could possibly be.—MACAULAY'S HIST. OF ENG., ch. 6.

99. ADVICE, ill-timed. A. Lincoln. [Some Western gentlemen were excited about the commissions and omissions of the Administration.] "Gentlemen, suppose all the property you were worth was in gold, and you had put it in the hands of Blondin to carry across the Niagara River on a rope, would you shake the cable, or keep shouting to him—'Blondin, stand up a little straighter—Blondin, stoop a little more—go a little faster—lean a little more to the north—lean a little more to the south'? No, you would hold your breath, as well as your tongue. . . . The government are carrying an immense weight. Untold treasures are in their hands. They are doing the very best they can. Don't badger them."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 752.

100. ADVICE, Legacy of. By Augustus to the Romans. On the death of that emperor, his testament was publicly read in the senate. He bequeathed, as a valuable legacy to his successors, the advice of confining the empire within those limits which nature seemed to have placed as its permanent bulwarks and boundaries: on the west, the Atlantic Ocean; the Rhine and Danube on the north; the Euphrates on the east; and toward the south, the sandy deserts of Arabia and Africa. . . . Happily for the repose of mankind, the moderate system recommended by the wisdom of Augustus was adopted by the fears and vices of his immediate successors.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1.

101. ADVOCATE, A personal. Not by Proxy. [An old legionary asked Augustus to assist him in a cause which was about to be tried. Augustus deputed one of his friends to speak for the veteran, who, however, repudiated the vicarious patron:] "It was not by proxy that I fought for you at the battle of Actium." Augustus acknowledged the obligation, and pleaded the cause in person.

102. ESTHETICISM, Brutality of. Gladiators. The Laniste, whose business it was to instruct these gladiators in their profession, taught them not only the use of their arms, but likewise the most graceful postures of falling and the finest attitudes of dying in. The food . . . prescribed to them was of such a nature as to enrich and thicken the blood, so that it might flow more leisurely through their wounds, and thus the spectators might be the longer gratified with the sight of their agonies. . . . [They took the following oath:] "We swear that we will suffer ourselves to be bound, scourged, burned, or killed by the sword, or whatever Eumolpus ordains, and thus, like freeborn gladiators, we religiously devote both our soul and our body to our master."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 4.

103. ESTHETICISM, Realistic. Romans. [Nero's reign.] The specific atrocity of such spectacles—unknown to the earlier ages which they called barbarous—was due to the cold-blooded selfishness, the hideous realism of a refined, delicate, æsthetic age. To please these "lispering hawthorn-buds," these debauched and sanguinary dandies, Art, forsooth, must know nothing of morality; must accept and rejoice in a "healthy animalism;" must estimate life by the number of its few wildest pulsations; must reckon that life is worthless without the most thrilling experiences of horror or delight! Comedy must be actual shame, and tragedy genuine bloodshed. When the play of Afranius called "The Conflagration" was put on the stage, a house must be really burnt, and its furniture really plundered. In the mime called "Laureolus," an actor must really be crucified and mangled by a bear, and really fling himself down and deluge the stage with blood. When the heroism of Mucius Scævola was represented, a real criminal must thrust his hand without a groan into the flame, and stand motionless while it is being burnt. Prometheus must be really chained to his rock, and Dirce in very fact be tossed and gored by the wild bull; and Orpheus be torn to pieces by a real bear; and Icarus must really fly, even though he fall and be dashed to death; and Hercules must ascend the funeral pyre, and there be veritably burnt alive; and slaves and criminals must play their parts heroically in gold and purple till the flames envelop them. It was the ultimate romance of a degraded and brutalized society.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, p. 40.

104. AFFECTION, Conjugal. Josephine. [The night following the execution of the deed of divorce, Josephine approached with hesitation the bed and the spouse from whence she had been ejected.] Forgetting everything in the fulness of her anguish, she threw herself upon the bed, clasped Napoleon's neck in her arms, and exclaiming, "My husband! my husband!" sobbed as though her heart were breaking. The imperial spirit of Napoleon was entirely vanquished. He also wept convulsively. He assured Josephine of his love—of his ardent, undying love. [It was their last private interview.]—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 10.

105. ———. Andrew Jackson. The people of Nashville, proud of the success of their favorite, resolved to celebrate the event by a great banquet on the 22d of December, the anniversary of the day on which the general had first defeated the British below New Orleans. . . . Six days before the day appointed for the celebration, Mrs. Jackson . . . suddenly shrieked, placed her hands upon her heart, sunk upon a chair. . . . For the space of sixty hours she suffered extreme agony. . . . She recovered the use of her tongue . . . to implore . . . her exhausted husband to recruit his strength for the banquet. He would not leave her, but lay upon the sofa and slept a little. The evening of the 22d she appeared so much better that the general consented, after much persuasion, to sleep in the next room. When he had been gone five minutes . . . Mrs. Jackson gave a loud, inarticulate cry, which was immediately followed by the death-rattle in her throat. All night long he sat in the room, occasionally looking into her face, and feeling if there was any pulsation in her heart. The next morning, when one of his friends arrived just before daylight, he was nearly speechless and utterly inconsolable, looking twenty years older. There was no banquet that day in Nashville. . . . Andrew Jackson was never the same man again.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 539.

106. AFFECTION, Destitute of. Fulk the Black. He was without natural affection. In his youth he burned a wife at the stake, and legend told how he led her to her doom decked out in his gayest attire. In his old age he waged his bitterest war against his son, and exacted from him when vanquished a humiliation which men reserved for the deadliest of their foes. "You are conquered, you are conquered!" shouted the old man in fierce exultation, as Geoffry, bridled and saddled like a beast of burden, crawled for pardon to his father's feet. In Fulk first appeared that low type of superstition which startled even superstitious ages in the early Plantagenets. Robber as he was of church lands, and contemptuous of ecclesiastical censures, the fear of the end of the world drove Fulk to the holy sepulchre. Barefoot and with the strokes of the scourge falling heavily on his shoulders, the count had himself dragged by a halter through the streets of Jerusalem, and courted the doom of martyrdom by his wild outcries of penitence. He rewarded the fidelity of Herbert of Le Mans, whose aid saved him from utter ruin, by entrapping him into captivity and robbing him of his lands. He secured the terrified friendship of the French king by despatching twelve assassins to cut down before his eyes the minister who had troubled it. Familiar as the age was with treason and rapine and blood, it recoiled from the cool cynicism of his crimes, and believed the wrath of heaven to have been revealed against the union of the worst forms of evil in Fulk the Black. But neither the wrath of heaven nor the curses of men broke with a single mishap the fifty years of his success.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 123.

107. AFFECTION, Display of. Conjugal. [Ca to the Censor] expelled Manlius, a senator, whom the general opinion had marked out for Consul, because he had given his wife a kiss in the day-time, in the sight of his daughter. "For his own part," he said, "his wife never embraced him but when it thundered dreadfully," adding, by way of joke, "That he was happy when Jupiter pleased to thunder."—PLUTARCH.

108. AFFECTION, Enduring. Sir Isaac Newton. The beautiful daughter of a physician, who resided near his school, won his boyish affections, and he paid court to her by making dolls and doll-furniture for her. His affection was returned by the young lady, and nothing prevented their early marriage but Newton's poverty. . . . When at length he was in better circumstances, the object of his youthful love was married, and he himself was wedded to science. Never, however, did he return to the home of his fathers without visiting the lady; and when both had reached fourscore he had the pleasure of relieving the necessities of her old age.—PARTON'S SIR I. NEWTON, p. 86.

109. AFFECTION, Fickle. Countess of Carlisle. The beautiful Countess of Carlisle, a kind of English Cleopatra, of whom Strafford in the season of his greatness had been the favored lover, used every effort with the Parliament to obtain the life of the man whose love had been her pride. The fascinating countess failed to soften their hearts. As if it were the fate of Strafford to suffer at the same time the loss of both love and friendship, this versatile beauty, more attached to the power than the persons of her admirers, transferred her affections quickly from Strafford to Pym, and became the mistress of the murderer, who succeeded to the victim.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 14.

110. AFFECTION, Filial. William Cowper. When Cowper was six years old his mother died; and seldom has a child, even such a child, lost more, even in a mother. Fifty years after her death he still thinks of her, he says, with love and tenderness every day. Late in his life his cousin, Mrs. Anne Bodham, recalled herself to his remembrance by sending him his mother's picture. "Every creature," he writes, "that has any affinity to my mother is dear to me, and you, the daughter of her brother, are but one remove distant from her; I love you, therefore, and love you much, both for her sake and for your own."—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 1.

111. — — —. Sir Walter Scott. His executors, in lifting up his desk, the evening after his burial, found "arranged in careful order a series of little objects, which had obviously been so placed there that his eye might rest on them every morning before he began his tasks. These were the old-fashioned boxes that had garnished his mother's toilet, when he, a sickly child, slept in her dressing-room—the silver taper-stand, which the young advocate had bought for her with his first five-guinea fee; a row of small packets inscribed with her hand, and containing the hair of those of her offspring that had died before her; his father's snuff-box and etui-case; and more things of the sort."—HUTTON'S LIFE OF SCOTT, ch. 1.

112. — — —. Caius Marcius Coriolanus. Marcius pursued glory because the acquisition of it delighted his mother. For when she was witness to the applause he received, when she saw him crowned, when she embraced him with tears of joy, then it was that he reckoned himself at the height of honor and felicity. Epaminondas had the same sentiments, and declared it the chief happiness of his life, that his father and mother lived to see the generalship he exerted and the victory he won at Leuctra.—PLUTARCH.

113. — — —. Sertorius the Roman General. This love of his country is said to have been in some measure owing to the attachment he had to his mother. His father died in his infancy, and he had his education wholly from her; consequently his affections centred in her. His Spanish friends wanted to constitute him supreme governor; but having information at that time of the death of his mother, he gave himself up to the most alarming grief. For seven whole days he neither gave the word, nor would be seen by any of his friends.—PLUTARCH.

114. — — —. Alexander the Great. [Olympias was his mother.] He made her many magnificent presents; but he would not suffer her busy genius to exert itself in State affairs, or in the least to control the proceedings of government. She complained of this as a hardship, and he bore her ill-humor with great mildness. Antipater once wrote him a long letter full of heavy complaints against her; and when he had read it, he said, "Antipater knows not that one tear of a mother can blot out a thousand such complaints."—PLUTARCH.

115. ——. Napoleon I. [During the war between France and England an English prisoner escaped, and reaching the coast secretly prepared a fragile skiff of the bark and branches of trees. He was about to venture the Channel when he was arrested.] "Do you really intend," said Napoleon, "to brave the terrors of the ocean in so frail a skiff?" "If you will but grant me permission," said the young man, "I will embark immediately." "You must doubtless, then, have some mistress to revisit." . . . "I wish," replied the noble sailor, "to see my mother. She is aged, poor, and infirm." The heart of Napoleon was touched. "You shall see her," he energetically replied, "and present to her from me this purse of gold. She must be no common mother who can have trained up so affectionate and dutiful a son." . . . Sent in a cruiser with a flag of truce.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON, vol. 1, ch. 26.

116. AFFECTION of Friendship. A. Lincoln. A few days before the President's death Secretary Stanton tendered his resignation of the War Department . . . saying that he . . . had accepted the position to hold it only until the war should end, and that now he felt his work was done. Mr. Lincoln was greatly moved by the secretary's words, and tearing in pieces the paper that contained the resignation, and throwing his arms about the secretary, he said, "Stanton, you have been a good friend and a faithful public servant, and it is not for you to say when you will be no longer needed here." Several friends of both parties were present, and there was not a dry eye that witnessed the scene.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 757.

117. AFFECTION, Impartial. Mr. Dustin. A.D. 1697. Seven days after her confinement Indian prowlers raised their shouts near the house of Hannah Dustin, of Haverhill [N. H.]; her husband rode home from the field, but too late to provide for her rescue. He must fly, even if he would save one of his seven children, who had hurried before him into the forest. But, from the cowering flock, how could a father make a choice? [Which one take? which leave to the Indians?] With gun in hand he now repels the assault, now cheers on the innocent group of little ones, as they rustle through the dried leaves and bushes, till all reach a shelter. The Indians burned his home and dashed his infant against a tree. [His wife was taken into captivity.]—BANCROFT'S U. S., ch. 21.

118. AFFECTION outraged, Maternal. Indian Wars. [The French and Indians made captives of women after burning the settlement of Salmon Falls in 1690.] The prisoners were laden by the victors with spoils from their own homes. . . . Mehetabel Godwin would linger apart in the snow to lull her infant to sleep, lest its cries should provoke the savages; angry at the delay, her [Indian] master struck the child against a tree, and hung it among the branches.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 21.

119. AFFECTION, Parental. Samuel Wesley. [The house of Rev. Samuel Wesley, the father of John Wesley, was fired at night by the rabble, and totally consumed.] The family barely escaped with their night garments upon them. Mrs. Wesley was in feeble health; unable to climb with the rest through the windows, she was thrice beaten back from the front door by the flames. Committing herself to God, she at last waded through the fire to the street, scorching her face and hands. It was found that one child was missing. The father attempted to pass up the stairs to rescue him, but the consuming steps could not bear his weight. He returned in despair, and, kneeling down upon the earth, resigned to God the soul of his child. Meanwhile, the latter waking from his sleep, and finding his chamber and bed on fire, flew to the window, beneath which two peasants placed themselves, one on the shoulders of the other, and saved him at the moment when the roof fell in and crushed the chamber to the ground. "Come, neighbors," said the father, as he received his son, "let us kneel down and give thanks to God; He has given me all my eight children; let the house go, I am rich enough." A few moments more and the founder of Methodism would have been lost to the world.—STEVENS'S METHODISM, ch. 1, p. 59.

120. ——. Lord Strafford's Trial. "My lords, I have troubled you longer than I should have done, were it not for the interest of these dear pledges a saint in heaven hath left me." [Here he stooped, letting fall some tears, and then resumed.] "What I forfeit myself is nothing; but that my indiscretion should extend to my posterity woundeth me to the very soul. You will pardon my infirmity; something I should have added, but am not able, therefore let it pass. And now, my lords, for myself I have been, by the blessing of Almighty God, taught the afflictions of this present life are not to be compared to the eternal weight of glory which shall be revealed hereafter. And so, my lords . . . I freely submit myself to your judgment; and whether that judgment be for life or death—"Te Deum Laudamus!" Sentence of death was the reply to this eloquence and virtue.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 12.

121. AFFECTION, Strong. William, Prince of Orange. His affection was as impetuous as his wrath. Where he loved, he loved with the whole energy of his strong mind. When death separated him from what he loved, the few who witnessed his agonies trembled for his reason and his life. To a very small circle of intimate friends, on whose fidelity and secrecy he could absolutely depend, he was a different man from the reserved and stoical William whom the multitude supposed to be destitute of human feelings.—MACAULAY'S HIST. OF ENG., vol. 2, ch. 7.

122. AFFECTION, Zeal of. John Howard. Howard was in the south of Europe when first his friends ventured to inform him of his son's condition. "I have a melancholy letter," he wrote, "relative to my unhappy young man. It is indeed a bitter affliction—a son, an only son!" [A dissipated young man.] He hurried home.

The first five hundred miles he never stopped, day nor night, except to change horses. He reached his house to find his son a raving madman, and to learn that his physicians had little hope of his restoration. One of the symptoms of his madness was a most violent antipathy to his father, which banished Howard from his home, until the increasing violence of the malady compelled the removal of the patient to an asylum, where he died at the age of thirty-five.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 72.

123. AFFECTIONS, Blighted. Emanuel Swedenborg. The attachment [of Swedenborg for Polheim's daughter], however, was not mutual, and the lady would not allow herself to be betrothed. Her father, who deeply loved Swedenborg, caused a written agreement to be drawn up, promising his daughter at some future day. This document, Emerentia, from filial obedience, signed; but, as ladies generally do, when forced to love in this way, took to sighs and sadness, which so affected her brother with sorrow, that he secretly purloined the agreement from Swedenborg. The paper was soon missed, for Swedenborg read it over frequently; and in his grief at its loss besought Polheim to replace it by a new one. But as Swedenborg now discovered the pain which he gave to the object of his affections, he at once relinquished all claim to her hand, and left her father's house. It was his last, as it was his first, endeavor after marriage.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 2.

124. AGE, Depraved. Introducing Christianity. The epoch which witnessed the early growth of Christianity was an epoch of which the horror and the degradation have rarely been equalled, and perhaps never exceeded, in the annals of mankind. . . . Abundant proofs of the abnormal wickedness which accompanied the decadence of ancient civilization . . . are stamped upon its coinage, cut on its gems, painted upon its chamber-walls, sown broadcast over the pages of its poets, satirists, and historians. "Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant!" Is there any age which stands so instantly condemned by the bare mention of its rulers as that which recalls the successive names of Tiberius, Gaius, Claudius, Nero, Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, and which after a brief gleam of better examples under Vespasian and Titus, sank at last under the hideous tyranny of a Domitian? Is there any age of which the evil characteristics force themselves so instantaneously upon the mind as that of which we mainly learn the history and moral condition from the relics of Pompeii and Herculaneum, the satires of Persius and Juvenal, the epigrams of Martial, and the terrible records of Tacitus, Suetonius, and Dion Cassius? And yet even beneath this lowest deep, there is a lower deep; for not even on their dark pages are the depths of Satan so shamelessly laid bare to human gaze as they are in the sordid fictions of Petronius and of Apuleius.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 1.

125. AGE of Greatness. National. It is this period, from the middle of the eighth to the middle of the tenth century, which is to be accounted the most flourishing age of Arabian magnificence. While Haroun Alraschid made Bagdad the seat of a great and polished empire, and cultivated the arts and sciences with high success, the Moors of Cordova, under Abdalrahman and his successors, vied with their Asiatic brethren in the same honorable pursuits, and were, unquestionably, the most enlightened of the States of Europe at this period. The empire of the Franks indeed, under Charlemagne, exhibited a beautiful picture of order, sprung from confusion and weakness, but terminating with the reign of this illustrious monarch, and leaving no time for the arts introduced by him to make any approach to perfection. The Moors of Spain, under a series of princes, who gave every encouragement to genius and industry, though fond at the same time of military glory, gained the reputation of superiority both in arts and arms to all the nations of the West. The Moorish structures in Spain, which were reared during the eighth, ninth, and tenth centuries, many of which yet remain, convey an idea of opulence and grandeur which almost exceeds belief. The Mosque of Cordova, begun by Abdalrahman the First, and finished about the year 800, is still almost entire.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 4.

126. AGE, An improved. Evils old. The more carefully we examine the history of the past, the more reason shall we find to dissent from those who imagine that our age has been fruitful of new social evils. The truth is, that the evils are, with scarcely an exception, old. That which is new is the intelligence which discerns them, and the humanity which remedies them.—MACAULAY'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 3.

127. AGE, Men for the. Oliver Cromwell. Like the patron saint of England, St. George of Cappadocia—he of the dragon—Cromwell seems a strangely mythic character. In an age when real kings were dying or dead, and sham kings were flying from their own weakness beneath the outspread shadowy wings of Right Divine—when, out of the sea and scenery of confusion, beasts rose and reigned, like hydras, seven-headed, seven-horned—when every man sought to do what was right in his own eyes—when the prisons were full of victims, when the churches were full of mummeries, there rose a wraith, unexpected, unprecedented in the history of the nation, perhaps of the world, and said, "Well, then, you must settle your account with me!" That quaint, broad-hatted majesty of our old folio histories was, without a doubt, the Pathfinder of his nation in that age.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 1.

128. AGE, Memories in. Cato. When Cato was drawing near the close of his life, he declared to his friends that the greatest comfort of his old age, and that which gave him the highest satisfaction, was the pleasing remembrance of the many benefits and friendly offices he had done to others. To see them easy and happy by his means made him truly so.

129. AGE, Objections to. Scipio. When he was yet a boy, we have seen him a Tribune of the Legions at the age of twenty, assisting to rally the broken remains of the army of Cannæ, and barring the secession of the young nobles after that disastrous day. Three years after we find him offering himself a candidate for the Curule Ædileship; and, when it was objected that he was yet too young for the office, promptly answering, "If the people vote for me, that will make me old enough."—LIDDELL'S ROME, p. 352.

130. AGE criticised, OLD. Dr. Samuel Johnson. He observed: "There is a wicked inclination in most people to suppose an old man decayed in his intellects. If a young or middle-aged man, when leaving a company, does not recollect where he laid his hat, it is nothing; but if the same inattention is discovered in an old man, people will shrug up their shoulders, and say, 'His memory is going.'"—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, BOND'S ED., p. 486.

131. AGE, Excitement in OLD. Death of Pres. Harrison. He was inaugurated President on the 4th of March, 1841. . . . Daniel Webster . . . Secretary of State. Everything promised well for the new Whig administration; but before Congress could convene, the venerable President, bending under the weight of sixty-eight years, fell sick, and died just one month after his inauguration.—RIDPATH'S HIST. OF U. S., ch. 56.

132. AGE Health in OLD. Dr. Samuel Johnson. One of the company mentioned his having seen a noble person driving in his carriage, and looking exceedingly well, notwithstanding his great age. JOHNSON: "Ah, sir, that is nothing. Bacon observes that a stout, healthy old man is like a tower undermined."—BOSWELL'S JOHN-SON, p. 517.

133. AGE, Labor in OLD. Martin Luther. Luther had reached his sixty-third year. Frequent attacks of sickness had seriously weakened his bodily frame. Added to this was the anxiety that he felt on account of the course of ecclesiastical affairs, so that at times a weariness of life overcame him. Thus he writes a few months before his death: "I, an aged, used-up, idle, tired, and unimpressive man, write to you. And though I had hoped that they would grant me, decrepit man that I am, a little rest, I am nevertheless overwhelmed with writing and speaking, acting and performing, as if I had never transacted, written, spoken, or done anything."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 25.

134. — — —. Herschel. Sir William Herschel was still pursuing his observations at the age of eighty. . . . He discovered the planet Uranus in 1781. It has been said of him, that "no one individual ever added so much to the facts on which our knowledge of the solar system is founded."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 7, p. 129.

135. AGE, Literature in OLD. John Milton. The usual explanation of the frigidity of "Paradise Regained" is the suggestion which is nearest at hand—viz., that it is the effect of age. Like Ben Jonson's "New Inn," it betrays the feebleness of senility, and has one of the most certain marks of that stage of authorship, the attempt to imitate himself in those points in which he was once strong.—PATTISON'S MILTON, ch. 13.

136. AGE, Success in OLD. Cæsar. As a general, Cæsar was probably no less inferior to Pompey than Sylla to Marius. Yet his successes in war, achieved by a man who, in his forty-ninth year, had hardly seen a camp, add to our conviction of his real genius.—LIDDELL'S ROME, p. 702.

137. AGE, Vigor in OLD. Warrior. Masinissa, King of Numidia, when past ninety years of age, charged like a boy of nineteen at the head of his wild horsemen against the Carthaginians, and overcame them.—LIDDELL'S ROME, p. 482.

138. — — —. John Wesley. John Wesley was eighty-six years old before he became conscious of the infirmities of many years. He lived till he was eighty-eight years of age. This unusual vigor he ascribed to the blessing of God, wrought chiefly by his constant exercise, his early rising, and his habit of daily preaching morning and evening. . . . Entering his eightieth year, he says . . . he travels from four to five thousand miles every year; has a perfect command of sleep, night or day, whenever he needs it; he is an early riser at a fixed hour. . . . In his eighty-second year he writes: "It is now eleven years since I felt any such thing as weariness." . . . His associates could not at this time perceive in him any signs of intellectual decay, nor can the critic detect it in his writings. . . . He records beautiful impressions of nature and books more frequently; he compares and criticises Ariosto and Tasso; he indulges occasionally in dramatic reading and criticism. . . . He is described as still fresh in color, with a brilliant eye and vivacious spirits. . . . He was careful of his physical habits; his natural constitution was feeble; he said he never felt lowness of spirits for a quarter of an hour since he was born, and before his seventieth year he never lost a night's sleep. He preached forty-two thousand five hundred sermons.—STEVENS' METHODISM, Book 5, ch. 12.

139. — — —. Cato the Censor. He retained his bodily strength to a very great age. When he was past eighty years he called one morning upon a man who had formerly been his secretary, and asked him whether he had yet provided a husband for his daughter. "I have not," was the reply; "nor shall I without consulting my best friend." "Why, then," said Cato, "I have found out a very fit husband for her, if she can put up with an old man who, in other respects, is a very good match for her." "I leave the disposal of her," said the father, "entirely to you. She is under your protection, and depends wholly upon your bounty." "Then," said Cato, "I will be your son-in-law." The astonished parent gave his consent, and Cato announced his intention to his son, who was himself a married man. "Why, what have I done," said the son, "that I should have a mother-in-law put upon me?" "I am only desirous," replied Cato, "of having more such sons as you, and leaving more such citizens to my country." By this wife, who was little more than a girl, he actually had a son, who himself became consul of Rome, and was the father of the other famous Cato, the enemy of Cæsar.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 423.

140. — — —. Lord Palmerston. When he was past seventy, he thought no more of a thirty-mile gallop of an afternoon than a New York merchant does of walking home from Broad Street to Union Square. Often, when Parliament was expected to sit late, he would dismiss his carriage, and, coming out of the house after midnight, would walk home alone, a distance of two miles, and "do" the distance in thirty minutes. There never was a brisker old gentleman. In the hunting season he usually went into the country, where he would follow the hounds as vigorously and as long as the youngest buck of them all.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 500.

141. AGE, Protected by. Aged Solon. Many of his friends . . . told him the tyrant would certainly put him to death . . . and asked him what he trusted to, that he went such imprudent lengths; he answered, "To old age." However, when Pisistratus had fully established himself, he made his court to Solon, and treated him with so much kindness and respect, that Solon became, as it were, his counsellor, and gave sanction to many of his proceedings.—PLUTARCH.

142. AGE, A remarkable. Thirteenth Century. [Here we] seek the origin of our freedom, our prosperity, and our glory. Then it was that the great English people was formed. . . . Then first appeared with distinctness that Constitution which has ever since, through all changes, preserved its identity; that Constitution of which all the other free constitutions in the world are copies, and which, in spite of some defects, deserves to be regarded as the best under which any great society has ever yet existed during many ages. Then it was that the House of Commons, the archetype of all the representative assemblies which now meet, either in the Old or in the New World, held its first sittings. Then it was that the common law rose to the dignity of a science, and rapidly became a not unworthy rival of the imperial jurisprudence. Then it was that the courage of those sailors who manned the rude barks of the Cinque Ports first made the flag of England terrible on the seas. Then it was that the most ancient colleges which still exist at both the great national seats of learning were founded. Then was formed that language, less musical, indeed, than the languages of the South, but in force, in richness, in aptitude for all the highest purposes of the poet, the philosopher, and the orator, inferior to that of Greece alone. Then, too, appeared the first faint dawn of that noble literature, the most splendid and the most durable of the many glories of England.—MACAULAY'S HIST. OF ENG., vol. 1, ch. 1.

143. ———. Reformation. The age of Charles V. is the era of great events and important revolutions in the history of Europe. It is the era of the Reformation in religion in Germany, in the northern kingdoms of Denmark and Sweden, and in Britain. It is the era of the discovery of America; and, lastly, it is the period of the highest splendor of the fine arts in Italy and in the south of Europe.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 20.

144. AGE, Satisfactory. Intimidated. Crows was taken, and the whole country gave way to the conqueror [Charles XII.] The perfidious primate [Cardinal Rajouski], in an assembly of the States at Warsaw, now openly took part against the king [of Poland], his master, and in the year 1704 the throne of Poland was declared vacant. The victorious Charles signified to the States of the kingdom his desire that Stanislaus Leckzinski, a young nobleman of Posnania, should be elected king. The electors made some hesitation on account of his youth. "If I am not mistaken," said Charles, "he is as old as I am" [twenty years]. It is almost needless to add that Leckzinski was elected King of Poland.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 35.

145 AGED, Blessing of the. John Howard. The Pope was one of the monarchs with whom he conversed on this great subject. He was received at the papal palace with unusual distinction, and he was dispensed from the ceremony of kissing the toe of the pontiff. When he was about to retire, after a long conversation on the prisons of Italy, the Pope said to him, laying his hand upon his very Protestant head: "I know you Englishmen do not mind these things, but the blessing of an old man can do you no harm."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 58.

146. AGITATION, Perils of. Great Reformation. "Luther's teachings," writes a contemporary, "have aroused so much strife, dissension, and disturbance among the people, that there is scarce a country or a city, a village or a family, that has not been divided and agitated even unto blows."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 6.

147. AGITATION, Perseverance in. Abolitionists. The Abolitionists were a proscribed and persecuted class, denounced with unsparing severity by both of the great political parties, condemned by many of the leading churches, libelled in the public press, and maltreated by furious mobs. In no part of the country did they constitute more than a handful of the population. . . . They were largely recruited from the Society of Friends. . . . Caring nothing for prejudice, meeting opprobrium with silence, shaming the authors of violence by meek non-resistance, relying on moral agencies alone, appealing simply to the reason and the conscience of men, they arrested the attention of the nation by arraigning it before the public opinion of the world, and proclaiming its responsibility to the judgment of God.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 23.

148. AGONY of the Cross. Christ. The agony of Christ upon the cross, dying a slow death from rabid violence among the Jews, and barbarous wounds inflicted by Roman soldiers, to drain away the blood of life, and torture all the nerves of sense, and all the feelings of the soul within the body, is the highest illustration of the meaning of the word.—AM. CYC., "AGONY."

149. AGRARIANISM, Difficulties of. Romans. The people might certainly have prevailed in obtaining the favorite measure of an agrarian law. But the truth is, this measure was nothing more than a political engine, occasionally employed by the popular magistrates for exciting commotions, and weakening the power of the patricians. It was a measure attended necessarily with so much difficulty in the execution, that few even of the people themselves had a sincere desire of seeing it accomplished. The extensive disorder it must have introduced in the territorial possessions of the citizens, by a new distribution of all the lands acquired by conquest to the republic since the time of Romulus—the affection which even the poorest feel for a small patrimonial inheritance, the place of their nativity, and the repository of the bones of their forefathers—and that most admirable and most salutary persuasion that it is an act of impiety to alter or remove ancient landmarks—all these were strong obstacles.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 5.

150. AGGRESSION, Required. Romans. [After the recapture of Capua by Appius Claudius and Fulvius Flaccus,] when the Consuls returned home, they were refused a triumph. "No Roman general, it was said, deserved a triumph for merely recovering what once belonged to the Republic.—LIDDELL'S ROME, p. 334.

151. AGRICULTURE, Ancient. Romans. In the early times of Rome the work of the farm was the only kind of manual labor deemed worthy of a free citizen. This feeling long survived, as may be seen from the praise bestowed on agriculture by Cicero, whose enthusiasm was caught from one of his favorite heroes, old Cato the Censor. The taste for books of farming continued. Varro the antiquarian, a friend of Cicero, has left an excellent treatise on the subject. A little later came the famous Georgics of Virgil, followed at no long interval by Pliny's notices, and then by the elaborate Dissertations of Columella, who refers to a great number of Roman writers on the same subject. It is manifest that the subject of agriculture possessed a strong and enduring charm for the Roman mind. But, from the times of the Hannibalic War, agriculture lost ground in Italy. When Cato was asked what was the most profitable kind of farming, he said, "Good grazing." What next? "Tolerable grazing." What next? "Bad grazing." What next? "Corn-growing." Later writers, with one accord, deplored the diminished productiveness of land.—LIDDELL'S ROME, p. 497.

152. AGRICULTURE, Anti-monopoly in. Romans. A high appreciation of agriculture appears to have been a fundamental idea among the early Romans. A tract of land was allotted to every citizen by the State itself, and each one was carefully restricted to the quantity granted. It was said by the orator Curius, that "he was not to be counted a good citizen, but rather a dangerous man to the State, who could not content himself with seven acres of land." The Roman acre being about one sixth less than ours, the law actually limited the possession to about six acres. As the nation became more powerful and extended its dominions by conquest, the citizen was allowed to hold fifty acres, and still later he could be the holder of five hundred.—AM. CYC., "AGRICULTURE."

153. AGRICULTURE, Attractions of. The Poet Horace. When cloyed with the pleasures of the imperial city, he had but to mount his mule and ride fifteen minutes, to reach his farm. His land, well covered with forest, and lying on both sides of a sparkling river, was tilled by five free families and eight slaves, and produced grain, wine, and olives. It abounded in pleasant, secluded scenes, fit for a poet's leisure; and there, too, he delighted to receive his friends from Rome; Mecænas himself being glad to repose there from the toils of government. To this day, Horace's farm is continually visited by travellers residing in Rome, especially by English and Americans.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 376.

154. AGRICULTURE, Burdens of. By Artaxerxes, King of the Persians. Several of his sayings are preserved. One of them in particular discovers a deep insight into the constitution of government. "The authority of the prince," said Artaxerxes, "must be defended by a military force; that force can only be maintained by taxes; all taxes must, at last, fall upon agriculture; and agriculture can never flourish except under the protection of justice and moderation."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 8.

155. AGRICULTURE burdened. Reign of Louis XVI. The progress of agriculture was still burdened by the servitudes of the soil. Each little farm was in bondage under a complicated system of irredeemable dues, to roads and canals; to the bakehouse and the brewery of the lord of the manor; to his winepress and his mill; to his tolls at the river, the market, or the fair; to ground rents and quit rents, and fines on alienation. The game laws let in the wild beasts and birds to fatten on the growth of the poor man's fields; and after his harvests provincial custom-houses blocked domestic commerce; the export of corn, and even its free circulation within the realm, was prohibited; so that one province might waste from famine and another want a market.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 7.

156. AGRICULTURE exalted. "Nearer Heaven." The great employment of France was the tillage of land, than which no method of gain is more grateful in itself or more worthy of freemen, or more happy in rendering service to the whole human race. No occupation is nearer heaven.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 2.

157. AGRICULTURE honored. Cincinnatus, Dictator of Rome. A successor was chosen to Valerius in the consulate, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, a man of great resolution and intrepidity, who, though himself so indigent as to cultivate with his own hands his paternal fields, and to be called from the plough to put on the robe of the consul, had yet the high spirit of an ancient patrician, which was ill-disposed to brook the insolence of the popular magistrates or acquiesce in the daily increasing pretensions of the inferior order.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 5.

158. — — — Edmund Burke. [Edmund Burke] was an agricultural improver. Young saw him experimenting on carrots at his farm at Beaconsfield, and says, "Buckinghamshire will be much indebted to the attention this manly genius gives to husbandry."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 1.

159. AGRICULTURE, Pursuit of. Noblest Romans. The picture of the Roman people during the first five centuries is so perfectly distinct, so widely different from what we find it in the latter ages of the republic, that we might at first be induced to think that some very extraordinary causes must have co-operated to produce so total an alteration. Yet the transition was easy and natural, and was in the Roman people the necessary and inevitable consequence of that rich and luxurious situation in which the virtuous and heroic temper of the earlier times had conducted to place the republic. A spirit of temperance, of frugality, and of industry must be the characteristics of every infant colony. The poverty of the first Romans, the narrow territory to which they were limited, made it necessary for every citizen to labor for his subsistence. In the first ages, the patricians, when in the country, forgot all the distinctions of rank, and toiled daily in the fields like the lowest plebeian. . . . Cincinnatus we have seen named dictator by the voice of his country, while at the plough. M. Curius, after expelling Pyrrhus from Italy, retired to the possession of a small farm, which he assiduously cultivated. The elder Cato was fond of this spot, and revered it on account of its former master. It was in emulation of the example of this ancient Roman that Cato betook himself to agriculture. Scipio Africanus also, after the conquest of Hannibal and the reduction of Carthage, retired to his paternal fields, and with his own hand reared and grafted his fruit trees.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 4.

160. AGRICULTURE, Religious. Persian Morality. To cultivate an untilled field, to plant fruit trees, to destroy noxious animals, to bring water to a dry and barren land, were all actions beneficial to mankind, and therefore most agreeable to the divinity, who wills perpetually the highest happiness of his creatures.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 11.

161. AGRICULTURE, Scientific. Reign of Charles II. Deeply impressed with these great truths, the professors of the new philosophy applied themselves to their task, and before a quarter of a century had expired they had given ample earnest of what has since been achieved. Already a reform of agriculture had been commenced. New vegetables were cultivated. New implements of husbandry were employed. New manures were applied to the soil. Evelyn had, under the formal sanction of the Royal Society, given instruction to his countrymen in planting. Temple, in his intervals of leisure, had tried many experiments in horticulture, and had proved that many delicate fruits, the natives of more favored climates, might, with the help of art, be grown on English ground.—MACAULAY'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 3.

162. AGRICULTURE, Superiority of. Romans. Many of the early laws of the Romans were the necessary result of their situation. Such, for example, was that law which confined the practice of all mechanic arts to the slaves; for all the free citizens must either have been employed in warfare or in the culture of their fields.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 1.

163. AGRICULTURE, Unsuccessful. England in A.D. 1390. The average produce of wheat per acre was less than six bushels.—KNIGHT'S HIST. OF ENG., vol. 1, ch. 30.

164. AGRICULTURISTS crippled. By Theodoric. [The King of the Goths.] This . . . faithful servant [of the Eastern Empire] was suddenly converted into a formidable enemy, who spread the flames of war from Constantinople to the Adriatic; many flourishing cities were reduced to ashes, and the agriculture of Thrace was almost extirpated by the wanton cruelty of the Goths, who deprived their captive peasants of the right hand that guided the plough.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39, p. 6.

165. ALARM, Needless. Pertinax, Prefect of Rome. [Commodus, the Roman tyrant, had been assassinated. The conspirators sought noble Pertinax to fill the vacant throne.] He now remained almost alone of the friends and ministers of Marcus; and when, at a late hour of the night, he was awakened with the news that the chamberlain and the prefect were at his door, he received them with intrepid resignation, and desired they would execute their master's orders. Instead of death, they offered him the throne of the Roman world. During some moments he distrusted their intentions and assurances. Convinced at length of the death of Commodus, he accepted the purple with a sincere reluctance.—GIBBON'S ROME, vol. 1, ch. 4.

166. ALARM, Religious. Martin Luther. Already, in his eighteenth year, he surpassed all his fellow-students in knowledge of the Latin classics, and in power of composition and of eloquence. His mind took more and more a deeply religious turn; but it was not till he had been for two years studying at Eisenach that he discovered an entire Bible, having until then only known the ecclesiastical extracts from the sacred volume, and the history of Hannah and Samuel. He now determined to study Greek and Hebrew, the two original languages of the Bible. A dangerous illness brought him within the near prospect of death; but he recovered, and prosecuted his study of philosophy and law, and tried hard to gain inward peace by a pious life and the greatest strictness in all external observances. His natural cheerfulness disappeared; and after experiencing the shock of the death of one of his friends by assassination in the summer of 1505, and soon after that being startled by a thunderbolt striking the earth by his side, he determined to give up the world and retire into the convent of the Augustinians at Erfurt.—BUNSEN'S LUTHER, p. 7.

167. ALIENS, Expulsion of. Adams' Administration. Much of the recent legislation of Congress had been unwise and unpopular. The alien law, by which the President was authorized to send out of the country any foreigners whose presence should be considered prejudicial to the United States, was specially odious. . . . Partisan excitement ran high.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 47.

168. ALLEGORIST, The best. John Bunyan. The "Pilgrim's Progress" was, in his own lifetime, translated into several foreign languages. It was, however, scarcely known to the learned and polite, and had been, during near a century, the delight of pious cottagers and artisans before it was publicly commended by any man of high literary eminence. At length critics condescended to inquire where the secret of so wide and so durable popularity lay. They were compelled to own that the ignorant multitude had judged more correctly than the learned, and that the despised little book was really a masterpiece. Bunyan is indeed as decidedly the first of allegorists, as Demosthenes is the first of orators, or Shakespeare the first of dramatists. Other allegorists have shown equal ingenuity, but no other allegorist has ever been able to touch the heart and to make abstractions objects of terror, pity, and of love.—MACAULAY'S HIST. OF ENG., ch. 7.

169. ALLIANCE, Degrading. Charles II. with Louis XIV. [Charles sought aid, that he might be independent of Parliament.] Louis promised large aid. He from time to time doled out such aid as might serve to keep hope alive, and as he could without risk or inconvenience spare. In this way, at an expense very much less than that which he incurred in building and decorating Versailles or Marli, he succeeded in making England, during nearly twenty years, almost as insignificant a member of the political system of Europe as the republic of San Marino.—MACAULAY'S HIST. OF ENG., ch. 2.

170. ALLIANCE demanded. By France of U. S. [John Adams was President.] Adet, the French minister, made inflammatory appeals to the people, and urged the government to conclude a treaty with France against Great Britain. When the President and Congress stood firmly on the doctrine of neutrality, the French Directory grew insolent, and began to demand an alliance. . . . On the 10th of March the Directory issued instructions to French men-of-war to assail the commerce of the United States. . . . American minister was ordered to leave the territory of France. [War followed.] —RIDPATH'S HIST. U. S., ch. 47.

171. ALLIANCE, A just. American Indians. Friendly relations . . . were established with the Wampanoags. Massasoit, the great sachem of the nation, was invited to visit the settlement, and came, attended by a few of his warriors. The pilgrims received them with as much parade and ceremony as the colony could provide; Captain Standish ordered out his soldiers . . . then and there was ratified the first treaty made in New England. The terms were few and simple. There should be peace and friendship . . . no injury should be done by either party. All offenders should be given up to be punished. If the English engaged in war, Massasoit should help them; if the Wampanoags were attacked unjustly, the English should give aid. . . . Mark the word unjustly; it contains the essence of Puritanism.—RIDPATH'S HIST. OF U. S., ch. 18.

172. ALLIANCE of Self-interest. "We give Ourselves . . . to the Romans." Capua was the principal city of Campania, one of the finest and most fertile countries of Italy. This city, then, was extremely opulent and luxurious. The Samnites, a poor but warlike people, were allured by the riches of their neighbors, and invaded Campania. The inhabitants of Capua, after some feeble attempts to resist the invaders, implored aid from the Romans. The Senate answered, that their alliance with the Samnites prevented them from giving anything else than their compassion. "If, then," said the Capuans, "you will not defend us, you will, at least, defend yourselves; and from this moment we give ourselves, our cities, our fields, and our gods to the Romans, and become their subjects." The Senate accepted the donation, and ordered the Samnites immediately to quit their territories. The necessary consequence was a war. . . . The Samnites were glad to conclude a peace.—TITTLER'S HIST., ch. 7.

173. ALLIES, Dangerous. Turkish Tribes. [Mahmud encouraged emigration of many tribes within his territory.] Mahmud the Gaznevide was admonished of his error by a chief of the race of Seljuk, who dwelt in the territory of Bochara. The sultan had inquired what supply of men he could furnish for military service. "If you send," replied Ismael, "one of these arrows into our camp, fifty thousand of your servants will mount on horseback." "And if that number," continued Mahmud, "should not be sufficient?" "Send this second arrow to the horde of Balik, and you will find fifty thousand more." "But," said the Gaznevide, dissembling his anxiety, "if I should stand in need of the whole force of your kindred tribes?" "Despatch my bow," was the last reply of Ismael; "and as it is circulated around, the summons will be obeyed by two hundred thousand horse." The apprehension of such formidable friendship induced Mahmud to transport the most obnoxious tribes into the heart of Chorasán, where they would be separated from their brethren by the river Oxus, and enclosed on all sides by the walls of obedient cities.—GIBBON'S ROME, vol. 6, ch. 63.

174. ———. Lions. [Cassius made complaint against Cæsar that] the lions which he had procured when he was nominated ædile, and which he had sent to Megara, Cæsar had taken and converted to his own use, having found them there when that city was taken by Calanus. Those lions, it is said, were very fatal to the inhabitants; for as soon as their city was taken, they opened their dens and unchained them in the streets, that they might stop the irruption of the enemy; but instead of that they fell upon the citizens, and tore them in such a manner that their very enemies were struck with horror.—PLUTARCH.

175. ALLIES, Invisible. Mahomet's Angels. [The Koreish had one hundred horse and eight hundred foot.] "O God," he exclaimed, as the numbers of the Koreish descended from the hills, "O God, if these are destroyed, by whom wilt Thou be worshipped on the earth? Courage, my children; close your ranks; discharge your arrows, and the day is your own." At these words he placed himself, with Abubeker, on a throne or pulpit, and instantly demanded the succor of Gabriel and three thousand angels. His eye was fixed on the field of battle; the Mussulmans fainted and were pressed; in that decisive moment the prophet started from his throne, mounted his horse, and cast a handful of sand into the air: "Let their faces be covered with confusion." Both armies heard the thunder of his voice; their fancy beheld the angelic warriors; the Koreish trembled and fled; seventy of the bravest were slain; and seventy captives adorned the first victory of the faithful.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50.

176. ALLIES rejected. Lafayette—Kalb. July, 1777. Kalb and Lafayette arriving at Philadelphia . . . met a rude repulse. When it was told that Lafayette desired no more than leave to risk his life in the cause of liberty, without pension or allowance, Congress gave him the rank of major-general; but at first the services of Kalb, the ablest European officer who had come over—master of English and familiar with the country—were rejected.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 23.

177. ALLY, Volunteer. Agrarian Law. [Proposed for relief of the poor and for returned Roman soldiers. Large tracts belonging to the State were to be donated.] Pompey was the idol of every soldier in the State, and at Cæsar's invitation he addressed the assembly. He spoke for his veterans. He spoke for the poor citizens. He said that he approved the law to the last letter of it. "Will you then," asked Cæsar, "support the law if it be illegally opposed?" "Since," replied Pompey, "you counsel, and you, my fellow-citizens, ask aid of me, a poor individual without office and without authority, who nevertheless has done some service to the State, I say that I will bear the shield if others draw the sword." Applause rang out from a hundred thousand throats.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 13.

178. AMBITION vs. Affection. Napoleon I. [Josephine knew that many were urging upon him the necessity of a divorce that he might have an heir, and thus secure the future of the State.] One day when Napoleon was busy in his cabinet Josephine entered softly by a side door, and seating herself affectionately upon his knee, and passing her hand gently through his hair, said to him, with a burst of tenderness, "I entreat you, my love, do not make yourself king. It is Lucien who urges you to it. Do not listen to him." Napoleon smiled upon her kindly, and said, "Why, my poor Josephine, are you mad?" . . . She knew the intensity of her husband's love. She also knew the boundlessness of his ambition.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON I., vol. 1, ch. 24.

179. AMBITION, Awakened. Sir I. Newton. It is a question with English teachers whether schoolboys ought or ought not to be permitted to settle their quarrels by a fair fight with fists. In the great schools of Eton, Westminster, Harrow, and others, fighting is tacitly allowed; but in the smaller schools, especially those under the charge of dissenters, it is forbidden. . . . The greatness of Sir Isaac Newton dates from a fight which he had with one of his schoolfellows when he was thirteen years of age. At that time, according to his own confession, he was very idle at school, and stood last in the lowest class but one. One morning, as he was going to school, the boy who was first in the same class kicked him in the stomach with so much violence as to cause him severe pain during the day. When the school was dismissed, he challenged the boy to fight him. The challenge being accepted, a ring was formed in the churchyard, the usual place of combat, and the fight begun. Newton, a weakly boy from his birth, was inferior to his antagonist in size and strength; but, smarting under a sense of the indignity he had received, he fought with so much spirit and resolution as to compel his adversary to cry, Enough. The schoolmaster's son, who had been clapping one of them on the back and winking at the other, to urge on the contest, and who acted as a kind of umpire, informed the victor that it was necessary to crown his triumph by rubbing the other boy's nose against the wall. Little Newton seized him by the ears, thrust his face against the rough side of the church, and walked home exulting in his victory. The next morning, however, he had again the mortification of seeing his enemy at the head of the class, while he occupied his usual place at the foot. He began to reflect. Could he regard himself in the light of a victor while his foe lorded it over him in the schoolroom?

The applauding shouts of his schoolfellows had been grateful to his ears, but his enemy enjoyed the approval of the teacher. The laurels of the playground seemed to fade in comparison with the nobler triumphs of the mind. The result of his reflections was, that he determined to conquer his adversary again by getting to the head of his class.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 244.

180. AMBITION, Cruelty of. Irene. Constantine, surnamed Copronymus, . . . dying left this prince [his son Leo], then nine years old, to the government of his mother Irene, who ruled the empire [of the East] rather as a sovereign than as a regent. She was an able woman, and foresaw the danger to the empire from the ambition and power of Charlemagne. To avert any hostile purposes, till she should be in a condition to oppose them with effect, she brought about a negotiation for the marriage of her son with the daughter of Charlemagne; but it was far from her intention that this match should ever be accomplished. Irene, on the contrary, was too fond of power herself to consent to anything that might deprive her of the reins of government. She kept the young Constantine in the most absolute dependence and submission; and when at last he endeavored to assume that dignity which belonged to him, she, on pretence of treasonable designs, threw him into prison, deprived him of his eyes, and put him to death.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 3.

181. AMBITION in the Church. Schisms. Ambition is a weed of quick and early vegetation in the vineyard of Christ. Under the first Christian princes the chair of St. Peter was disputed by the votes, the venality, the violence, of a popular election; the sanctuaries of Rome were polluted with blood; and from the third to the twelfth century the church was distracted by the mischief of frequent schisms.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 69.

182. AMBITION cursed. Gen. Fraser. A.D. 1777. [Gen. Fraser, one of Gen. Burgoyne's major-generals, fell at the battle of Saratoga.] He questioned the surgeon eagerly as to his wound, and when he found that he must go from wife and children, that fame and promotion and life were gliding from before his eyes, he cried out in his agony: "Damned ambition!"—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 24.

183. AMBITION, Delusive. Roman Emperor Maximus. The imprudent Maximus . . . gratified his resentment and ambition; he saw the bleeding corpse of Valentinian at his feet; and he heard himself saluted Emperor by the unanimous voice of the Senate and people. But the day of his inauguration was the last day of his happiness. He was imprisoned (such is the lively expression of Sidonius) in the palace; and after passing a sleepless night, he sighed that he had attained the summit of his wishes, and aspired only to descend from the dangerous elevation. Oppressed by the weight of the diadem, he communicated his anxious thoughts to his friend and quæstor Fulgentius; and when he looked back with unavailing regret on the secure pleasures of his former life, the emperor exclaimed, "O fortunate Damocles, thy reign began and ended with the same dinner;" a well-known allusion. . . . The reign of Maximus continued about three months. His hours, of which he had lost the command, were disturbed by remorse, or guilt, or terror, and his throne was shaken by the seditious of the soldiers, the people, and the confederate barbarians.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 36.

184. AMBITION, Destructive. Assassination of Julius Cæsar. The principal thing that excited the public hatred, and at last caused his death, was his passion for the title of king. It was the first thing that gave offence to the multitude, and it afforded his inveterate enemies a very plausible plea.—PLUTARCH.

185. AMBITION, Determination of. Alexander Hamilton. His mother, while he was yet a child, had left him an orphan and poor. A father's care he seems never to have known. . . . [When a clerk in his native West India.] . . . To a friend of his own years [he] confessed his ambition. "I would willingly risk my life," said he, "though not my character, to exalt my station. I mean to prepare the way for futurity; we have seen such schemes successful when the projector is constant."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 6.

186. AMBITION differs. Alexander the Great and Parmenio. Darius had sent a second embassy to Alexander, while he was engaged in the siege of Tyre. The Persian now assumed a humbler tone. He offered ten thousand talents for the ransom of his mother and his queen, and he agreed to give Alexander his daughter Statira in marriage, with all the Asiatic provinces to the westward of the Euphrates for her portion. When these terms were made known to the Macedonian officers, Parmenio could not help remarking, that, were he Alexander, he would not hesitate a moment to accept of them. "And I," replied the king, "might think so too, if I were Parmenio."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4, p. 186.

187. AMBITION, Diverse. Napoleon I.—Peasant. [When Napoleon was crossing the Alps with his army, a young peasant was his guide, and unconscious of the rank of his companion. Napoleon] drew from his young and artless guide the secrets of his heart. The young peasant was sincere and virtuous. He loved a fair maid among the mountains. She loved him. It was his great desire to have her for his own. He was poor, and had neither house nor land to support a family. Napoleon struggling . . . against England and Austria . . . to meet one hundred and twenty thousand foes . . . [remembered his guide and gratified his ambition in the possession of a home.]—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 19.

188. AMBITION, Dream of. Count de Broglie. A.D. 1776. While Washington was tolling under difficulties without [pecuniary] reward, a rival in Europe aspired to his place. The Count de Broglie, disclaiming the ambition of becoming the sovereign of the United States, insinuated his willingness to be for a period of years its William of Orange, provided he could be assured of a large grant of money before embarkation, an ample revenue, the highest military rank, and the direction of foreign relations during his command, and a princely annuity for life after his return. . . . The poverty of the new republic scattered the great man's short-lived dream.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 16.

189. AMBITION, Envious. Themistocles the Athenian Statesman and General. Themistocles was so carried away with the love of glory, so immoderately desirous of distinguishing himself by some great action, that, though he was very young when the battle of Marathon was fought, and when the generalship of Miltiades was everywhere extolled, yet even then he was observed to keep much alone, to be very pensive, to watch whole nights, and not to attend the usual entertainments. When he was asked the reason by his friends, who wondered at the change, he said, "The trophies of Miltiades would not suffer him to sleep."—PLUTARCH.

190. AMBITION, Failure of. Sir W. Scott. There is something of irony in such a result of the herculean labors of Scott to found and endow a new branch of the clan of Scott. When fifteen years after his death the estate was at length freed from debt, all his own children and the eldest of his grandchildren were dead; and now forty-six years have elapsed, and there only remains one girl of his descendants to borrow his name and live in the halls of which he was so proud. And yet this, and this only, was wanting to give something of the grandeur of tragedy to the end of Scott's great enterprise. He valued his works little compared with the house and lands which they were to be the means of gaining for his descendants; yet every end for which he struggled so gallantly is all but lost, while his works have gained more of added lustre from the losing battle which he fought so long, than they could ever have gained from his success.—HUTTON'S SCOTT, ch. 17.

191. AMBITION, Field of. Young Knight. He went forth, if we are to believe literally the chroniclers of those ages, with the determined purpose of provoking to combat some other knight of established renown; and to effect this a pretence was never wanting. He had only to assert boldly that the lady whom it was his happiness to serve and obey excelled every other female in beauty and in virtue, as much as the moon surpassed the stars in splendor, and to insist upon every knight he met making the same acknowledgment. The high esteem of the female sex we have before remarked to have been characteristic of the Gothic manners.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 10.

192. AMBITION, Inhuman. The Triumviri. Octavius, Mark Antony, and Lepidus held a conference in a small island in the middle of the river Po. They agreed that, under the title of Triumviri, they should possess themselves of absolute authority; and they made a partition on the spot of all the provinces, and divided between them the command of the legions. . . . The Eastern provinces were as yet possessed by Brutus and the other conspirators, against whom it was determined that Antony and Octavius should immediately march with a large army. Before entering, however, upon this expedition, it was resolved to clear the way by a proscription of all that were obnoxious to any one of the Triumviri; a dreadful resolution, since the firmest friends of any one of the three had necessarily been the enemies of the others. What souls must these men have possessed, who could advise or consent to so horrible a scheme! Lepidus agreed to sacrifice his brother Paulus;

Antony his uncle Lucius Cæsar; Octavius his guardian Turranius and his friend Cicero.—TYTLER'S UNIVERSAL HIST., Book 4, ch. 2.

193. AMBITION, Insensibility of. Surgeons. A great surgeon is frequently tempted, by the mere love of his art, to perform an operation not strictly necessary. Dr. [Valentine] Mott held this practice in abhorrence. . . . A celebrated Paris surgeon asked him one day if he would like to see him perform his original operation. "Nothing would give me more pleasure," replied Dr. Mott. The Frenchman mused a moment, and then said: "However, now I think of it, there is no patient in the hospital who has that malady. No matter, my dear friend, there is a poor devil in Ward No. —, who is of no use to himself or anybody else; and if you'll come to-morrow, I'll operate beautifully on him." It need not be said that Dr. Mott declined to witness the perpetration of a crime so atrocious.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 531.

194. AMBITION, Literary. Milton. It was during his residence in Italy that his literary ambition was born. From an early period of his youth he had been accustomed to write Latin poems, some of which he carried to Italy and showed to his learned friends there. They were struck with wonder that a man from distant England should have attained such mastery of the Latin language, and they were not less astonished that a Briton should be so excellent a poet. It was their hearty praise, he says in one of his letters, that first suggested to him the idea of devoting his life to literature. Then and there it was, he tells us, that he began to think that "by labor and intent study" he might, perhaps, produce something so written that posterity would not let it die. A great Christian poem was the object to which he aspired. He desired to do for England what Homer had done for Greece, Virgil for Rome, Dante for Italy, and Camoens for Portugal. It was in Italy, too, that he saw those religious dramas, representing the temptation of Adam and Eve and its consequences, which are supposed to have given him the idea of his "Paradise Lost."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 168.

195. AMBITION, Lofty. Timour or Tamerlane. The conquest and monarchy of the world was the first object of the ambition of Timour. To live in the memory and esteem of future ages was the second wish of his magnanimous spirit.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65.

196. AMBITION, Maternal. Mother of Emp. Nero. On the accession of Claudius, Agrippina was restored to her rank and fortune, and once more undertook the management of her child. He was, as we see from his early busts, a child of exquisite beauty. His beauty made him an object of special pride to his mother. From this time forward it seems to have been her one desire to elevate the boy to the rank of Emperor. In vain did the astrologers warn her that his elevation involved her murder. To such dark hints of the future she had but one reply—"Occidat dum imperet!" "Let him slay me, so he do but reign!" [He did slay her.]—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 2.

197. AMBITION mortified. Poet Shelley. "I despair of rivalling Lord Byron, as well I may, and there is no other with whom it is worth contending." To Ollier, in 1820, he wrote: "I doubt whether I shall write more. I could be content either with the hell or the paradise of poetry; but the torments of its purgatory vex me, without exciting my powers sufficiently to put an end to the vexation."—SYMONDS'S SHELLEY, ch. 6.

198. AMBITION, National. Continental Province. A period of more than a hundred years followed, during which the chief object of the English was to establish, by force of arms, a great empire on the Continent. . . . The effect of the successes of Edward III. and of Henry V. was to make France, for a time, a province of England. The disdain with which, in the twelfth century, the conquerors from the Continent had regarded the islanders, was now retorted by the islanders on the people of the Continent. Every yeoman from Kent to Northumberland valued himself as one of a race born for victory and dominion, and looked down with scorn on the nation before which his ancestors had trembled. . . . In no long time our ancestors altogether lost sight of the original ground of quarrel. They began to consider the crown of France as a mere appendage to the crown of England.—MACAULAY'S HIST. OF ENG., ch. 1.

199. AMBITION, Persistent. Charlemagne. In the course of a glorious reign of forty-five years, this prince, who, in more respects than as a conqueror, deserved the surname of Great, extended the limits of his empire beyond the Danube, subdued Dacia, Dalmatia, and Istria; conquered, and rendered tributary to his crown, all the barbarous nations as far as the Vistula or Weser; made himself master of the greatest part of Italy, and alarmed the fears of the empire of the Saracens. The longest of his wars was that with the Saxons. It was thirty years before he reduced to subjection this ferocious and warlike people. The motive of this obstinate war, on the part of Charlemagne, against a people who possessed nothing alluring to the avarice of a conqueror, was ambition alone; unless we shall suppose that the ardor for making proselytes had its weight with a prince, whose zeal for the propagation of Christianity was a remarkable feature in his character—a zeal, however, which carried him far beyond the bounds which humanity ought to have assigned to it. Charlemagne left the Saxons but the alternative of being baptized or drowned in the Weser.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 3.

200. AMBITION proclaimed. Robert Guiscard. After this inauguration [as duke] Robert styled himself, "By the grace of God and St. Peter, Duke of Apulia, Calabria, and hereafter of Sicily;" and it was the labor of twenty years to deserve and realize these lofty appellations.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 56.

201. AMBITION restrained. Theodoric the Ostrogoth. The life of Theodoric represents the rare and meritorious example of a barbarian, who sheathed his sword in the pride of victory and the vigor of his age. A reign of three and thirty years was consecrated to the duties of civil government, and the hostilities in which he was sometimes involved were speedily terminated by the conduct of his lieutenants, the discipline of his troops, the arms of his allies, and even by the terror of his name.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39.

202. AMBITION, Sleepless. Mahomet II. [Fearing the bribes of his enemies, he sent for his prime vizier at midnight, who came with much alarm to learn Mahomet's anxiety to possess Constantinople.] "Lala" (or preceptor), continued the sultan, "do you see this pillow? All the night, in my agitation, I have pulled on one side or the other; I have risen from my bed, again have I lain down; yet sleep has not visited these weary eyes. Beware of the gold and silver of the Romans . . . with the aid of God and the prayers of the prophet, we shall speedily become masters of Constantinople."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 68.

203. AMBITION, Spurred. General Schuyler. A.D. 1777. [Gen. Gates asked Congress to appoint himself to supersede Schuyler in command at Albany and Ticonderoga.] His uneasy and ambitious wife let her voice be heard: "If you give up one iota, and condescend to be adjutant-general, I may forgive it, but never will forget it." [He was unfit for either position, but gained his point.]—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 19.

204. AMBITION, Subordinated. Oliver Cromwell. Macaulay . . . says: "The ambition of Oliver was of no vulgar kind. He never seems to have coveted despotic power. He, at first, fought sincerely and manfully for the Parliament, and never deserted it till it had deserted its duty. But even when thus placed by violence at the head of affairs, he did not assume unlimited power. He gave the country a constitution far more perfect than any which had, at that time, been known to the world. For himself, he demanded indeed the first place in the Commonwealth, but with powers scarcely so great as those of a Dutch stadtholder or an American president. He gave to Parliament a voice in the appointment of ministers, and left it to the whole legislative authority, not even reserving to himself a veto on its enactments; and he did not require that the chief magistracy should be hereditary in his family. Thus far, if the circumstances of the time and the opportunities which he had for aggrandizing himself be fairly considered, he will not lose by comparison with Washington and Bolivar."—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 1.

205. AMBITION, Unhappy. Timour the Tartar. [The nuptials of his six grandsons were celebrated for two months.] The historian of Timour may remark, that, after devoting fifty years to the attainment of empire, the only happy period of his life were the two months in which he ceased to exercise his power. But he was soon awakened to the cares of government and war.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65.

206. AMBITION unsatisfied. Roman Emperor Severus. The ascent to greatness, however steep and dangerous, may entertain an active spirit with the consciousness and exercise of its own powers; but the possession of a throne could never yet afford a lasting satisfaction to an ambitious mind. This melancholy truth was felt and acknowledged by Severus. Fortune and merit had, from a humble station, elevated him to the first place among mankind. "He had been all things," as he said himself, "and all was of little value." Distracted with the care, not of acquiring, but of preserving an empire, oppressed with age and infirmities, careless of fame, and satiated with power, all his prospects of life were closed. The desire of perpetuating the greatness of his family was the only remaining wish of his ambition and paternal tenderness.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6.

207. AMBITION, Unscrupulous. Stephen A. Douglas. His faults were great and lamentable. Like so many other public men who spend their winters in Washington, he lived too freely and drank too much. If he was a skilful politician, he was sometimes an unscrupulous one, and supported measures for party reasons which he ought to have opposed for humane and patriotic ones. He said himself that President Polk committed the gigantic crime of "precipitating the country into the Mexican war to avoid the ruin of the Democratic party," and knowing this, he supported him in it. His rapid and uniform success as a politician inflamed his ambition, and he made push after push for the Presidency, and finally permitted his party to be divided rather than postpone his hopes. He was in too much of a hurry to be President.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 201.

208. AMBITION, War of. "Seven Years' War." [Frederick the Great professed friendship and support to the young ruler of Austria.] Yet the King of Prussia, the "Anti-Machiavel," had already fully determined to commit the great crime of violating his plighted faith, of robbing the ally whom he was bound to defend, and of plunging all Europe into a long, bloody, and desolating war, and all this for no end whatever except that he might extend his dominions and see his name in the gazettes. He determined to assemble a great army with speed and secrecy to invade Silesia before Maria Theresa should be apprised of his design, and to add that rich province to his kingdom. . . . To quote his own words: "Ambition, interest, the desire of making people talk about me, carried the day, and I decided for war."—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 28.

209. AMERICA for Americans. "Monroe Doctrine." The British and French ministers proposed to the American Government to enter into a Tripartite Treaty—so called—in which each of the contracting nations was to disclaim then and forever all intention of possessing Cuba. To this proposal Mr. [Alex. H.] Everett replied in one of the most masterly State papers on record. Great Britain and France were informed . . . that the Federal Government did not recognize in any European power the right to meddle with affairs purely American, and that, in accordance with the doctrine set forth by President Monroe, any such interference would be resented as an affront to the sovereignty of the United States.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 58.

210. AMERICA, Future of. Lafayette. He received the order of the king [of France] to give up his expedition [in aid of the Americans] . . . he braved the order, and . . . embarked for America. . . . To his young wife . . . he wrote on board the Victory, at sea; "From love to me become a good American; the welfare of America is closely bound up with the welfare of all mankind; it is about to become the safe asylum of virtue, tolerance, equality, and peaceful liberty."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 16.

211. AMERICA, Mission of. John Adams. "I always," said John Adams, "consider the settlement of America with reverence and wonder, as the opening of a grand scene and design in Providence for the illumination of the ignorant and the emancipation of the slavish part of mankind all over the earth."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 11.

212. AMERICA, Prophecy of. Stormont to George III. [In A.D. 1775 he predicted if the colonies gained independence:] They might conquer both your islands and ours . . . in process of time advance to the southern continent of America, and either subdue their inhabitants, or carry them along with them, and in the end not leave a foot of that hemisphere in the possession of an European power . . . being remote they are not the less sure.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 51.

213. AMERICA, Transformation in. "Fountain of Youth." On the discovery of the new hemisphere, the tradition was widely spread throughout the old, that it conceals a fountain whose ever-flowing waters have power to reanimate age and restore its prime. The tradition was true; but the youth to be renewed was the youth of society; the life to bloom afresh was the life of the race.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 13.

214. AMERICANS despised. Dr. Samuel Johnson. He had recently published a pamphlet, entitled "Taxation no Tyranny; an Answer to the Resolutions and Address of the American Congress." . . . As early as 1769 . . . he had said of them, "Sir, they are a race of convicts, and ought to be thankful for anything we allow them short of hanging."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 237.

215. AMERICANS hated. Dr. Samuel Johnson. He said: "I am willing to love all mankind, except an American;" and his inflammable corruption bursting into horrid fire, he "breathed out threatenings and slaughter," calling them, "Rascals, robbers, pirates;" and exclaiming, he'd "burn and destroy them." Miss Seward, looking to him with mild but steady astonishment, said: "Sir, this is an instance that we are always most violent against those whom we have injured." He was irritated still more by this delicate and keen reproach.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 380.

216. AMUSEMENT, Captivated by. Louis Philippe. [The Duke of Orleans travelled in the United States in cog.] At a tavern the duke remonstrated with the landlady for not attending to their wants. She replied that there was a show in the village, the first show ever seen in that country, and she was not going to stay at home herself, nor require any one else to stay, to wait on anybody; not she, indeed!—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 509.

217. AMUSEMENT, Disappointed in. Monks. In England . . . the Gray Friars of Francis [arrived] in 1224. They had hardly landed at Dover before they made straight for London and Oxford. In their ignorance of the road the first two gray brothers lost their way in the woods between Oxford and Baldon, and, fearful of night and of the floods, turned aside to a grange of the monks of Abingdon. Their ragged clothes and foreign gestures, as they prayed for hospitality, led the porter to take them for jongleurs, the jesters and jugglers of the day, and the news of this break in the monotony of their lives brought prior, sacrist, and cellarer to the door to welcome them and witness their tricks. The disappointment was too much for the temper of the monks, and the brothers were kicked roughly from the gate to find their night's lodgings under a tree.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 208.

218. AMUSEMENTS, Brutal. Broadswords. During the first half of the eighteenth century, all ranks gathered to see "a trial of skill between two masters of the noble science of defence." The fights of the ring have been brutalizing enough; but to behold two men cut at each other with broadswords, till one was disabled by severe wounds on the forehead and the leg, was a brutality that was at its height in the Augustan age.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 27.

219. AMUSEMENTS of Combat. Roman Theatre. Pompey dedicated a new theatre, and delighted the mob with games and races. Five hundred lions were consumed in five days of combat. As a special novelty, eighteen elephants were made to fight with soldiers; and, as a yet more extraordinary phenomenon, the sanguinary Roman spectators sought signs of compunction at their sufferings. The poor beasts were quiet and harmless. When wounded with the lances they turned away, threw up their trunks, and trotted round the circus, crying, as if in protest, against wanton cruelty. The story went that they were half human; that they had been seduced on board the African transports by a promise that they should not be ill-used, and they were supposed to be appealing to the gods.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 15.

220. AMUSEMENTS, Degraded by. Romans. The drama, even in Horace's days, had degenerated into a vehicle for the exhibition of scenic splendor or ingenious machinery. Dignity, wit, pathos, were no longer expected on the stage, for the dramatist was eclipsed by the swordsman or the rope-dancer. The actors who absorbed the greatest part of popular favor were pantomimists, whose insolent prosperity was generally in direct proportion to the infamy of their character. And while the shamelessness of the theatre corrupted the purity of all classes from the earliest age, the hearts of the multitude were made hard as the nether millstone with brutal insensibility, by the fury of the circus, the atrocities of the amphitheatre, and the cruel orgies of the games. Augustus, in the document annexed to his will, mentioned that he had exhibited eight thousand gladiators and three thousand five hundred and ten wild beasts.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 1.

221. AMUSEMENTS, Delight in. Circus. The most lively and splendid amusement of the idle multitude depended on the frequent exhibition of public games and spectacles. The piety of Christian princes had suppressed the inhuman combats of gladiators; but the Roman people still considered the circus as their home, their temple, and the seat of the republic. The impatient crowd rushed at the dawn of day to secure their places, and there were many who passed a sleepless and anxious night in the adjacent porticos. From the morning to the evening, careless of the sun, or of the rain, the spectators, who sometimes amounted to the number of four hundred thousand, remained in eager attention; their eyes fixed on the horses and charioteers, their minds agitated with hope and fear, for the success of the colors which they espoused; and the happiness of Rome appeared to hang on the event of a race.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31.

222. AMUSEMENTS interdicted. By Puritans. Public amusements, from the masques which were exhibited at the mansions of the great down to the wrestling matches and grinning matches on village greens, were vigorously attacked. One ordinance directed that all the May-poles in England should forthwith be hewn down. Another proscribed all theatrical diversions. The play-houses were to be dismantled, the spectators fined, the actors whipped at the cart's tail. Rope-dancing, puppet-shows, bowls, horseracing, were regarded with no friendly eye. But bear-baiting, then a favorite diversion of high and low, was the abomination which most stirred the wrath of the austere sectaries. . . . not because it gave pain to the bear, but because it gave pleasure to the spectators. Indeed, he generally contrived to enjoy the double pleasure of tormenting both the spectators and the bear.—MACAULAY'S HIST. OF ENG., ch. 11.

223. AMUSEMENTS, Sanguinary. Roman Circus. By the order of [the emperor] Probus, a great quantity of large trees, torn up by the roots, were transplanted into the midst of the circus. The spacious and shady forest was immediately filled with a thousand ostriches, a thousand stags, a thousand fallow deer, and a thousand wild boars; and all this variety of game was abandoned to the riotous impetuosity of the multitude. The tragedy of the succeeding day consisted in the massacre of a hundred lions, an equal number of lionesses, two hundred leopards, and three hundred bears. The collection prepared by the younger Gordian for his triumph, and which his successor exhibited in the secular games, was less remarkable by the number than by the singularity of the animals. Twenty zebras displayed their elegant forms and variegated beauty to the eyes of the Roman people. Ten elks, and as many camelopards, the loftiest and most harmless creatures that wander over the plains of Sarmatia and Ethiopia, were contrasted with thirty African hyenas and ten Indian tigers, the most implacable savages of the torrid zone. The unoffending strength with which Nature has endowed the greater quadrupeds was admired in the rhinoceros, the hippopotamus of the Nile, and a majestic troop of thirty-two elephants . . . and properties of so many different species, transported from every part of the ancient world into the amphitheatre of Rome. But this accidental benefit, which science might derive from folly, is surely insufficient to justify such a wanton abuse of the public riches.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12.

224. AMUSEMENTS, Sunday. Games. [In 1593,] after the evening service, to shoot at the baths, to play at football, even to see an interlude, were not accounted unchristian occupations. Round the old manor-house the lads and lasses of the village would have their Sunday evening games of barley-break and handball, while the squire, and even the parson, would look approvingly on.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16, p. 251.

225. ANCESTRY, Humble. Poet Horace. His father was a Roman slave, who, some years before Horace was born, obtained his freedom. "Everybody has a fling at me," he says in one of his satires (the sixth of book first), "because I am a freedman's son." He owed his name to the fact that his father's master belonged to the Horatian tribe.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 373.

226. ANCESTRY ineffective. Prince Rupert. He was born at Prague, in 1619; his father had claimed to be, and had got himself and his fair young queen crowned, King and Queen of Bohemia, so that the prince was born with all the assumptions of royalty around him. But his genealogist says, "He began to be illustrious many years before his birth, and we must look back into history, above two thousand years, to discover the first rays of his glory. We may consider," continues the writer, "him very great, being descended from the two most illustrious and ancient houses of Europe, that of England and Palatine of the Rhine." And then the writer goes on to trace up his ancestry to Attila, Charlemagne, and so down through a succession of Ruperts, Louis, Fredericks. The facts after the birth of Rupert are an affecting satire upon all this. [He was headstrong and imprudent.]—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 9.

227. ANCESTRY, Unlike. Orleans Princes. These Orleans princes became, in the course of four or five generations, immensely rich—the richest family in France, if not in Europe. One Duke of Orleans gave away in charity every year a quarter of a million francs; two others were the scandal of Christendom for extravagance and debauchery, and still their estates increased. It happened, curiously enough, that a virtuous Duke of Orleans usually had a very dissolute son, and a dissolute duke a virtuous son, so that what one squandered the next heir made up by economy. Philippe, brother of Louis XIV., was tolerably steady; his son, Philippe, Regent of France, was one of the most shameless rousés, gluttons, and wine-bibbers that ever lived; his son, Louis, was a down-right devotee and bigot; his son, Louis Philippe, was not what we should call a moral man, but he was very moral for the France of that day, exceedingly charitable, and a most liberal patron of art and literature; his son, Louis Philippe Joseph, was that notorious debauchee and pretended democrat who figured in the first years of the French Revolution as "Egalité."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 504.

228. ANGEL, Delivering. Joan of Arc. When it was day, the Maid rode in solemn procession through the city, clad in complete armor, and mounted on a white horse. Dunois was by her side, and all the bravest knights of her army and of the garrison followed in her train. The whole population thronged around her; and men, women, and children strove to touch her garments, or her banner, or her charger. They poured forth blessings on her, whom they already considered their deliverer. In the words used by two of them afterward before the tribunal which reversed the sentence, but could not restore the life of the virgin-martyr of France, "the people of Orleans, when they first saw her in their city, thought that it was an angel from heaven that had come down to save them." Joan spoke gently in reply to their acclamations and addresses. She told them to fear God, and trust in Him for safety from the fury of their enemies.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 381.

229. ANGER, Symptom of. Napoleon I. [At St. Helena Sir Hudson Lowe, the governor, was very offensive to him. After an interview Napoleon said:] "We had a violent scene. I have been thrown quite out of temper. . . . My anger must have been powerfully excited, for I felt a vibration in the calf of my left leg. This is always a sure sign with me, and I have not felt it for a long time before."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 31.

230. ANGUISH prolonged. Garibaldi. Once in South America . . . being taken prisoner, he was cruelly beaten with a club, then hung by his hands to a beam for two hours, during which he suffered the anguish of a hundred deaths; and when cut down, fell helpless to the earth.—CYC. OF BIOG., p. 495.

231. ANIMALS, Allegorical. John Dryden. He composed, with unwonted care and labor, his celebrated poem on the points in dispute between the churches of Rome and England. The Church of Rome he represented under the similitude of a milk-white hind, ever in peril of death, yet fated not to die. The beasts of the field were bent on her destruction. The quaking hare, indeed, observed a timorous neutrality; but the Socinian fox, the Presbyterian wolf, the Independent bear, the Anabaptist boar, glared fiercely at the spotless creature. Yet she could venture to drink with them at the common watering-place under the protection of her friend, the kingly lion. The Church of England was typified by the panther, spotted indeed, but beautiful—too beautiful for a beast of prey. The hind and the panther, equally hated by the ferocious population of the forest, conferred apart on their common danger. They then proceeded to discuss the points on which they differed, and, while wagging their tails and licking their jaws, hold a long dialogue touching the real presence, the authority of popes and councils, the penal laws, the Test Act, Oates's perjuries, Butler's unrequited services to the Cavalier party, Still-fleet's pamphlets, and Burnet's broad shoulders and fortunate matrimonial speculations.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7.

232. ANIMALS attracted. Sir Walter Scott. [A grand company of guests were mounted for an expedition.] "The order of march had been all settled, and the sociable was just getting under weigh, when the Lady Anne broke from the line, screaming with laughter, and exclaimed, 'Papa! papa! I know you could never think of going without your pet.' Scott looked round, and I rather think there was a blush as well as a smile upon his face, when he perceived a little black pig frisking about his pony, and evidently a self-elected addition to the party of the day. He tried to look stern, and cracked his whip at the creature, but was in a moment obliged to join in the general cheers. Poor piggy . . . was dragged into the background. . . . This pig had taken, nobody could tell how, a most sentimental attachment to Scott, and was constantly urging its pretension to be admitted a regular member of his tail, along with the greyhounds and terriers; but, indeed, I remember him suffering another summer under the same sort of pertinacity on the part of an affectionate hen. I leave the explanation for philosophers."—HUTTON'S SCOTT, ch. 8.

233. ANIMALS condemned. Pet. When Cæsar happened to see some strangers at Rome carrying young dogs and monkeys in their arms, and fondly caressing them, he asked, "Whether the women in their country never bore any children?" thus reproving with a proper severity those who lavish upon brutes that natural tenderness which is due only to mankind.—PLUTARCH.

234. ANIMALS honored. Geese. Geese were ever after had in honor at Rome, and a flock of them always kept at the expense of the public. A golden image of a goose was erected in memory of them, and a goose every year [was] carried in triumph upon a soft litter, finely adorned.—LANGHORNE'S NOTES.

235. ———. Dead. In the battle with Porus, Bucephalus received several wounds, of which he died some time after. . . . Alexander showed as much regret as if he had lost a faithful friend and companion. He esteemed him, indeed, as such, and built a city near the Hydaspes, in the place where he was buried, which he called, after him, Bucephalia. He is also reported to have built a city and called it Peritas, in memory of a dog of that name, which he had brought up and was very fond of.—PLUTARCH.

236. ANIMALS, Respect for. Buddhists. Animal life is held sacred, and a Buddhist temple looks like a barnyard, a village pound, and a church combined. Cows, parrots, monkeys, dogs, beggars, children, priests, sight-seers, devotees—all mingle and blend on a footing of friendliness, the animals fearing no harm, the men meaning none. A Buddhist priest will not kill an animal. . . . Before he sits on the ground he will carefully brush it, lest he might unwittingly crush an ant or a worm.—GEN. GRANT'S TRAVELS, p. 353.

237. ———. Superstition. [The folly of the crusaders was frequently illustrated.] Some counts and gentlemen, at the head of three thousand horse, attended the motions of the multitude to partake in the spoil; but their genuine leaders . . . were a goose and a goat, who were carried in the front, and to whom these worthy Christians ascribed an infusion of the divine spirit.—GIBBON'S ROME, vol. 5, ch. 58, p. 553.

238. ANIMALS, Service of. Shepherd's Dog. Without the shepherd's dog the mountainous land in England would not be worth sixpence. [The dog brings the sheep from heights untrod-den by the foot of man].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 2, p. 32.

239. ANIMOSITY, Fraternal. Caracalla and Geta. Their aversion, confirmed by years, and fomented by the arts of their interested favorites, broke out in childish and gradually in more serious competitions; and, at length, divided the theatre, the circus, and the court into two factions, actuated by the hopes and fears of their respective leaders. The prudent emperor [Severus] endeavored, by every expedient of advice and authority, to allay this growing animosity. The unhappy discord of his sons clouded all his prospects, and threatened to overturn a throne raised with so much labor, cemented with so much blood, and guarded with every defence of arms and treasure. With an impartial hand he maintained between them an exact balance of favor, conferred on both the rank of Augustus, with the revered name of Antoninus; and for the first time the Roman world beheld three emperors. Yet even this equal conduct served only to inflame the contest, while the fierce Caracalla asserted the right of primogeniture, and the milder Geta courted the affections of the people and the soldiers. In the anguish of a disappointed father, Severus foretold that the weaker of his sons would fall a sacrifice to the stronger; who, in his turn, would be ruined by his own vices. [See more at No. 1096. It was a true prophecy. He was assassinated.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6.

240. ANIMOSITY of Ignorance. Reign of Charles II. It was very seldom that the country gentleman caught glimpses of the great world, and what he saw of it tended rather to confuse than to enlighten his understanding. His opinions respecting religion, government, foreign countries, and former times, having been derived, not from study, from observation, or from conversation with enlightened companions, but from such traditions as were current in his own small circle, were the opinions of a child. He adhered to them, however, with the obstinacy which is generally found in ignorant men accustomed to be fed with flattery. His animosities were numerous and bitter. He hated Frenchmen and Italians, Scotchmen and Irishmen, papists and Presbyterians, Independents and Baptists, Quakers and Jews. Toward London and Londoners he felt an aversion which more than once produced important political effects.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3.

241. ANIMOSITY, Unreasonable. Anti-Catholic. [At the funeral of Godfrey, a Protestant magistrate in 1678, there was great excitement, as the Catholics were supposed to have murdered him to suppress further inquiry concerning the Popish plot against the life of the king.] The crowd was prodigious, and so heated that anything called Popish, were it called cat or dog, had probably gone to pieces in a moment.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 20, p. 334.

242. ANNOUNCEMENT, Appalling. Richard III. But if he hated the queen's kindred Hastings was as loyal as the Woodvilles themselves to the children of Edward IV.; and the next step of the two dukes was to remove this obstacle. Little more than a month had passed after the overthrow of the Woodvilles when Richard suddenly entered the council-chamber and charged Hastings with sorcery and attempts upon his life. As he dashed his hand upon the table the room filled with soldiery. "I will not dine," said the duke, turning to the minister, "till they have brought me your head." Hastings was hurried to execution in the courtyard of the Tower, his fellow-counsellors thrown into prison, and the last check on Richard's ambition was removed.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 490.

243. ANTIPATHY of Race. Ireland. Though not persecuted as a Roman Catholic, he was oppressed as an Irishman. In his country, the same line of demarkation which separated religions separated races; and he was of the conquered, the subjugated, the degraded race. On the same soil dwelt two populations, locally intermixed, morally and politically sundered. The difference of religion was by no means the only difference, and was, perhaps, not even the chief difference which existed between them. They sprang from different stocks. They spoke different languages. They had different national characters as strongly opposed as any two national characters in Europe. They were in widely different stages of civilization. There could, therefore, be little sympathy between them; and centuries of calamities and wrongs had generated a strong antipathy.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6.

244. ANTIQUITY, Pride in. Athenians. This respectable people was not free from the common vanity of nations, of attributing to itself a measure of antiquity far beyond all bounds of probability. The Athenians . . . seemed to claim for their own nation an antiquity coeval with the formation of the earth; which was just as allowable as the boast of the Arcadians, that they were . . . older than the moon.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 6.

245. ANXIETY, Consuming. Marlborough. [Duke of Marlborough, after the glorious results of the campaign of 1704, was eager for its renewal the next year; but receiving a cold support and obstinate counsels from his allies, he was unable to do anything, while the French had every opportunity to organize success. He wrote:] I have for these last ten days been so troubled by the many disappointments I have had, that I think if it were possible to vex me so for a fortnight longer, it would make an end of me. In short, I am weary of my life.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 20.

246. ANXIETY, Parental. Robert Burns's Father. For the old man, his long struggle with scanty means, barren soil, and bad seasons, was now near its close. Consumption had set in. Early in 1734, when his last hour drew on, the father said that there was one of his children of whose future he could not think without fear. Robert, who was in the room, came up to his bedside and asked, "O father, is it me you mean?" The old man said it was. Robert turned to the window, with tears streaming down his cheeks, and his bosom swelling, from the restraint he put on himself, almost to bursting. The father had early perceived the genius that was in his boy, and even in Mount Oliphant days had said to his wife, "Whoever lives to see it, something extraordinary will come from that boy." He had lived to see and admire his son's earliest poetic efforts. But he had also noted the strong passions, with the weak will, which might drive him on the shoals of life.—SHAIRP'S BURNS, ch. 1.

247. ANXIETY of Responsibility. Abraham Lincoln. [Hon. Schuyler Colfax.] "One morning I found him looking more than usually pale and worn, and inquired the reason. He replied, with the bad news he had received at a late hour the previous night, which had not yet been given to the press—he had not closed his eyes nor breakfasted; and with an expression I shall never forget, he exclaimed, 'How willingly would I exchange places to-day with the soldier who sleeps on the ground in the Army of the Potomac!'"—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 727.

248. APOLOGY, Degrading. Reign of James II. [He had illegally forced upon the fellows of Magdalene College a Roman Catholic Pres., for whom they refused to vote, but whom they decided to recognize as president de facto.] While the fellows, bitterly annoyed by the public censure, were regretting the modified submission which they had consented to make, they learned that this submission was by no means satisfactory to the king. It was not enough, he said, that they offered to obey the Bishop of Oxford [the candidate] as president in fact. They must distinctly admit the commission, and all that had been done under it, to be legal; they must acknowledge that they had acted undutifully; they must declare themselves penitent; they must promise to behave better in future, must implore his Majesty's pardon, and lay themselves at his feet. Two fellows, of whom the king had no complaint to make, Charnock and Smith, were excused from the obligation of making these degrading apologies. Even James never committed a grosser error. The fellows, already angry with themselves for having conceded so much, and galled by the censure of the world, eagerly caught at the opportunity which was now offered them of regaining the public esteem. With one voice they declared that they would never ask pardon for being in the right, or admit that the visitation of their college and the deprivation of their president had been legal.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8.

249. APOLOGY, Humiliating. Innocent X. The French ambassador [for Louis XIV.] having been insulted by some of the Pope's Corsican guard, Innocent X. was compelled to offer an apology, to disband his guard, and to erect an obelisk at Rome with an inscription recording the offence and its punishment.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 21, § 93, p. 429.

250. APOLOGY, Ironical. Goths. The vacant fortifications of the river were instantly occupied by these barbarians; their standards were planted on the walls of Sirmium and Belgrade; and the ironical tone of their apology aggravated this insult on the majesty of the empire. "So extensive, O Cæsar, are your dominions, so numerous are your cities, that you are continually seeking for nations to whom, either in peace or war, you may relinquish these useless possessions. The Gepidæ are your brave and faithful allies; and if they have anticipated your gifts, they have shown a just confidence in your bounty."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 62.

251. APOSTASY, Open. Romanus. After Called [the leader of the Mohammedans] had imposed the terms of servitude and tribute, the apostate or convert avowed in the assembly of the people his meritorious treason: "I renounce your society," said Romanus, "both in this world and the world to come. And I deny Him that was crucified, and whosoever worships Him. And I choose God for my Lord, Islam for my faith, Mecca for my temple, the Moslems for my brethren, and Mahomet for my prophet; who was sent to lead us into the right way, and to exalt the true religion in spite of those who join partners with God."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51.

252. APOSTASY, Primitive. Persecution. In every persecution there were great numbers of unworthy Christians who publicly disowned or renounced the faith which they had professed; and who confirmed the sincerity of their adjuration by the legal acts of burning incense or of offering sacrifices. Some of these apostates had yielded on the first menace or exhortation of the magistrate, while the patience of others had been subdued by the length and repetition of tortures. The affrighted countenances of some betrayed their inward remorse, while others advanced with confidence and alacrity to the altars of the gods. But the disguise which fear had imposed subsisted no longer than the present danger. As soon as the severity of the persecution was abated, the doors of the churches were assailed by the returning multitude of penitents, who detested their idolatrous submission, and who solicited with equal ardor, but with various success, their readmission into the society of Christians.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16.

253. APOSTATES forgiven. Primitive Church. The gates of reconciliation and of heaven were seldom shut against the returning penitent; but a severe and solemn form of discipline was instituted, which, while it served to expiate his crime, might powerfully deter the spectators from the imitation of his example. Humbled by a public confession, emaciated by fasting, and clothed in sackcloth, the penitent lay prostrate at the door of the assembly, imploring with tears the pardon of his offences, and soliciting the prayers of the faithful. If the fault was of a very heinous nature, whole years of penance were esteemed an inadequate satisfaction to the divine justice; and it was always by slow and painful gradations that the sinner, the heretic, or the apostate was readmitted into the bosom of the church.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 15.

254. APPARITION, False. "Three Knights." [The Crusaders were besieged by the Turks in Antioch. By a ruse the "Holy Lance" had just been discovered.] The influence of his relic or trophy was felt by the servants, and perhaps by the enemies, of Christ; and its potent energy was heightened by an accident, a stratagem, or a rumor, of a miraculous complexion. Three knights, in white garments and resplendent arms, either issued, or seemed to issue, from the hills; the voice of Adhemar, the Pope's legate, proclaimed them as the martyrs St. George, St. Theodore, and St. Maurice; the tumult of battle allowed no time for doubt or scrutiny; and the welcome apparition dazzled the eyes or the imagination of a fanatic army.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58.

255. APPARITION, Fancied. Theseus. [The Athenians honored] Theseus as a demi-god, induced to it as well by other reasons, as because, when they were fighting the Medes at Marathon, a considerable part of the army thought they saw the apparition of Theseus completely armed and bearing down before them upon the barbarians.—PLUTARCH'S LIVES.

256. APPARITIONS, Belief in. Samuel Johnson. Of apparitions, he observed: "A total disbelief of them is adverse to the opinion of the existence of the soul between death and the last day; the question simply is, whether departed spirits ever have the power of making themselves perceptible to us; a man who thinks he has seen an apparition can only be convinced himself; his authority will not convince another; and his conviction, if rational, must be founded on being told something which cannot be known but by supernatural means." He mentioned a thing as not unfrequent, of which I had never heard before—being called—that is, hearing one's name pronounced by the voice of a known person at a great distance, far beyond the possibility of being reached by any sound uttered by human organs. "An acquaintance, on whose veracity I can depend, told me, that walking home one evening to Kilmarnock, he heard himself called from a wood by the voice of a brother who had gone to America; and the next packet brought accounts of that brother's death." Macbean asserted that this inexplicable calling was a thing very well known. Dr. Johnson said, that one day at Oxford, as he was turning the key of his chamber, he heard his mother distinctly call—Sam. She was then at Lichfield; but nothing ensued.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 459.

257. APPEAL, The only. At Augsburg. The cardinal threatened with ban and interdict, and dismissed Luther, saying, "Go, and do not show your face again to me, unless it be to recant." Thus was Luther sent away by the cardinal, who is said to have added this remark: "I will not confer with this beast again, for it has deep eyes and wonderful speculations in its head." . . . The latter remained silent, even after Luther had written again in a humble spirit asking forgiveness for his exhibited violence, promising to remain silent if his opponents would do the same, and professing himself as willing to recant, provided he were better instructed. But although he made all these concessions, he received no answer. And after he had drawn up another declaration, appealing from "the badly informed Pope to the better-to-be-instructed Pope," he sent it to Cajetan, and nailed a copy of it to the door of the cathedral. He then left the city on the 20th of October.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 5.

258. APPEARANCES, Deceptive. Deformity. [Philopœmen, called the last of the Greeks, was mistaken by] his hostess at Megara, owing to his easiness of behavior and the simplicity of his garb. She having word brought that the general of the Achæans was coming to her house, was in great care and hurry to provide his supper, her husband happening to be out of the way. In the mean time Philopœmen came, and, as his habit was ordinary, she took him for one of his own servants, or for a harbinger, and desired him to assist her in the business of the kitchen. He presently threw off his cloak, and began to cleave some wood; when the master of the house returning, and seeing him so employed, said, "What is the meaning of this, Philopœmen?" He replied in broad Doric, "I am paying the fine of my deformity."—PLUTARCH.

259. —. Miser. A man of the name of Guyot lived and died in the town of Marseilles, in France. He amassed a large fortune by laborious industry and severe habits of abstinence and privation. His neighbors considered him a miser, and thought that he was hoarding up money from mean and avaricious motives. The populace pursued him, whenever he appeared, with hootings and execrations, and the boys sometimes threw stones at him. He at length died, and in his will were found the following words: "Having observed from my infancy that the poor of Marseilles are ill supplied with water, which can only be purchased at a great price, I have cheerfully labored the whole of my life to procure for them this great blessing; and I direct that the whole of my property shall be laid out in building an aqueduct for their use."

260. APPEARANCES displeasing. Oliver Cromwell. His gait was clownish, his dress ill-made and slovenly, his manners coarse and abrupt, and face such as men look on with a vague feeling of admiration and dislike! The features cut, as it were, out of a piece of gnarled and knotty oak; the nose large and red; the cheeks coarse, warted, wrinkled, and sallow; the eyebrows huge and shaggy, but, glistening from beneath them, eyes full of depth and meaning, and, when turned to the gaze, pierced through and through the gazer; above these, again, a noble forehead, whence, on either side, an open flow of hair "round from his parted forelock manly hangs," clustering; and over all, and pervading all, that undefinable aspect of greatness, alluded to by the poet Dryden when he spoke of the face of Cromwell as one that

. . . "did imprint an awe,
And naturally all souls to his did bow,
As wands of divination downward draw,
And point to beds where sovereign gold doth grow."

—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 4.

261. APPEARANCES, False. Samuel Johnson. Dr. Adams told me that Johnson, while he was at Pembroke College, "was careless and loved by all about him; was a gay and frolicsome fellow, and passed there the happiest part of his life." . . . The truth is, that he was then distressed by poverty and irritated by disease. When I mentioned to him this account, as given me by Dr. Adams, he said: "Ah, sir, I was mad and violent. It was bitterness which they mistook for frolic. I was miserably poor, and I thought to fight my way by my literature and my wit; so I disregarded all power and all authority."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 14.

262. APPEARANCES, Misjudged. Oliver Cromwell. "It was in November, 1640," says a royalist spectator [Sir Philip Warwick], "that I . . . beheld on entering the house a person speaking. I knew him not; he was dressed in the most ordinary manner, in a plain cloth suit which appeared to have been cut by some village tailor. His linen, too, was coarse and soiled. I recollect also observing a speck or two of blood upon his little band, which was not much larger than his collar. His hat was without a hatband; his stature was of a good size; his sword stuck close to his side; his countenance swollen and reddish; his voice sharp and untunable; and his eloquence full of fervor, for the subject-matter would not bear much of reason, it being in behalf of a libeller in the hands of the executioner. I must avow that the attention bestowed by the assembly on the discourse of this gentleman has much diminished my respect for the House of Commons."—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 23.

263. APPEARANCES, Suspicious. "Lean." Cæsar had some suspicion of Cassius, and he even said one day to his friends, "What think you of Cassius? I do not like his pale looks." Another time, when Antony and Dolabella were accused of some designs against his person and government, he said, "I have no apprehensions from those fat and sleek men; I rather fear the pale and lean ones"—meaning Cassius and Brutus.—PLUTARCH.

264. APPEARANCES, Unpromising. Bishop George. [Philip Cox, one of the early Methodist itinerants, found a young man, named George, and brought him to Bishop Asbury,] and said, "I have brought you a boy, and if you have anything for him to do you may set him at work." Asbury looked at the youth for some time, and stroking the young man's hair said: "Why, he is a beardless boy, and can do nothing." The next day Asbury appointed him to a circuit [and the boy became an eminent Bishop in his denomination].—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 2, p. 71.

265. APPETITE, Fastidious. Antony. Philotas . . . being acquainted with one of Antony's cooks, he was invited to see the preparations for supper. When he came into the kitchen, beside an infinite variety of other provisions, he observed eight wild boars roasting whole, and expressed his surprise at the number of the company for whom this enormous provision must have been made. The cook laughed, and said that the company did not exceed twelve, but that, as every dish was to be roasted to a single turn, and as Antony was uncertain as to the time when he would sup, particularly if an extraordinary bottle or an extraordinary vein of conversation was going round, it was necessary to have a succession of suppers.—PLUTARCH.

266. APPETITE, Perils of. Cato the Censor. When the Romans were clamoring, at a time of scarcity, for a distribution of corn at the public expense, he began a speech in opposition to it thus: "It is hard, fellow-citizens, to address the stomach, because it has no ears." Rebuking the Romans for their luxury, he said: "It is difficult to save a city from ruin where a fish brings a higher price than an ox." Pointing to a man who had squandered an estate near the sea, he pretended to admire him, saying: "What the sea could not swallow without great difficulty, this man has gulped down with perfect ease."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 421.

267. APPETITE, Protest of. Erasmus said, "All the world is agreed among us in commending his" [Luther's] "moral character. He hath given us good advice on certain points; and God grant that his success may be equal to the liberty which he hath taken. Luther hath committed two unpardonable crimes: he hath touched the Pope upon the crown, and the monks upon the belly."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 26.

268. APPETITE, Ruled by. Epicure. When an epicure desired to be admitted into Cato's friendship, he said, "He could not live with a man whose palate had quicker sensations than his heart."—PLUTARCH.

269. APPETITES, Indulgence of. Flemish Gentry. Under these forms of chivalry, awkwardly imitated from romances, the history of Flanders at this period is nevertheless one fiery, joyous, brutal, bacchanalian revel. Under color of tournaments, feats of arms, and feasts of the Round Table, there is one wild whirl of light and common gallantries, low intrigues, and interminable junketings. The true device of the epoch is that presumptuously taken by the sire de Ter-nant at the lists of Arras: "Que j'ai de mes desirs assouvisance, et jamais d'autre bien," "Let my desires be satisfied, I wish no other good."—MICHELET'S JOAN OF ARC, p. 27.

270. APPLAUSE, Ancient. Germans. It was the practice to signify by a hollow murmur their dislike of such timid counsels. But whenever a more popular orator proposed to vindicate the meanest citizen from either foreign or domestic injury, whenever he called upon his fellow-countrymen to assert the national honor, or to pursue some enterprise full of danger and glory, a loud clashing of shields and spears express the eager applause of the assembly. For the Germans always met in arms, and it was constantly to be dreaded, lest an irregular multitude, inflamed with faction and strong liquors, should use those arms to enforce, as well as to declare, their furious resolves.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9.

271. APPLAUSE, Consequence of. Samuel Johnson. "'The applause of a single human being is of great consequence.' This he said to me with great earnestness of manner, very near the time of his decease, on occasion of having desired me to read a letter addressed to him from some person in the North of England . . . as I thought being particular upon it might fatigue him, it being of great length, I only told him in general that it was highly in his praise; and then he expressed himself as above."—BOSWELL'S JOHN-SON, p. 439.

272. APPLAUSE, Indifference to. Napoleon I. [Returning in a coach from his successful wars with Italy and Austria.] Illuminations, processions, bonfires, the ringing of bells, the explosions of artillery, the huzzas of the people . . . accompanied him all the way. . . . He but slightly regarded the applause of the populace. "It must be delightful," said Bourrienne, "to be greeted with such demonstrations of enthusiastic admiration." "Bah!" Napoleon replied, "this same unthinking crowd, under a slight change of circumstances, would follow me just as eagerly to the scaffold."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 9.

273. APPLICATION neglected. Magnetic Needle. The property of the magnetic needle, in turning constantly to the Northern Pole, was known in Europe as early as the thirteenth century; but it was not till above a century after that any one attempted to apply it to the purposes of navigation. That most ancient nation, the Chinese, are, indeed, said to have known the property of the magnet for a thousand years before us; yet it is believed that till our seventeenth century, when European example had reached them, they had never thought of using it in sailing. The English, in the reign of Edward III., are said to have first employed the compass in their ships, but the world owed to the Portuguese the first great experiments of the value of this invention in the advancement of navigation.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 18.

274. APPOINTMENT, Embarrassment by. Minister Adams. There was excitement in the great world of London on the 1st of June, 1785; for on that day a minister representing the United States was to be presented, for the first time, to a king of England. And who should that minister be but John Adams, the man who had taken the lead in urging on the revolted colonies to declare themselves an independent nation! . . . In a few minutes the Secretary of State came to conduct him to the king. The royal closet was merely an ordinary parlor. The king was seated in an arm-chair at the end opposite the door—a portly gentleman, with a red face, white eyebrows, and white hair, wearing upon his breast the star indicative of his rank. Upon entering the room, Mr. Adams bowed low to the king; then, advancing to the middle of the room, he bowed a second time; and, upon reaching the immediate presence of the king, he made a third deep reverence. This was the prescribed custom of the Court at that day. The only persons present at the interview were the king, Mr. Adams, and the Secretary of State, all of whom were visibly embarrassed. It was, indeed, a scene without a parallel in the whole history of diplomacy. Mr. Adams was the least moved of them all, though he afterward confessed that he was much agitated, and spoke with a voice that was sometimes tremulous.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 181.

275. APPOINTMENT, Humiliating. Cæsar. For the moment they [the opposing Senators] appeared to have thought that with Bibulus's help they might defy Cæsar and reduce his office to a nullity. Immediately on the elections of the consuls, it was usual to determine the provinces to which they were to be appointed when their consulate should expire. The regulation lay with the Senate, and, either in mere spleen or to prevent Cæsar from having the command of an army, they allotted him the department of the "Woods and Forests." A very few weeks had to pass before they discovered that they had to do with a man who was not to be turned aside so slightly.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 12.

276. APPOINTMENT, Partisan. Polk's Administration. The Administration had obviously endeavored from the first to create a Democratic hero out of the [Mexican] war. Authorized to appoint a large number of officers in the increased military force raised directly by the United States, an unjust discrimination was made in favor of Democrats. . . . Not one Whig was included [among the ten major and brigadier generals. The heroes of the war were Generals Taylor and Scott, both of whom were Whigs].—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 75.

277. APPRECIATION, Defective. Louis XVI. The Assembly sent a deputation to the king to request him to dismiss the troops; this Louis declined, but offered, if the members felt alarmed, to transfer their sittings to Soissons, and to proceed himself to Compiègne. When the Duke de Liancourt came to announce to him the fall of the Bastille, the king exclaimed, "This is a revolt!" "Sire," replied the duke, "it is a Revolution."—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 26, § 2, p. 531.

278. APPRECIATION, Without. Coin. The various transactions of peace and war had introduced some Roman coins (chiefly silver) among the borderers of the Rhine and Danube; but the more distant tribes were absolutely unacquainted with the use of money, carried on their confined traffic by the exchange of commodities, and prized their rude earthen vessels as of equal value with the silver vases, the presents of Rome to their princes and ambassadors. To a mind capable of reflection, such leading facts convey more instruction than a tedious detail of subordinate circumstances.—GIBBON, vol. 1, p. 260.

279. ARBITRATION rejected. Napoleon I. [When the bitter and terrible war opened between France and England, A.D. 1803,] Alexander of Russia entered a remonstrance against again kindling the horrid flames of war throughout Europe, and offered his mediation. Napoleon promptly replied: "I am ready to refer the question to the arbitration of the Emperor Alexander, and will pledge myself by a bond to submit to the award, whatever it may be." England declined the pacific offer.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 26.

280. ARCHITECT, A great English. Christopher Wren. Wren was the first Englishman who for centuries could put in a claim that could not be gainsaid to the title of architect, as, later, Hogarth was the first to prove that an Englishman might become a great painter. . . . [St. Paul's was thirty-five years in construction, by Wren, who was paid £200 a year.] It occupies the very first rank of architectural works of modern times. [See more at No. 289].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 29, p. 451.

281. ARCHITECTURE, Beauty in. Ionic. As the beautiful is more congenial to some tastes than the sublime, the lightness and elegance of the Ionic order will, perhaps, find more admirers than the chastened severity of the Doric. The latter has been compared to the robust and muscular proportions of a man, while the former has been likened to the finer, more slender, and delicate proportions of a woman. Yet the character of this order is likewise simplicity, which is as essential a requisite to true beauty as it is to grandeur and sublimity. But the simplicity of beauty is not inconsistent with that degree of ornament which would derogate from the simplicity of the sublime. . . . Of this order were . . . the temple of Apollo at Miletus, that of the Delphic oracle, and the superb temple of Diana at Ephesus, classed among the wonders of the world.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 7.

282. ARCHITECTURE, Composite. Novelty. The Composite order, likewise of Italian extraction, was unknown in the age of the perfection of Greek architecture. Vitruvius makes no mention of it. It seems to have been the production of some conceited artist, who wanted to strike out something new in that way, or to evince his superiority to the ancient masters; but it serves only to show that the Greeks had exhausted all the principles of united grandeur and beauty in the three orders before mentioned, and to prove that it is not possible to frame a new order unless by combining and slightly varying the old.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 7.

283. ARCHITECTURE, Defective. Egyptian. It must be allowed that those monuments which remain to us of the works of art among the Egyptians, though venerable on account of their antiquity, and sometimes exhibiting a grand and sublime appearance from their immensity, are extremely defective in beauty and elegance. How infinitely inferior, in point of taste, are the pyramids, the obelisks, the sphinx and colossal statues, the pillars of Luxor, to the simplest remains of the ancient temples in Greece! In architecture, one of the most obvious inventions, and one of the greatest improvements, both in point of utility and beauty, the construction of an arch, was quite unknown to the Egyptians. This defect gives an awkward and heavy appearance to their buildings, and must have occasioned a vast expense of labor, which might otherwise have been spared.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4.

284. ARCHITECTURE, Excellence of. Greeks. The Greeks are universally acknowledged as the parents of architecture, or at least of that peculiar style of which all after ages have confessed the superior excellence. The Grecian architecture consisted of three different manners, or what artists have termed the three distinct orders: the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian. The Doric was probably the first regular order among the Greeks. It has a masculine grandeur, and a superior air of strength to both the others. It is, therefore, the best adapted to works where magnitude and sublimity are the principal objects. Some of the most ancient temples of Greece were of this order, particularly that of Theseus at Athens, built . . . four hundred and eighty-one years before the Christian era.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 7.

285. ARCHITECTURE, Gilded. Roman Capitol. The profusion of Catulus, the first who gilt the [bronze] roof of the Capitol, was not universally approved; but it was far exceeded by the emperor's, and the external gilding of the temple cost Domitian 12,000 talents (£2,400,000).—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 36.

286. ARCHITECTURE improved. Roman. It is natural to suppose that the greatest number, as well as the most considerable of the Roman edifices, were raised by the emperors, who possessed so unbounded a command both of men and money. Augustus was accustomed to boast that he had found his capital of brick, and that he had left it of marble.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2.

287. ARCHITECTURE, Instruction by. Ruins. Travellers to whom Livy and Sallust were unintelligible might gain from the Roman aqueducts and temples some faint notion of Roman history. The dome of Agrippa, still glittering with bronze—the mausoleum of Adrian, not yet deprived of its columns and statues—the Flavian amphitheatre, not yet degraded into a quarry, told to the Mercian and Northumbrian pilgrims some part of the story of that great civilized world which had passed away. The islanders returned, with awe deeply impressed on their half-opened minds, and told the wondering inhabitants of the hovels of London and York that, near the grave of Saint Peter, a mighty race, now extinct, had piled up buildings which would never be dissolved till the judgment day.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1.

288. ARCHITECTURE, Magnificent. Temple of Hercules. The magnificence of the temple of Hercules at Tyre is celebrated by Herodotus, who saw it, and who was particularly struck with two columns, one of molten gold and the other of emerald, which in the nighttime shone with great splendor. The latter was probably of colored glass. . . . M. Coquet conjectures, with some plausibility, that the column was hollow, and was lighted by a lamp put within it.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 6.

289. ARCHITECTURE, Opportunity in. London Fire. It is not very easy to explain why the nation which was so far before its neighbors in science should in art have been far behind them all; yet such was the fact. It is true that in architecture—an art which is half a science; an art in which none but a geometrician can excel; an art which has no standard of grace but what is directly or indirectly dependent on utility; an art of which the creations derive a part, at least, of their majesty from mere bulk—our country could boast of one truly great man, Christopher Wren; and the fire which laid London in ruins had given him an opportunity, unprecedented in modern history, of displaying his powers. The austere beauty of the Athenian portico, the gloomy sublimity of the Gothic arcade, he was, like almost all his contemporaries, incapable of emulating, and, perhaps, incapable of appreciating; but no man, born on our side of the Alps, has imitated with so much success the magnificence of the palace-like churches of Italy. Even the superb Louis has left to posterity no work which can bear a comparison with St. Paul's.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8.

290. ARCHITECTURE, Preservation of. Gothic. The Gothic kings, so injuriously accused of the ruin of antiquity, were anxious to preserve the monuments of the nation whom they had subdued. The royal edicts were framed to prevent the abuses, the neglect, or the depredations of the citizens themselves; and a professed architect, the annual sum of two hundred pounds of gold, twenty-five thousand tiles, and the receipt of customs from the Lucrine port, were assigned for the ordinary repairs of the walls and public edifices.—GILBON'S ROME, ch. 39.

291. ARCHITECTURE, Prophecy in. Coliseum. Reduced to its naked majesty, the Flavian am phitheatre was contemplated with awe and admiration by the pilgrims of the North; and their rude enthusiasm broke forth in a sublime proverbial expression, which is recorded in the eighth century, in the fragments of the Venerable Bede: "As long as the Coliseum stands, Rome shall stand; when the Coliseum falls, Rome will fall; when Rome falls, the world will fall."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 61.

292. ARCHITECTURE, Religion in. Diverse. Islamism sprang up from the soil, like all religions newly accepted, with its peculiar architecture; the modes of architecture are the daughters of religions. It would seem that every other idea but that of God is insufficient to move those masses of stone whereby men indite the name of their God upon the soil. The Indians, the Egyptians, the Greeks, the Romans, the Goths, the Byzantines, created all of them architectures according with the genius of their sacred creeds. Some of them, pantheism which adores the whole and prays in open air; others, the secret doctrines which bury truths beneath the pyramids to hide them from the people; others still, the fanciful theogonies that multiply gods by all the extravagances of the imagination, and create Olympuses peopled with statues in their Parthenons; a fourth creed selects caverns of rocks and subterranean vaults in cities, to adore the arisen from the tomb; a fifth, the cupola's simple form, flooded with daylight, to turn the idols pale and comment the word of the inspired of Allah. The traces of these different divine ideas, effaced by each other, often superimposed upon one another, is nowhere on earth to be better read than in the provinces of the Ottoman empire. From the pyramid of Egypt to the ruins of Ephesus or of Athens—from the ruins of the Parthenon along to the catacombs of Jerusalem—from the massive domes of Saint Sophia of Constantinople to the mosques of Broussa and of Adrianople, we read in their edifices the genius of the different religions that have disputed with each other the dominion of the earth.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 244.

293. ARCHITECTURE, Roman. Tuscan. The Tuscan order is of Italian origin. . . . The Etruscan architecture appears to be nearly allied to the Grecian, but to possess an inferior degree of elegance. The more ancient buildings of Rome were probably of this specie of architecture, though the proper Greek orders came afterwards to be in more general estimation. A respect, however, for antiquity prevented the Romans from ever entirely abandoning the Tuscan mode. The Trajan pillar is of this order of architecture. This magnificent column has braved the injuries of time, and is entire at the present day. Its excellence consists less in the form and proportions of the pillar than in the beautiful sculpture which decorates it. Of this fine sculpture, which represents the victories of Trajan over the Dacians, a very adequate idea may be formed from the engravings of the "Columna Trajana" by Bartoli.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 7.

294. ARCHITECTURE, Simplicity in. Doric. One observation may here be made which is applicable to all the works of taste. The character of sublimity is chaste and simple. In the arts dependent on design, if the artist aim at this character, he must disregard all trivial decorations, nor must the eye be distracted by a multiplicity of parts. In architecture there must be few divisions of the principal members of the building, and the parts must be large and of ample relief; there must be a modesty of decoration, contemning all minuteness of ornament, which distracts the eye, that ought to be filled with the general mass and with the proportions of the greater parts to each other. In this respect the Doric is confessedly superior to all the other orders of architecture, as it unites strength and majesty with a becoming simplicity, and the utmost symmetry of proportions.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 7.

295. ARCHITECTURE, Stupendous. Chinese Wall. Among the most remarkable of the works of architecture in China is the great wall built to protect the empire against the inroads of the Tartars. It extends five hundred leagues, and is forty-five feet in height and eighteen in thickness—a most singular monument both of human industry and of human folly. The Tartars, against whom it was meant as a defence, found China equally accessible as before its formation. They were not at pains to attack and make a breach in this rampart, which, from the impossibility of defending such a stretch of fortification, must have been exceedingly easy; they had only to travel a little to the eastward, to about forty degrees of latitude, where China was totally defenceless.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 24.

296. ARCHITECTURE, Sublime. Gothic. The effect produced by the Gothic architecture is not to be accounted for on the same principle of conformity to the rules of symmetry or harmony, in the proportions observed between the several parts; but depends on a certain idea of vastness, gloominess, and solemnity, which we know to be powerful ingredients in the sublime. . . . The Cathedral of Milan is one of the noblest structures in the world. . . . Its column is of a magnitude that nobly fills the eye; the sudden elevation of the arch has something bold and aspiring; and while we contemplate the great and striking members of the building, the minuteness of ornament on its parts is but transiently remarked, or noticed only as a superficial decoration, which detracts nothing from the grand effect of the whole mass.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 7.

297. ARDOR, A Soldier's. Battle of Crecy. The English bowmen and men-at-arms held their ground stoutly, while the Welshmen stabbed the French horses in the mêlée and brought knight after knight to the ground. Soon the French host was wavering in a fatal confusion. "You are my vassals, my friends," cried the blind John of Bohemia to the German nobles around him; "I pray and beseech you to lead me so far into the fight that I may strike one good blow with this sword of mine!" Linking their bridles together, the little company plunged into the thick of the combat to fall as their fellows were falling. The battle went steadily against the French. At last Philip himself hurried from the field, and the defeat became a rout. Twelve hundred knights and thirty thousand footmen—a number equal to the whole English force—lay dead upon the ground.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 329.

298. ARGUMENT, Possible. *Stealing. Sir, there is nothing for which you may not muster up more plausible arguments than those which are urged against wealth and other external advantages. Why, now, there is stealing; why should it be thought a crime? When we consider by what unjust methods property has been often acquired, and that what was unjustly got it must be unjust to keep, where is the harm in one man's taking the property of another from him? Besides, sir, when we consider the bad use that many people make of their property, and how much better use the thief may make of it, it may be defended as a very allowable practice. Yet, sir, the experience of mankind has discovered stealing to be so very bad a thing, that they make no scruple to hang a man for it.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 122.

299. ARGUMENT, The reserve. *Dr. Samuel Johnson. [Worsted in debate,] he had recourse to the device which Goldsmith imputed to him in the witty words of one of Cibber's comedies: "There is no arguing with Johnson; for when his pistol misses fire, he knocks you down with the butt end of it."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 167.

300. ARGUMENT, Useless. *Reign of James II. [James commanded the clergy to read his proclamation, which aimed at the overthrow of the Protestant faith.] The London clergy, then universally acknowledged to be the flower of their profession, held a meeting. Fifteen doctors of divinity were present. . . . The general feeling of the assembly seemed to be that it was, on the whole, advisable to obey the order in council. The dispute began to wax warm, and might have produced fatal consequences, if it had not been brought to a close by the firmness and wisdom of Doctor Edward Fowler, vicar of St. Giles's, Cripplegate, one of a small but remarkable class of divines who united that love of civil liberty which belonged to the school of Calvin with the theology of the school of Arminius. Standing up, Fowler spoke thus: "I must be plain. The question is so simple that argument can throw no new light on it, and can only beget heat. Let every man say Yes or No. But I cannot consent to be bound by the vote of the majority. I shall be sorry to cause a breach of unity. But this declaration I cannot in conscience read." Tillotson, Patrick, Sherlock, and Stillingfleet declared that they were of the same mind. The majority yielded to the authority of a minority so respectable. A resolution by which all present pledged themselves to one another not to read the declaration was then drawn up. Patrick was the first to set his hand to it; Fowler was the second. The paper was sent round the city, and was speedily subscribed by eighty-five incumbents.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8.

301. ARISTOCRACY in Battle. *Roman. The battle of Pharsalia . . . acquired a special place in history, because it was a battle fought by the Roman aristocracy in their own persons in defence of their own supremacy. Senators and the sons of senators, the heirs of the names and fortunes of the ancient Roman families, the leaders of society in Roman saloons, and the chiefs of the political party of the optimates in the Curia and Forum, were here present on the field; representatives in person and in principle of the traditions of Sylla brought face to face with the representative of Marius. . . . Here were the haughty Patrician Guard, who had drawn their swords on him in the senate-house, young lords whose theory of life was to lounge through it in patrician insouciance. The other great actions were fought by the ignoble multitude whose deaths were of less significance. The plains of Pharsalia were watered by the precious blood of the elect of the earth. The battle there marked an epoch like no other in the history of the world. . . . Pompey had forty-seven thousand Roman infantry, not including his allies, and seven thousand cavalry. Cæsar had but twenty-two thousand, and of horse only a thousand. [He won the victory.] —FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 22.

302. ARISTOCRACY, Expense of. *Roman. All these provincial generals were therefore dukes; but no more than ten among them were dignified with the rank of counts or companions, a title of honor, or rather of favor, which had been recently invented in the court of Constantine. A gold belt was the ensign which distinguished the office of the counts and dukes; and besides their pay, they received a liberal allowance, sufficient to maintain one hundred and ninety servants, and one hundred and fifty-eight horses.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 17.

303. ARISTOCRACY, Reaction for. *Puritans. The Puritan austerity drove to the king's faction all who made pleasure their business, who affected gallantry, splendor of dress, or taste in the lighter arts. With these went all who live by amusing the leisure of others, from the painter and comic poet down to the rope-dancer and the Merry Andrew; for these artists well knew that they might thrive under a superb and luxurious despotism, but must starve under the rigid rule of the precisians.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1.

304. ARISTOCRACY, Ruin of. *Greeks. The narrow policy of preserving, without any foreign mixture, the pure blood of the ancient citizens, had checked the fortune and hastened the ruin of Athens and Sparta. The aspiring genius of Rome sacrificed vanity to ambition, and deemed it more prudent, as well as honorable, to adopt virtue and merit for her own wheresoever they were found, among slaves or strangers, enemies or barbarians. During the most flourishing era of the Athenian commonwealth, the number of citizens gradually decreased from about thirty to twenty-one thousand. If, on the contrary, we study the growth of the Roman republic, we may discover that, notwithstanding the incessant demands of wars and colonies, the citizens, who, in the first census of Servius Tullius, amounted to no more than eighty-three thousand, were multiplied, before the commencement of the social war, to the number of four hundred and sixty-three thousand men, able to bear arms in the service of their country.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2.

305. ARMY, Dangerous. *Standing. By a dangerous exception to the ancient maxims, he [Augustus] was authorized to preserve his military command, supported by a numerous body of guards, even in time of peace, and in the heart of the capital. His command, indeed, was confined to those citizens who were engaged in the service by the military oath; but such was the propensity of the Romans to servitude, that the oath was voluntarily taken by the magistrates, the senators, and the equestrian order, till the homage of flattery was insensibly converted into an annual and solemn protestation of fidelity.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 3.

306. ARMY disgusted. James V. The English army, after an inroad upon Scotland, being obliged, from scarcity of provisions, to retire again beyond the borders, an obvious advantage was offered to the Scots, who, by pursuing them, might have cut them off in their retreat. James gave his orders for that purpose, but the disaffected barons sternly and obstinately refused to advance one step beyond the limits of the kingdom. Stung to the heart with this affront, James, in a transport of rage and indignation, instantly disbanded his army, and returned abruptly to his capital. From that moment his temper and disposition underwent a total change. One measure more was wanting on the part of the nobility to complete their base revenge and to drive their sovereign to frenzy and despair. His ministers had again prevailed on some of the nobles to assemble their followers, and to attempt an inroad on the western border; but the chief command was given to one of the king's favorites, who was to them particularly obnoxious. So great was their resentment, that a general mutiny instantly took place, and a resolution was formed unparalleled in history. The Scottish army, consisting of ten thousand men, surrendered themselves prisoners to a body of five hundred of the English without attempting to strike a blow. On the news of this disgraceful event the spirit of James totally sunk under the tumult of contending passions, and, overcome with melancholy and despair, he died of a broken heart in the thirty-third year of his age.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 15.

307. ARMY, A Great. Napoleon's. The numbers of the confederated army which, on the 24th and 25th of June, passed the Niemen, the boundary of the Russian Empire, have been variously stated. The lowest estimate places them at half a million of men. A detailed return, extant in the French war-office, gives the numbers as, 651,358 infantry, cavalry, artillery, and engineers; 187,121 horses, and 1372 pieces of ordnance. . . . Of four hundred thousand Frenchmen who crossed the Niemen in May . . . not twenty thousand had returned to Vistula.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 30, p. 558.

308. ARMY, A great. Mogul. Our European battles, says a philosophic writer, are petty skirmishes, if compared to the numbers that have fought and fallen in the fields of Asia. Seven hundred thousand Moguls and Tartars are said to have marched under the standard of Zingis and his four sons. In the vast plains that extend to the north of the Sihon or Jaxartes, they were encountered by four hundred thousand soldiers of the sultan; and in the first battle, which was suspended by the night, one hundred and sixty thousand Carizmians were slain.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 64.

309. ARMY, A great. Tartars. [The reign of Timour the Tartar was but a] succession of campaigns which made subject to him, with Kharism, Kaptshak, Georgia, Hindostan, Persia, Irak, Syria, and Asia Minor, two hundred additional millions of subjects. Instead of the forty thousand soldiers of Alexander, the army of Timour had eight hundred thousand fighting men, and a million of slaves who dried up the earth on their route. The magnificence of this nomade court equalled the multitude of the combatants. Never did Europe see this number, this Asiatic parade, either in the migration of Attila, or those of the Arabs, or the campaigns of Moscow, where a modern conqueror led so many brave men to conflagration and the frosts.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 308.

310. ARMY, An industrious. Roman. When [Emperor] Probus commanded in Egypt, he executed many considerable works for the splendor and benefit of that rich country. The navigation of the Nile, so important to Rome itself, was improved; and temples, buildings, porticos, and palaces were constructed by the hands of the soldiers, who acted by turns as architects, as engineers, and as husbandmen. It was reported of Hannibal, that, in order to preserve his troops from the dangerous temptations of idleness, he had obliged them to form large plantations of olive trees along the coast of Africa. From a similar principle, Probus exercised his legions in covering with rich vineyards the hills of Gaul and Pannonia. [He was afterward killed by revolting soldiers.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12.

311. ARMY purified. Cromwell's. The Earl of Essex, Lord Fairfax, Waller, Hampden, and Falkland, fought, yielded, or died, some for their prince, and others for their country and their faith; Cromwell alone never sustained a defeat. Elevated by the Parliament to the rank of general, he strengthened his own division by weeding and purifying it. He cared little for numbers, provided his ranks were filled with fanatics. By sanctifying thus the cause, end, and motives of the war, he raised his soldiers above common humanity, and prepared them to perform impossibilities. The historians of both sides agree in allowing that this religious enthusiasm inspired by Cromwell in the minds of his troops transformed a body of factionaries into an army of saints. Victory invariably attended his encounters with the king's forces.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 31.

312. ARMY, A sectarian. James II. [Tyrcannel, a Roman Catholic, was appointed commander of the troops in Ireland preparatory to the social and religious revolution.] The ranks were completely broken up and recomposed. Four or five hundred soldiers were turned out of a single regiment chiefly on the ground that they were below the proper stature; yet the most unpractised eye at once perceived that they were taller and better-made men than their successors, whose wild and squalid appearance disgusted the beholders. Orders were given to the new officers that no man of the Protestant religion was to be suffered to enlist. The recruiting parties, instead of beating their drums for volunteers at fairs and markets, as had been the old practice, repaired to places to which the Roman Catholics were in the habit of making pilgrimages for purposes of devotion. In a few weeks the general had introduced more than two thousand natives into the ranks, and the people . . . affirmed that by Christmas day not a man of English race would be left in the whole army.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6.

313. ARMY, A small. Massachusetts. For a while the colonists were apprehensive of the Indians. In February [1621] Miles Standish was sent out with his soldiers to gather information of the numbers and disposition of the natives. The army of New England consisted of six men besides the general. [The Indians had been decimated by pestilence.]—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 13.

314. ARMY, Strong. Roman. The regular force of the empire had once amounted to six hundred and forty-five thousand men; it was reduced, in the time of Justinian, to one hundred and fifty thousand; and this number, large as it may seem, was thinly scattered over the sea and land—in Spain and Italy, in Africa and Egypt, on the banks of the Danube, the coast of the Euxine, and the frontiers of Persia.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 42.

315. ARMY subverted, The. James II. [Summoned to enforce submission to Roman Catholic innovations,] the king was resolved not to yield. He formed a camp on Hounslow Heath, and collected there, within a circumference of about two miles and a half, fourteen battalions of foot and thirty-two squadrons of horse, amounting to thirteen thousand fighting men. Twenty-six pieces of artillery, and many wains laden with arms and ammunition, were dragged from the Tower through the city to Hounslow. The Londoners saw this great force assembled in their neighborhood with a terror which familiarity soon diminished. A visit to Hounslow became their favorite amusement on holidays. The camp presented the appearance of a vast fair. Mingled with the musketeers and dragoons, a multitude of fine gentlemen and ladies from Soho Square, sharpers and painted women from Whitefriars, invalids in sedans, monks in hoods and gowns, lackeys in rich liveries, peddlers, orange girls, mischievous apprentices, and gaping clowns, were constantly passing and repassing through the long lanes of tents. . . . The king, as was amply proved two years later, had greatly miscalculated [when he was a fugitive from England]. He had forgotten that vicinity operates in more ways than one. He had hoped that his army would overawe London; but the result of his policy was, that the feelings and opinions of London took complete possession of his army.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6.

316. ARMY, Support of the. Charles II. The only army which the law recognized was the militia. That force had been remodelled by two acts of Parliament passed shortly after the Restoration. Every man who possessed five hundred pounds a year derived from land, or six thousand pounds of personal estate, was bound to provide, equip, and pay, at his own charge, one horseman. Every man who had fifty pounds a year derived from land, or six hundred pounds of personal estate, was charged, in like manner, with one pikeman or musketeer. Smaller proprietors were joined together in a kind of society, for which our language does not afford a special name, but which an Athenian would have called a Synteleia; and each society was required to furnish, according to its means, a horse soldier or a foot soldier. The whole number . . . was popularly estimated at a hundred and thirty thousand men.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3.

317. ARMY, Test in the. James II. [The king resolved to oppress the Protestants in Ireland and promote Roman Catholicism.] Many officers of the army were arbitrarily deprived of their commissions and of their bread. It was to no purpose that the lord-lieutenant pleaded the cause of some whom he knew to be good soldiers and loyal subjects. Among them were old Cavaliers, who had fought bravely for monarchy, and who bore the marks of honorable wounds. Their places were supplied by men who had no recommendation but their religion. Of the new captains and lieutenants, it was said, some had been cowherds, some footmen, some noted marauders; some had been so used to wear brogues that they stumbled and shuffled about strangely in their military jack-boots. Not a few of the officers who were discarded took refuge in the Dutch service, and enjoyed four years later the pleasure of driving their successors before them in ignominious rout through the waters of the Boyne.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6.

318. ARREST, Undeserved. John Bunyan. He was the first Nonconformist who had been marked for arrest. If he flinched after he had been singled out by name, the whole body of his congregation would be discouraged. Go to church he would not, or promise to go to church; but he was willing to suffer whatever punishment the law might order. Thus, at the time and place which had been agreed on, he was in the room at Samsell, with his Bible in his hand, and was about to begin his address, when the constables entered and arrested him. He made no resistance. He desired only to be allowed to say a few words, which the constables permitted.—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 5.

319. ARROGANCE answered. Charles V. When France was invaded by Charles V., he inquired of a prisoner, how many days Paris might be distant from the frontier. "Perhaps twelve, but they will be days of battle;" such was the gallant answer which checked the arrogance of that ambitious prince.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 30.

320. ARROGANCE, Childish. Xerxes. The impatience of Xerxes could not brook the delay that would have attended the transportation of this immense body of land forces in his fleet across the Ægean, which is a very dangerous navigation, or even by the narrower sea of the Hellespont. He ordered a bridge of boats to be constructed between Sestos and Abydos, a distance of seven furlongs (seven eighths of a mile). This structure was no sooner completed than it was demolished by a tempest. In revenge of this insult to his power, the directors of the work were beheaded, and the outrageous element itself was punished, by throwing into it a pair of iron fetters, and bestowing three hundred lashes upon the water.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 1.

321. ARROGANCE, Insulting. Attila. [The Roman Emperor Marcian refused the tribute demanded.] He threatened to chastise the rash successor of Theodosius; but he hesitated whether he should first direct his invincible arms against the Eastern or the Western empire.

While mankind awaited his decision with awful suspense, he sent an equal defiance to the courts of Ravenna and Constantinople; and his ministers saluted the two emperors with the same haughty declaration. "Attila, my lord, and thy lord, commands thee to provide a palace for his immediate reception."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 35.

322. ARROGANCE, Lofty. Attila. When Attila first gave audience to the Roman ambassadors on the banks of the Danube, his tent was encompassed with a formidable guard. The monarch himself was seated in a wooden chair. His stern countenance, angry gestures, and impatient tone astonished the firmness of Maximin. . . . The barbarian arrogantly declared, that he apprehended only the disgrace of contending with his fugitive slaves, since he despised their impotent efforts to defend the provinces which Theodosius had intrusted to their arms: "For what fortress" (added Attila), "what city, in the wide extent of the Roman empire, can hope to exist, secure and impregnable, if it is our pleasure that it should be erased from the earth?"—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 34.

323. ARROGANCE, National. England. The conduct of Great Britain toward the United States became as arrogant as that of France was impudent. In November of 1793 George III. issued secret instructions to British privateers to seize all neutral vessels that might be found trading in the West Indies. The United States had no notification of this high-handed measure; and American commerce to the value of many millions of dollars was swept from the sea, by a process differing in nothing from highway robbery. But for the temperate spirit of the government the country would have been at once plunged into war. [Redress was demanded, and a treaty signed.]—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 47.

324. ARSON, Destruction by. Chosroes. After the reduction of Galilee and the region beyond the Jordan, whose resistance appears to have delayed the fate of the capital, Jerusalem itself was taken by assault. The sepulchre of Christ and the stately churches of Helena and Constantine were consumed, or at least damaged, by the flames; the devout offerings of three hundred years were rifled in one sacrilegious day; the Patriarch Zachariah and the true cross were transported into Persia; and the massacre of ninety thousand Christians is imputed to the Jews and Arabs, who swelled the disorder of the Persian march.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 46.

325. ART, Age of Fine. Greece. The arts broke out at once with prodigious lustre at Athens, under the luxurious administration of Pericles. In architecture and sculpture, Phidias at that time distinguished himself by such superior ability, that his works were regarded as wonders by the ancients, as long as any knowledge or taste remained among them. His brother Panæus . . . is himself distinguished as the artist who painted the famous picture in the Peçile at Athens, representing the battle of Marathon, which is described by Pausanias and Pliny as so perfect a picture, that it presented striking portraits of the leaders on both sides. It was from the designs of Phidias that many of the noblest buildings of Athens were reared; and from the example of these, a just and excellent taste in architecture soon diffused itself over all Greece. Phidias had many disciples; and after his time arose a succession of eminent architects, sculptors, and painters, who maintained those sister arts in high perfection for above a century, till after the death of Alexander the Great. This, therefore, may be termed the golden age of the arts in Greece; while in those departments the contemporary nations were yet in the rudest ignorance.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 7.

326. ART, Conquest by. Cæsar. By the victory over the Nervii the Belgian confederacy was almost extinguished. The German Aduatuci remained only to be brought to submission. They had been on their way to join their countrymen; they were too late for the battle, and returned and shut themselves up in Namur, the strongest position in the Low Countries. Cæsar, after a short rest, pushed on and came under their walls. The Aduatuci were a race of giants, and were at first defiant. When they saw the Romans' siege-towers in preparation, they could not believe that men so small could move such vast machines. When the towers began to approach, they lost heart and sued for terms.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 14.

327. ART corrupted. Roman. Art was partly corrupted by the fondness for glare, expensiveness, and size, and partly sank into miserable triviality, or immoral prettinesses, such as those which decorated the walls of Pompeii in the first century, and the Parc aux Cerfs in the eighteenth. Greek statues of the days of Phidias were ruthlessly decapitated, that their heads might be replaced by the scowling or imbecile features of a Gaius or a Claudius. Nero, professing to be a connoisseur, thought that he improved the Alexander of Lysimachus by gilding it from head to foot.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, p. 5.

328. ART, Deformity in. Chinese. The Chinese have long practised the art of painting; yet, instead of a liberal art, it has ever been with them a mere mechanic drudgery. Their paintings, with a splendor of coloring, and the most minute accuracy of pencilling, have neither grace, beauty, nor justness of proportion. They have not the smallest notion of perspective. Instead of a gracefulness of attitude, the taste of the Chinese painter delights itself with the expression of distortion and deformity. Let us here remark the contrast between these Asiatics and the Grecian artists. In the images of the gods, which it is to be presumed men would always choose to picture according to their most exalted ideas of beauty and majesty, the Greeks have given a character and expression noble almost beyond imagination. The idols of the Chinese are deformed, hideous, and disgusting beyond measure.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 24.

329. ART, Destruction of. Nero. If Nero was indeed guilty, then the act of a wretched buffoon, mad with the diseased sensibility of a depraved nature, has robbed the world of works of art, and memorials, and records, priceless and irrecoverable. We can rather imagine than describe the anguish with which the Romans, bitterly conscious of their own degeneracy, contemplated the destruction of the relics of their national glory in the days when Rome was free.

What could ever replace for them or their children such monuments as the Temple of Luna, built by Servius Tullius; and the Ara Maxima, which the Arcadian Evander had reared to Hercules; and the Temple of Jupiter Stator, built in accordance with the vow of Romulus; and the little humble palace of Numa; and the shrine of Vesta with the Penates of the Roman people and the spoils of conquered kings? What structural magnificence could atone for the loss of memorials which the song of Virgil and of Horace had rendered still more dear? The city might rise more regular from its ashes, and with broader streets, but its artificial uniformity was a questionable boon. Old men declared that the new streets were far less healthy, in consequence of their more scorching glare, and they muttered among themselves that many an object of national interest had been wantonly sacrificed to gratify the womanish freak of a miserable actor.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, p. 31.

330. ———. Puritans. The Parliament resolved that all pictures in the royal collection which contained representations of Jesus or of the Virgin Mother should be burned. Sculpture fared as ill as painting. Nymphs and Graces, the work of Ionian chisels, were delivered over to Puritan stonemasons to be made decent.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2.

331. ———. Ruin of Paganism. We have seen how the rising city was adorned by the vanity and despotism of the Imperial founder; in the ruins of paganism, some gods and heroes were saved from the axe of superstition; and the forum and hippodrome were dignified with the relics of a better age. Several of these are described by Nicetas in a florid and affected style; and from his descriptions I shall select some interesting particulars: 1. . . . victorious charioteers. . . . 2. The sphinx, river-horse and crocodile. . . . 3. The she-wolf suckling Romulus and Remus. . . . 4. An eagle holding and tearing a serpent. . . . 5. An ass and his driver. . . . 6. An equestrian statue. . . . Bellerophon and Pegasus. . . . 7. A brass obelisk. . . . 8. The Phrygian shepherd presenting to Venus the prize of beauty, the apple of discord. . . . 9. The statue of Helen. . . . 10. The manly form of Hercules. . . . 11. Statue of Juno. . . . 12. Another colossus of Pallas or Minerva.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 61.

332. ART destructive to Life. Earthquake. In the disasters occasioned by earthquakes, the architect becomes the enemy of mankind. The hut of a savage or the tent of an Arab may be thrown down without injury to the inhabitant; and the Peruvians had reason to deride the folly of their Spanish conquerors, who with so much cost and labor erected their own sepulchres. The rich marbles of a patrician are dashed on his own head; a whole people is buried under the ruins of public and private edifices, and the conflagration is kindled and propagated by the innumerable fires which are necessary for the subsistence and manufactures of a great city.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 43.

333. ART, Educated in. Romans. Whatever were their [the Etruscans] attainments in the fine arts in those remote ages, their successors, the Romans, inherited none of that knowledge from them; for at the period of the conquest of Greece, the Romans had not a tincture of taste in those arts, till they caught the infection from the precious spoils which the sole love of plunder then imported into Italy. . . . Even when time had brought the arts to the highest perfection they ever attained among the Romans, this people never ceased to acknowledge the high superiority of the Greeks, of which we have this convincing proof, that when the Roman authors celebrate any exquisite production of art, it is ever the work of a Phidias, Praxiteles, Lysippus, Glycon, Zeuxis, Apelles, Parrhasius, or, in fine, of some artist who adorned that splendid period, and not of those who had worked at Rome, or who had lived nearer to their own times than the age of Alexander the Great.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 7.

334. ART, Low estimate of. Samuel Johnson. Johnson expressed his disapprobation of ornamental architecture, such as magnificent columns supporting a portico, or expensive pilasters supporting merely their own capitals, "because it consumes labor disproportionate to its utility." For the same reason he satirized statuary. "Painting," said he, "consumes labor not disproportionate to its effect; but a fellow will hack half a year at a block of marble, to make something in stone that hardly resembles a man. The value of statuary is owing to its difficulty. You would not value the finest head cut upon a carrot." Here he seemed to me to be strangely deficient in taste; for, surely, statuary is a noble art of imitation.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 276.

335. ART, Frivolous. Palace of Constantinople. The long series of the apartments was adapted to the seasons, and decorated with marble and porphyry; with painting, sculpture, and mosaics; with a profusion of gold, silver, and precious stones. His [Theophilus] fanciful magnificence employed the skill and patience of such artists as the times could afford; but the taste of Athens would have despised their frivolous and costly labors; a golden tree, with its leaves and branches, which sheltered a multitude of birds warbling their artificial notes, and two lions of massy gold, and of natural size, who looked and roared like their brethren of the forest.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53, p. 351.

336. ART, Inspiration in. Italians. What treasures may we suppose yet remain in Greece and . . . Italy! To the discovery of some of those remnants of ancient art has been attributed the revival of painting and sculpture, after their total extinction during the Middle Ages. This, at least, is certain: that, till Michael Angelo and Raphael, feeling the beauties of the antique, began to emulate their noble manner, and introduced into their works, the one a grandeur, and the other a beauty, unknown to the age in which they lived, the manner of their predecessors had been harsh, constrained, and utterly deficient in grace.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 7.

337. ART, Origin of. Necessity. We may presume, with some reason, that in the early ages the priests were among the first who cultivated the sciences. The useful arts are the immediate offspring of necessity; and in the infancy of society every individual, according as he feels his wants, is put to the necessity of exercising his talents in some rude contrivances to supply them. The skill to construct instruments for the capture or destruction of animals, or for offence and defence in war, is found among the most barbarous nations. The rude arts of forming a clothing for the body, and the constructions of huts for shelter against the inclemencies of the air, form among such nations the occupation of every individual of the tribe or community, and even of both sexes.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 3.

338. ———. Egyptians. It is highly probable, too, that from this people, as from a focus of illumination, most of the European nations have, by the natural progress of knowledge, received a great part of their instruction both in the arts and in the sciences. The Egyptians instructed and enlightened the Greeks; the Greeks performed the same beneficial office to the Romans, who, in their turn instructing the nations whom they conquered or colonized, have transmitted the rudiments of that knowledge which the industry and the genius of the moderns are continually extending and advancing to perfection.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 7.

339. ART, Periods in. Affinity in. After the defeat of Xerxes the Greeks, secure for some time from foreign invaders, and in full possession of their liberty, achieved with distinguished glory, may certainly be considered as at the summit of their grandeur as a nation. They maintained for a considerable time their power and independence, and distinguished themselves during that period by an universality of genius unknown to other ages and nations. The fine arts bear a near affinity to each other; and it has seldom been known in any age which produced or encouraged artists in one department, that there were wanting others who displayed similar excellence in the rest. Of this, both ancient and modern history affords ample proof, in the ages of Pericles, of Leo X., and of Louis XIV.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 7.

340. ART, Periods of. Roman. In the period of ancient history, we have seen that remarkable splendor to which the fine arts arose in the age of Pericles. In modern times the age of Leo X. is an era equally distinguished. The art of painting lay long buried in the west, under the ruins of the Roman Empire. It declined in the latter ages, with the universal decay of taste and genius, and needed not an irruption of the Goths to lay it in the dust. The Ostrogoths, who subdued Italy, that people who were barbarians only in name, had they found it in splendor, would have industriously cherished and preserved it, as they did every monument of ancient grandeur or of beauty; but painting and sculpture were never high among the ancient Romans; and that the taste and genius for the imitative arts underwent a regular and natural decay, we have the strongest proof in examining the series of the coins of the lower empire.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 22.

341. ART, Pleasures of. Preferred. A very fashionable baronet [Sir Michael Le Fleming] in the brilliant world, who, on his attention being called to the fragrance of a May evening in the country, observed: "This may be very well; but, for my part, I prefer the smell of a flambeau at the playhouse."—BOSWELL'S JOHN-SON, p. 127.

342. ART protected. By Climate. It seems peculiar to the climate of Egypt, that time appears scarcely to make any sensible impression on those monuments of human industry. The cause is plausibly assigned by De Maillet, in his "Description de l'Egypte." Rain and frost, says that author, which in other countries are the destroyers of all the works of art which are exposed to the air, are utterly unknown in Egypt. The structures of that country, its pyramids and its obelisks, can sustain no injury unless from the sun and wind, which have scarce any sensible effect in wasting or corroding their materials.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4.

343. ART, Protected by. Syracuse. Marcellus . . . besieged Syracuse. . . . The genius of a single man [Archimedes] was found sufficient to withstand for a great length of time the utmost efforts of an enemy by sea and land. . . . The city was twenty-two miles in compass. . . . Marcellus caused eight galleys to be joined together laterally by iron chains, and on their surface, as a foundation, an immense tower was erected, whose height overtopped the walls of the city. This huge machine, which Marcellus called his Sambuca, or Dulcimer, was slowly advancing, rowed by a great number of men, when Archimedes discharged from one of his engines a stone of twelve hundred and fifty pounds weight, then a second, and immediately afterward a third, with a direction so sure as to batter the galleys and the tower to pieces in a few minutes. An immense artillery of darts, stones, burning torches, and every material of annoyance, was incessantly launched upon the besiegers from every quarter of the walls; while the machines from which they issued were altogether beyond their reach, and even out of their sight. It was of no avail whether they made their attack from a distance or close to the walls. If within the shot of a bow, the engines of Archimedes assailed the galleys with stones of such weight as entirely to demolish them; if they approached the walls, they were seized by cranes and grappling-irons, suspended in the air, and suddenly fell with a force that sunk them. Taking advantage of a meridian sun, and concentrating the rays by a combination of polished metal, this wonderful engineer burnt the vessels of the enemy at a furlong's distance, thus . . . making even the fire of heaven obedient to his commands.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 9.

344. ART, Revival of. Italy. The fine arts are said to have been revived in Italy by artists from Greece; and it seems highly probable that in that country, which had been eminently distinguished by their splendor and perfection, the taste should have been less entirely lost than in any other. The most common notion is, that, about the end of the thirteenth century, Cimabue, a Florentine, observing the works of two Grecian artists, who had been sent for to paint one of the churches at Florence, began to attempt something of the same kind, and soon conceived that it would not be difficult to surpass such rude performances. His works were the admiration of his time; he had his scholars and his imitators; among these were Giotto, Gaddi, Tasi Cavallini, and Stephano Fiorentino; and the number of artists continued so to increase, that an academy for painting was instituted at Florence in the year 1350. Still, however, the art was extremely low, and the artists, with great industry, seem to have had no spark of genius.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 22.

345. ——. Fifteenth Century. The successors of Cimabue and of Giotto seem all to have painted in one manner. Their works are distinguished by a hard and rigid outline, sharp angles of the limbs, and stiff folds in the drapery; a contour, in short, in which there is not the smallest grace or elegance. Such, with little variation or improvement, was the manner of painting for above two centuries. The best artists valued themselves on the most scrupulous and servile imitation of nature, without any capacity of distinguishing her beauties and deformities. In painting a head, it was the highest pitch of excellence that all the wrinkles of the skin should be most distinctly marked, and that the spectator should be able to count every hair on the beard. Such was the state of painting till toward the end of the fifteenth century, when all at once, as if by some supernatural influence, it attained at a single step to the summit of perfection. Nothing can more clearly demonstrate that the splendor to which the fine arts all at once attained, at the period of which we now speak, was owing entirely to natural genius, and not to accidental causes, than this circumstance, that though many remains of the finest sculpture of the ancients existed, and were known in Italy for some centuries preceding this era, it was not till this time that they began to serve as models of imitation.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 22.

346. ART, Schools of. Threes. These three—the Florentine, the Roman, and the Venetian—are the chief of the Italian schools of painting. The Florentine is distinguished by grandeur and sublimity, and great excellence of design; but a want of grace, of beauty of coloring, and skill in the chiaro-oscuro. The character of the Roman is equal excellence of design, a grandeur, tempered with moderation and simplicity, a high degree of grace and elegance, and a superior knowledge, though not an excellence in coloring. The characteristic of the Venetian is the perfection of coloring and the utmost force of the chiaro-oscuro, with an inferiority in every other particular.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 22.

347. ART, Superiority in. Masters. Michael Angelo was so smitten with the beauties of the antique, that he occupied himself in drawing numberless sketches of a mutilated trunk of a statue of Hercules, still to be seen at Rome, and from him called the Torso of Michael Angelo. Raphael, whose works have entitled him to the same epithet which the Greeks bestowed on Apelles, The Divine—Raphael confessed the excellence of the antique by borrowing from it many of his noblest airs and attitudes; and his enemies (for merit will ever have its enemies) have asserted, that of those gems and basso-relievos which he had been at pains to collect and copy, he had destroyed not a few, in order that the beauties he had thence borrowed might pass for his own. The practice of those artists, whose names are the first among the moderns, affords sufficient argument of the superiority of the ancients. Their works remain the highest models of the art; and we who, in the imitation of the human figure, have not nature, as they had, constantly before our eyes undisguised, and in her most graceful and sublimest aspects, can find no means so short and so sure to attain to excellence as by imitating the antique.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 7.

348. ——. Raphael. His invention and composition are admirable, his attitudes grand and sublime, his female figures in the highest degree beautiful. He understood the anatomy of the human figure as well as Michael Angelo, but he never offends by a harsh delineation of the muscles. His skill in the chiaro-oscuro, or in the effect of light and shade, is beyond that of Michael Angelo, and his coloring very far superior to him. In the action of his figures there is nothing violent and constrained, but all is moderate, simple, and gracefully majestic. Many painters there are, excellent in different departments, and several that, in one single department, may be found to exceed even Raphael; but in that supreme excellence which consists in the union of all the various merits of the art, he stands unrivalled, and far removed from all competition. In representing female beauty, Raphael has gone beyond every other artist, and even beyond the antique itself. In his Madonnas, in his St. Cecilia, and in his Galatea, imagination cannot reach a finer conformation of features. In painting the Galatea, he says himself, in one of his letters, that, unable to find among the most beautiful women that excellence which he aimed at, he made use of a certain divine form or idea, which presented itself to his imagination. In his portraits he seems to have confined himself to the perfect imitation of nature, without desire to raise or embellish, but without that minute and servile accuracy which distinguishes the works in that style of some of the Flemish masters. The union of all these excellences, which has placed Raphael at the head of all the painters that ever the world produced, was attained by a youth who never reached the middle period of life. Raphael died at the age of thirty-seven. What may we suppose he would have been had he lived to the age of Titian or Leonardo da Vinci?—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 7.

349. ART, Treasures of. Napoleon I. [The victorious] Napoleon . . . demanded twenty of the choicest pictures of the duke [of Parma] to be sent to the Museum of Paris. To save one of these works of art—the celebrated picture of St. Jerome—the duke offered two hundred thousand dollars. Napoleon declined the money, stating to the army, "The sum which he offers will soon be spent; but the possession of such a masterpiece at Paris will adorn that capital for ages, and give birth to similar exertions of genius."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 5.

350. ART, Value of. Cannon. This epoch was signalized by one of the most important discoveries that has ever been made—the invention of artillery. Some pieces of cannon, which, it is said, Edward had placed in the front of his army, contributed much to throw the enemy into confusion, and to give victory to the English. This invention, apparently a most destructive one, has certainly, upon the whole, proved beneficial to society. Nations are more upon a level, as less depends upon frantic exertions of courage; and, consequently, from a consideration of an equality of strength, the peace of kingdoms is better preserved. The victory of Cressy [A.D. 1346] was followed by the siege and reduction of Calais.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 12.

351. ARTISANS, Capture of. Silk-weavers. Two cities of Spain, Almeria and Lisbon, were famous for the manufacture . . . of silk. It was first introduced into Sicily by the Normans; and this emigration of trade distinguishes the victory of Roger from the uniform and fruitless hostilities of every age. After the sack of Corinth, Athens, and Thebes, his lieutenant embarked with a captive train of weavers and artificers of both sexes, a trophy glorious to their master, and disgraceful to the Greek emperor. The King of Sicily was not insensible of the value of the present.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53.

352. ARTISANS, Wages of. England. The remuneration of workmen employed in manufactures has always been higher than that of the tillers of the soil. In the year 1680 a member of the House of Commons remarked that the high wages paid in this country made it impossible for our textures to maintain a competition with the produce of the Indian looms. An English mechanic, he said, instead of slaving like a native of Bengal for a piece of copper, exacted a shilling a day. Other evidence is extant, which proves that a shilling a day was the pay to which the English manufacturer then thought himself entitled, but that he was often forced to work for less.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3.

353. ARTISANS, Ancient. War. A tradition has prevailed that the Roman fleet was reduced to ashes in the port of Syracuse, by the burning-glasses of Archimedes [see No. 342]; and it is asserted that a similar expedient was employed by Proclus to destroy the Gothic vessels in the harbor of Constantinople, and to protect his benefactor Anastasius against the bold enterprise of Vitallian. A machine was fixed on the walls of the city, consisting of a hexagon mirror of polished brass, with many smaller and movable polygons to receive and reflect the rays of the meridian sun; and a consuming flame was darted to the distance, perhaps, of two hundred feet. . . . Proclus applied sulphur to the destruction of the Gothic fleet; in a modern imagination, the name of sulphur is instantly connected with the suspicion of gunpowder, and that suspicion is propagated by the secret arts of his disciple Anthemius.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40.

354. ARTS encouraged. Constantine. [Constantine the Great] discovered that in the decline of the arts the skill as well as numbers of his architects bore a very unequal proportion to the greatness of his designs [in the building of Constantinople]. The magistrates of the most distant provinces were therefore directed to institute schools, to appoint professors, and, by the hopes of rewards and privileges, to engage in the study and practice of architecture a sufficient number of ingenious youths who had received a liberal education.—GIBBON'S ROME, vol. 2, ch. 17, p. 95.

355. ARTS, Obsolete. By Inventions. The endowment in 1626 of a free-school at Great Marlow, to teach twenty-four girls to knit, spin, and make bone-lace, had become a provision, for the continuance of obsolete arts, and unprofitable labor [early in the eighteenth century].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 2, p. 20.

356. ARTS, Subsidized. Martin Luther. [For religion.] In the year 1524 there appeared in Wittenberg the first German hymn-book, consisting of eight hymns, among them the one beginning, "Now, rejoice, ye Christian people." In the preface he remarks: "I am not of the opinion that all the arts should be suppressed by the gospel, and should perish, as several high ecclesiastics maintain; but I would rather that all the arts, especially music, should be enlisted in the service of Him who has created them and bestowed them upon us." And he was forced to view with deep regret the arts and sciences endangered by those intemperate fanatics who, in their false zeal, would have destroyed all the external decoration of the churches.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 13.

357. ASCETICISM, Exercise of. Asiatics. The opinion and practice of the monasteries of Mount Athos will be best represented in the words of an abbot, who flourished in the eleventh century. "When thou art alone in thy cell," says the ascetic teacher, "shut thy door, and seat thyself in a corner; raise thy mind above all things vain and transitory; recline thy beard and chin on thy breast; turn thy eyes and thy thoughts towards the middle of thy belly, the region of the navel; and search the place of the heart, the seat of the soul. At first, all will be dark and comfortless; but if you persevere day and night, you will feel an ineffable joy; and no sooner has the soul discovered the place of the heart than it is involved in a mystic and ethereal light." This light, the production of a distempered fancy, the creature of an empty stomach and an empty brain, was adored by the Quietists as the pure and perfect essence of God Himself.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 42.

358. ASCETICISM, Escape from. John Wesley. [John Wesley before his conversion was anxiously seeking rest for his soul, and] proposed to himself a solitary life in the "Yorkshire dales;" "it is the decided temper of his soul." His wise mother interposes, admonishing him prophetically, "that God had better work for him to do." He travels some miles to consult "a serious man." "The Bible knows nothing of a solitary region," says this good man, and Wesley turns about his face toward that great career which was to make his history a part of the history of his country and of the world.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 1, p. 32.

359. ASCETICS, Early. Roman. Prosperity and peace introduced the distinction of the vulgar and the Ascetic Christians. The loose and imperfect practise of religion satisfied the conscience of the multitude. The prince or magistrate, the soldier or merchant, reconciled their fervent zeal and implicit faith with the exercise of their profession, the pursuit of their interest, and the indulgence of their passions; but the Ascetics, who obeyed and abused the rigid precepts of the gospel, were inspired by the savage enthusiasm which represents man as a criminal and God as a tyrant. They seriously renounced the business and the pleasures of the age; abjured the use of wine, of flesh, and of marriage; chastised their body, mortified their affections, and embraced a life of misery, as the price of eternal happiness. In the reign of Constantine the Ascetics fled from a profane and degenerate world to perpetual solitude or religious society.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 37.

360. ASSASSINATION attempted. Louis Philippe. In 1835 Louis Philippe and his three sons and a splendid suite of military officers were riding through the line of the National Guard, drawn up on the Boulevard du Temple, when an explosion resembling a discharge of musketry took place from the window of a house overlooking the road. Fourteen persons were killed on the spot. A shower of bullets had been discharged by a machine consisting of twenty-five barrels, which, arranged side by side horizontally upon a frame, could be fired at once by a train of gunpowder. The king was unhurt. [The Corsican who attempted this wholesale massacre was wounded by the bursting of one of the barrels, and arrested.] Another attempt was made on the life of Louis Philippe in 1836 by a man by the name of Alibaud, who fired into the king's carriage, the queen and his sister being with him. A third attempt was made in the same year by another desperado named Meunier. . . . There is nothing more remarkable than the extraordinary escapes of Louis Philippe, as if he bore a charmed life.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 21, p. 374.

361. ———. Queen Victoria. [In 1840, the year of her marriage, she was riding up Constitution Hill in an open carriage, with Prince Albert, when a pistol was fired at them, and in about half a minute there was a discharge of a second pistol. Neither of the royal couple were injured.] The youth named Oxford, who had committed this atrocious crime, was a barman at a public house.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 24.

362. ———. Queen Victoria. On the 30th of May [1842] John Francis, a young man under twenty years of age, fired a pistol at the queen as she was coming down Constitution Hill, in a barouche and four, accompanied by Prince Albert. Her Majesty, thinking of others rather than herself, desired that none of the ladies in waiting should accompany her in her ride, which she would not forego for ambiguous threats that had reached the ears of the police. Francis was found guilty of high treason, and received the usual capital sentence, which was commuted into transportation for life. On the 3d of July a deformed youth, named John William Bean, presented a pistol at her Majesty, but being seized by a bystander, was prevented from firing it. [This was the third attempt within two years.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 27, p. 497.

363. ASSASSINATION, Conspiracy for. British Cabinet. [In 1820 twenty-four persons entered into a conspiracy to assassinate all the members of the British Cabinet while at a Cabinet dinner. Hand grenades were to be thrown under the table, and any who escaped from them were to be despatched with the sword. The plot was betrayed, and five of its members arrested and executed.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 9, p. 161.

364. ASSASSINATION, Deliverance by. Henry III. of France. This cruel and dissolute tyrant continued to reign for fifteen years. His kingdom was at length delivered from him by the hand of a fanatic enthusiast. Jacques Clement, a Jacobin monk, actuated by the belief that he was doing an act of consummate piety, insinuated himself into the palace, and stabbed the king with a knife in the belly. The assassin was put to death on the spot by the king's guards, and Henry died in a few days of the wound.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 27.

365. ASSASSINATION, Escape from. Abraham Lincoln. [On the 22d of February he reached Harrisburg, on his way to Washington, where he was to be inaugurated.] The next morning the whole country was surprised to learn that he had arrived in Washington twelve hours sooner than he had originally intended . . . a small gang of assassins, under the leadership of an Italian who assumed the name of Orsini, had arranged to take his life during his passage through Baltimore.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 5, p. 158.

366. ASSASSINATION, Fear of. Cromwell. Cromwell had himself thought for some years that he should perish by assassination. He wore a cuirass under his clothes, and carried defensive arms within reach of his hand. He never slept long in the same room in the palace, continually changing his bedchamber, to mislead domestic treason and military plots. A despot, he suffered the punishment of tyranny. The unseen weight of the hatred which he had accumulated weighed upon his imagination and disturbed his sleep. The least murmuring in the army appeared to him like the presage of a rebellion against his power. Sometimes he punished, sometimes he caressed those of his lieutenants whom he suspected would revolt.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 67.

367. ASSASSINATION, General. Ireland. The Irish Roman Catholics had judged these turbulent times a fit season for asserting the independency of their country, and shaking off the English yoke. From a detestable abuse of the two best of motives, religion and liberty, they were incited to one of the most horrible attempts recorded in the annals of history. They conspired to assassinate, in one day, all the Protestants in Ireland, and the design was hardly surmised in England till above forty thousand had been put to the sword.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 19.

368. ASSASSINATION, Justified. Philip of Greece. While engaged in celebrating a magnificent festival on the marriage of his daughter Cleopatra with the King of Epirus, and walking in solemn procession to the temple, he was struck to the heart with a dagger by Pausanias, a noble youth who had been brutally injured by Attalus, the brother-in-law of Philip, and to whom that prince had refused to do justice. Philip had in the latter period of his reign degraded himself by some strong acts of tyranny, the fruit of an uncontrolled indulgence of vicious appetites.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4.

369. ASSASSINATION, Patriotic. Cæsar. Brutus had been proclaimed Prætor of the city, with the promise of the Consulship. But the discontented remnants of the Senatorial party assailed him with constant reproaches. The name of Brutus, dear to all Roman patriots, was made a rebuke to him. "His ancestor expelled the Tarquins; could he sit quietly under a king's rule?" At the foot of the statue of that ancestor, or on his own prætorian tribunal, notes were placed containing phrases such as these: "Thou art not Brutus: would thou wert," "Brutus, thou sleepest," "Awake, Brutus." Gradually he was brought to think that it was his duty as a patriot to put an end to Cæsar's rule, even by taking his life.—LIDDELL'S ROME, p. 700.

370. ASSASSINATION, Peril of. Cromwell. "Yet is their strength labor and sorrow," this, after all, must be said even of this great and most successful man. Our conception of him is such that we can well believe he longed to be at rest. It was an amazing work, that in which he was the actor; but with what toil and endurance and sleepless energy had he to travail day and night! The honor of knighthood and £500 a year forever was offered by a proclamation, by Charles Stuart, from his vile and filthy court in Paris, to any one who would take the life of the Protector; and there were many in England who longed to see the mighty monarch dethroned. In his palace chambers lived his noble mother, nearly ninety, now trembling at every sound, lest it be some ill to her noble and royal son.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 17.

371. ASSASSINATION, Remarkable. Cæsar. Antony, who was in attendance, was detained, as had been arranged, by Trebonius. Cæsar entered, and took his seat. His presence awed men, in spite of themselves, and the conspirators had determined to act at once, lest they should lose courage to act at all. He was familiar and easy of access. They gathered round him. He knew them all. There was not one from whom he had not a right to expect some sort of gratitude, and the movement suggested no suspicion. One had a story to tell him; another some favor to ask. Tullius Cimber, whom he had just made governor of Bithynia, then came close to him, with some request which he was unwilling to grant. Cimber caught his gown, as if in entreaty, and dragged it from his shoulders. Cassius, who was standing behind, stabbed him in the throat. He started up with a cry, and caught Cassius's arm. Another pontiard entered his breast, giving a mortal wound. He looked round, and seeing not one friendly face, but only a ring of daggers pointing at him, he drew his gown over his head, gathered the folds about him that he might fall decently, and sank down without uttering another word.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 26.

372. ASSASSINS, Hatred of. Cæsar's. Antony, as Consul, rose to pronounce the funeral oration. He ran through the chief acts of Cæsar's life, recited his will, and then spoke of the death which had rewarded him. To make this more vividly present to the excitable Italians, he displayed a waxen image marked with the three-and-twenty wounds, and produced the very robe which he had worn all rent and blood-stained. Soul-stirring dirges added to the solemn horror of the scene. . . . That impression was instantaneous. The Senator friends of the Liberators who had attended the ceremony looked on in moody silence.

Soon the menacing gestures of the crowd make them look to their safety. They fled; and the multitude insisted on burning the body, as they had burnt the body of Clodius, in the sacred precincts of the Forum. Some of the veterans who attended the funeral set fire to the bier; benches and firewood heaped round it soon made a sufficient pile. From the blazing pyre the crowd rushed, eager for vengeance, to the houses of the conspirators. But all had fled betimes. One poor wretch fell a victim to the fury of the mob—Helvius Cinna, a poet who had devoted his art to the service of the Dictator. He was mistaken for L. Cornelius Cinna the Prætor, and torn to pieces before the mistake could be explained.—LIDDELL'S ROME, p. 707.

373. ASSASSINS, Infamous. Booth's Conspiracy. Three days after the evacuation of Richmond by Lee's army the President visited that city, conferred with the authorities, and then returned to Washington. On the evening of the 14th of April he attended Ford's Theatre with his wife and a party of friends. As the play drew near its close a disreputable actor, named John Wilkes Booth, stole unnoticed into the President's box, levelled a pistol at his head, and shot him through the brain. Mr. Lincoln fell forward in his seat, was borne from the building, lingered in an unconscious state until the following morning, and died. It was the greatest tragedy of modern times—the most wicked, atrocious, and diabolical murder known in American history. . . . At the same hour another murderer, named Lewis Payne Powell, burst into the bed-chamber of Secretary Seward, sprang upon the couch of the sick man, stabbed him nigh unto death, and made his escape into the night. . . . On the 26th of April Booth was found . . . refusing to surrender, he was shot. . . . Powell was caught, convicted, and hanged. His fellow-conspirators, David E. Herold and George A. Atzerott, together with Mrs. Mary E. Surratt, at whose house the plot was formed, were also condemned and executed. Michael O'Laughlin, Dr. Samuel A. Mudd, and Samuel Arnold were sentenced to imprisonment for life, and Edward Spangler for a term of six years.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 66.

374. ASSASSINS, Religious. Persia. The extirpation of the Assassins or Ismaelians of Persia may be considered as a service to mankind. Among the hills to the south of the Caspian these odious sectaries had reigned with impunity above a hundred and sixty years. . . . With the fanaticism of the Koran, the Ismaelians had blended the Indian transmigration and the visions of their own prophets; and it was their first duty to devote their souls and bodies in blind obedience to the vicar of God. The daggers of his missionaries were felt both in the East and West; the Christians and the Moslems enumerate and persons multiply the illustrious victims that were sacrificed to the zeal, avarice, or resentment of the old man (as he was corruptly styled) of the mountain. But these daggers, his only arms, were broken by the sword of Hologou, and not a vestige is left of the enemies of mankind, except the word assassin, which, in the most odious sense, has been adopted in the languages of Europe.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 64.

375. ASSEMBLIES interdicted, Religious. England. [During the reign of Charles II., in 1664, Parliament enacted] that if five or more persons besides the household were present at any assembly, under color or pretence of any exercise of religion, in other manner than is allowed by the Liturgy or practice of the Church of England, every person so present should be liable to certain fines, imprisonment, or transportation. [Some dared not pray in their families when several visitors were present, or even ask grace at the table.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 16, p. 267.

376. ASSESSMENTS, Political. Rom. Emp. Mæventius. The wealth of Rome supplied an inexhaustible fund for his vain and prodigal expenses, and the ministers of his revenue were skilled in the arts of rapine. It was under his reign that the method of exacting a free gift from the senators was first invented; and as the sum was insensibly increased, the pretences of levying it—a victory, a birth, a marriage, or an imperial consulship—were proportionably multiplied.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 14.

377. ASSISTANCE, Energetic. Pompey. Bibulus opposed Cæsar, and Cato prepared to support Bibulus in the most strenuous manner; when Cæsar placed Pompey by him upon the tribunal, and asked him, before the whole assembly, "Whether he approved his laws?" and upon his answering in the affirmative, he put this further question: "Then, if any one shall with violence oppose these laws, will you come to the assistance of the people?" Pompey answered, "I will certainly come; and against those that threaten to take the sword, I will bring both sword and buckler."—PLUTARCH.

378. ASSOCIATES, Dangerous. John Howard's Son. The immediate cause of the ruin of young Howard was the servant who accompanied his father on his philanthropic journeys. This servant, by his assiduous attention to his master, had won his complete confidence, and he was the constant playmate of his son during his vacations. The two young fellows were equally averse to Howard's precise and rigid ways, and combined their ingenuity in evading the rules of his house. The servant early initiated the lad into the low vices of London, and accompanied him on many a midnight prowl. The youth took to vicious pleasures with fatal readiness, and he was ruined past remedy before his father suspected that he had gone astray. Diseases contracted in the lowest dens of infamy were treated with remedies so powerful as to impair his constitution and plant within him the seeds of insanity. His college career was one of wild riot and debauchery. [He died while young.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 71.

379. ASSOCIATES, Impure. Sir I. Newton. His most intimate friend at the university was a foreign chemist of much note and skill. Newton enjoyed his conversation exceedingly, until one day the Italian told him a "loose story of a nun," which so much offended his sense of decency that he would never associate with him again.—PAR-TON'S NEWTON, p. 89.

380. ASSOCIATES, Influence of. Peter the Great. An acquaintance with a young foreigner of the name of Le Fort, by birth a Swiss and a man of penetrating genius, infused those first ideas of improvement into the mind of the czar, and gave birth to a variety of designs for the cultivation and refinement of his people. The first objects of his attention were the army and the marine.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 35.

381. ASSOCIATION, Guild of. England, 1214-1216. The merchant-guild was the outcome of a tendency to closer association, which found support in those principles of mutual aid and mutual restraint that lay at the base of our old institutions. Guilds or clubs for religious, charitable, or social purpose were common throughout the country, and especially common in boroughs, where men clustered more thickly together. Each formed a sort of artificial family. An oath of mutual fidelity among its members was substituted for the tie of blood, while the guild-feast, held once a month in the common hall, replaced the gathering of the kinsfolk round their family hearth. But within this new family the aim of the guild was to establish a mutual responsibility as close as that of the old. "Let all share the same lot," ran its law; "if any misdo, let all bear it." A member could look for aid from his guild-brothers in atoning for guilt incurred by mishap. He could call on them for assistance in case of violence or wrong. If falsely accused, they appeared in court as his compurgators; if poor, they supported, and when dead, they buried him. On the other hand, he was responsible to them, as they were to the State, for order and obedience to the laws. A wrong of brother against brother was also a wrong against the general body of the guild, and was punished by fine or in the last resort by an expulsion, which left the offender a "lawless" man and an outcast.—HIST. ENG. PEOPLE, § 169.

382. ASSOCIATION, Beneficial. Marcus Aurelius. "The wisest of the pagans." He was not born heir to the imperial throne, but was the son of private persons of patrician rank, who were related to the Emperor Adrian. His father dying when he was only a child, he was adopted by his grandfather, and this brought him into nearer intimacy with the emperor, who became warmly attached to him, greatly admiring his good-nature, his docility, and his artless candor. His early education appears to have been conducted with equal care and wisdom. "To the gods," he says, "I am indebted for having had good grandfathers, good parents, a good sister, good teachers, good associates, good kinsmen and friends—nearly everything good."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 541.

383. ASSOCIATIONS, Protective. Anglo-Saxons. Many of the inferior rank of citizens entered into associations, and subscribed a bond, obliging themselves to be faithful to each other in all cases of danger to any one of the confederates; to protect his person, to revenge his wrongs, to pay the fines which he might incur through accident, and to contribute to his funeral charges. This last practice, as well as the connection of client and patron, are strong proof of the imperfection of laws, and of a weak administration. Only to remedy such evils would men have recurred to these connections and associations.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 6.

384. ASSUMPTION, Boastful. Disabul the Turk. If I condescend to march against those contemptible slaves [the Romans], they will tremble at the sound of our whips; they will be trampled, like a nest of ants, under the feet of my innumerable cavalry. . . . From the rising to the setting sun, the earth is my inheritance. . . . The pride of the great khan survived his resentment; and when he announced an important conquest to his friend the Emperor Maurice, he styled himself the master of the seven races, and the lord of the seven climates of the world.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 42.

385. ASTROLOGY, Regard for. Omens. The vices which degrade the moral character of the Romans are mixed with a puerile superstition that disgraces their understanding. They listen with confidence to the predictions of haruspices, who pretend to read, in the entrails of victims, the signs of future greatness and prosperity; and there are many who do not presume either to bathe, or to dine, or to appear in public, till they have diligently consulted, according to the rules of astrology, the situation of Mercury and the aspect of the moon.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31.

386. ASTRONOMY, Anticipations in. B. C. 640. Thales made some bold and fortunate conjectures in the science of astronomy. He conjectured the earth to be a sphere, and that it revolved round the sun. He believed the fixed stars to be so many suns encircled with other planets like our earth; he believed the moon's light to be a reflection of the sun's from a solid surface; and if we may trust the testimony of ancient authors, he was able to calculate eclipses, and actually predicted that famous eclipse of the sun six hundred and one years before the birth of Christ, which separated the armies of the Medes and Lydians at the moment of an engagement.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9.

387. ASYLUM of Refuge. Rome. As soon as the foundation of the city was laid, they opened a place of refuge for fugitives, which they called the Temple of the Asylæan god. Here they received all that came, and would neither deliver up the slave to his master, the debtor to his creditor, nor the murderer to the magistrate, declaring that they were directed by the oracle of Apollo to preserve the asylum from all violation. Thus the city was soon peopled.—PLUTARCH.

388. ATHLETE, Remarkable. Thracian. The Emperor Severus . . . halted in Thrace to celebrate, with military games, the birthday of his younger son, Geta. The country flocked in crowds to behold their sovereign, and a young barbarian of gigantic stature earnestly solicited, in his rude dialect, that he might be allowed to contend for the prize of wrestling. . . . He was matched with the stoutest followers of the camp, sixteen of whom he successively laid on the ground. His victory was rewarded by some trifling gifts, and a permission to enlist in the troops. . . . As soon as he perceived that he had attracted the emperor's notice, he instantly ran up to his horse, and followed him on foot, without the least appearance of fatigue, in a long and rapid career. "Thracian," said Severus, with astonishment, "art thou disposed to wrestle after thy race?" "Most willingly, sir," replied the unwearied youth; and, almost in a breath, overthrew seven of the strongest soldiers in the army. A gold collar was the prize of his matchless vigor and activity, and he was immediately appointed to serve in the horse-guards who always attended on the person of the sovereign.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 7.

389. ATHLETE, Royal. Henry II. of France. Henry II. ascended the throne in the twenty-ninth year of his age . . . his sole accomplishment consisted in a remarkable expertness in bodily exercises.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 15, § 1.

390. ATTACK, Inconsiderate. Crusaders. Godfrey of Bouillon erected his standard on the first swell of Mount Calvary; to the left, as far as St. Stephen's gate, the line of attack was continued by Tancred and the two Roberts; and Count Raymond established his quarters from the citadel to the foot of Mount Sion, which was no longer included within the precincts of the city. On the fifth day the Crusaders made a general assault, in the fanatic hope of battering down the walls without engines, and of scaling them without ladders. By the dint of brutal force they burst the first barrier; but they were driven back with shame and slaughter to the camp.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58.

391. ATTACK, Unexpected. From above. [At the battle of Hastings] the Norman allies with their bows shot quickly upon the English; but they covered themselves with their shields. . . . Then the Normans determined to shoot their arrows upward into the air, so that they might fall on their enemies' heads, and strike their faces. The archers adopted this scheme . . . and the arrows, in falling, struck their heads and faces, and put out the eyes of many; and all feared to open their eyes, or leave their faces unguarded. The arrows now flew thicker than rain. . . . Then it was that an arrow, that had thus shot upward, struck Harold above his right eye, and put it out. In his agony he drew the arrow and threw it away, breaking it with his hands; and the pain to his head was so great that he leaned upon his shield.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 330.

392. AUDACITY, Brazen. Catiline. We are astonished when we read that animated oration of Cicero [denouncing the conspiracy of Catiline], the first against Catiline; and know that the traitor had the audacity to sit in the Senate-house while it was delivered, and while every man of worth or regard for character deserted the bench on which he sat, and left him a spectacle to the whole assembly.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 1.

393. AUDACITY, Deceived by. Napoleon I. A. D. 1796. [In the Italian campaign Napoleon suddenly found himself and one thousand soldiers in the presence of a detached body of four thousand Austrians. A blindfolded flag of truce demanded immediate surrender. Napoleon mounted his staff. The bandage was removed.] "What means this insult?" exclaimed Napoleon, in tones of affected indignation. "Have you the insolence to bring a summons of surrender to the French commander-in-chief, in the middle of his Army! Say to those who sent you that in less than five minutes they lay down their arms, or every man shall be put to death." The bewildered officer stammered out an apology. "Go!" said Napoleon, sternly. . . . The Austrians threw down their arms . . . missed making [Napoleon] prisoner.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON I., vol. 1, ch. 6.

394. AUDACITY of Desperation. Florida Indians. [Jackson's administration proposed to remove them from their Florida homes to a reservation beyond the Mississippi.] Osceola, with a band of warriors, prowling around Fort King, on the Ocklawaha, surrounded a storehouse where General Thompson was dining with a company of friends. The savages poured in a murderous fire, and then rushed forward and scalped the dead before the garrison of the fort, only two hundred and fifty yards away, could bring assistance. Thompson's body was pierced by fifteen balls, and four of his nine companions were killed.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 53.

395. AUGURY, Book of. Chinese. The oldest and most respectable in point of authority is the book or table of Yking. This Yking, which has been held as a mysterious receptacle of the most profound knowledge, and is on that account allowed in China to be consulted only by the sect of the learned, is now known to be nothing else than a superstitious and childish device for fortune-telling or divination. It is a table on which there are sixty-four marks or lines, one half short, and the other half long, placed at regular intervals. The person who consults the Yking for divining some future event takes a number of small pieces of rod, and, throwing them down at random, observes carefully how their accidental position corresponds to the marks on the table, from which, according to certain established rules, he predicts either good or bad fortune. These rules, it is said, were laid down by the great Confucius, the chief of the Chinese philosophers—a circumstance which does not tend to increase his reputation. The Jesuit missionaries, who could not root out these prejudices, thought it their best policy to turn them to advantage; and in endeavoring to propagate the doctrines of Christianity, they pretended that Confucius had actually predicted the coming of the Messiah by this table of the Yking.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 24.

396. AUGURY, Building by. City of Rome. While [Romulus and Remus] were intent upon building, a dispute soon arose about the place. Romulus having built a square, which he called Rome, would have the city there; but Remus marked out a more secure situation on Mount Aventine, which, from him, was called Remonium. . . . The dispute was referred to the decision of augury; and for this purpose they sat down in the open air, when Remus, as they tell us, saw six vultures, and Romulus twice as many. . . . Hence the Romans, in their divination by the flight of birds, chiefly regard the vulture; though Herodotus of Pontus relates, that Hercules used to rejoice when a vulture appeared to him when he was going upon any great action. This was, probably, because it is a creature the least mischievous of any, pernicious neither to corn, plants, nor cattle. It only feeds upon dead carcasses; but neither kills nor preys upon anything that has life. As for birds, it does not touch them, even when dead, because they are of its own nature; while eagles, owls, and hawks tear and kill their own kind.—PLUTARCH'S LIVES.

397. AUSTERITY, Example of. Younger Cato. Cato saw that a great reformation was wanting in the manners and customs of his country, and for that reason he determined to go contrary to the corrupt fashions which then obtained. He observed that the richest and most lively purple was the thing most worn, and therefore he went in black. Nay, he often appeared in public after dinner barefooted and without his gown. Not that he affected to be talked of for that singularity; but he did it by way of learning to be ashamed of nothing but what was really shameful, and not to regard what depended only on the estimation of the world.—PLUTARCH.

398. AUSTERITY, Monkish. In Egypt. Every sensation that is offensive to man was thought acceptable to God; and the angelic rule of Tabenne condemned the salutary custom of bathing the limbs in water and of anointing them with oil. The austere monks slept on the ground, on a hard mat or a rough blanket; and the same bundle of palm-leaves served them as a seat in the day and a pillow in the night. Their original cells were low, narrow huts, built of the slightest materials. [A.D. 370.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 37, p. 531.

399. AUSTERITY vs. Profligacy. Stuarts Restored. Many, too, who had been disgusted by the austerity and hypocrisy of the Pharisees of the Commonwealth, began to be still more disgusted by the open profligacy of the court and of the Cavaliers, and were disposed to doubt whether the sullen preciseness of Praise God Barebones might not be preferable to the outrageous profaneness and licentiousness of the Buckinghams and Sedleys. Even immoral men, who were not utterly destitute of sense and public spirit, complained that the government treated the most serious matters as trifles, and made trifles its serious business.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2.

400. AUSTERITY, Religious. Rev. John Newton. [William Cowper advised with him.] Newton would not have sanctioned any poetry which had not a distinctly religious object, and he received an assurance from the poet that the lively passages were introduced only as honey on the rim of the medicinal cup, to commend its healing contents to the lips of a giddy world. The Rev. John Newton must have been exceedingly austere if he thought that the quantity of honey used was excessive.—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 4.

401. ———. Priscillianists. [Reign of Theodosius the Great.] If the Priscillianists violated the laws of nature, it was not by the licentiousness, but by the austerity, of their lives. They absolutely condemned the use of the marriage-bed; and the peace of families was often disturbed by indiscreet separations. They enjoyed, or recommended, a total abstinence from all animal food; and their continual prayers, fasts, and vigils inculcated a rule of strict and perfect devotion. The speculative tenets of the sect concerning the person of Christ and the nature of the human soul were derived from the Gnostic and Manichean system. . . . The obscure disciples of Priscillian suffered, languished, and gradually disappeared; his tenets were rejected by the clergy and people. — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 27.

402. — — —. Monks. A.D. 370. They wrapped their heads in a cowl, to escape the sight of profane objects; their legs and feet were naked, except in the extreme cold of winter; and their slow and feeble steps were supported by a long staff. The aspect of a genuine anchorite was horrid and disgusting; every sensation that is offensive to man was thought acceptable to God; and the angelic rule of Tabenne condemned the salutary custom of bathing the limbs in water. . . . They slept on the ground, on a hard mat or a rough blanket. . . . Their original cells were low, narrow huts. . . . Pleasure and guilt were synonymous terms. — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 37.

403. AUTHOR, Humiliated. Frederick the Great. He had sent a large quantity of verses to Voltaire, and requested that they might be returned with remarks and correction. "See," exclaimed Voltaire, "what a quantity of his dirty linen the king has sent me to wash!" Talebearers were not wanting to carry the sarcasm to the royal ear, and Frederick was much incensed. — MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 6.

404. AUTHOR, Rapid. Samuel Johnson. The rapidity with which this work was composed is a wonderful circumstance. Johnson has been heard to say: "I wrote forty-eight of the printed octavo pages of the Life of Savage at a sitting; but then I sat up all night." — BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 41.

405. AUTHOR, The unnoticed. Samuel Johnson. He said he expected to be attacked on account of his "Lives of the Poets." "However," said he, "I would rather be attacked than unnoticed. For the worst thing you can do to an author is to be silent as to his works. An assault upon a town is a bad thing, but starving it is still worse; an assault may be unsuccessful—you may have more men killed than you kill—but if you starve the town, you are sure of victory." — BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 407.

406. AUTHORITY, Absolute. Military. Experience has fully proved that in war every operation, from the greatest to the smallest, ought to be under the absolute direction of one mind, and that every subordinate agent, in his degree, ought to obey implicitly, strenuously, and with the show of cheerfulness, orders which he disapproves, or of which the reasons are kept secret from him. Representative assemblies, public discussions, and all the other checks by which, in civil affairs, rulers are restrained from abusing power, are out of place in a camp. Machiavel justly imputed many of the disasters of Venice and Florence to the jealousy which led those republics to interfere with every act of their generals. The Dutch practice of sending to an army deputies, without whose consent no great blow could be struck, was almost equally pernicious. — MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5.

407. — — —. Early Romans. The children imbibed from their infancy the highest veneration for their parents, who, from the extent of the paternal power among the Romans, had an unlimited authority over their wives, their offspring, and their slaves. It is far from natural to the human mind that the possession of power and authority should form a tyrannical disposition. Where that authority, indeed, has been usurped by violence, its possessor may, perhaps, be tempted to maintain it by tyranny; but where it is either a right dictated by nature, or the easy effect of circumstances and situation, the very consciousness of authority is apt to inspire a beneficence and humanity in the manner of exercising it. Thus we find the ancient Romans, although absolute sovereigns in their families, with the jus vitæ et necis, the right of life and death over their children and their slaves, were yet excellent husbands, kind and affectionate parents, humane and indulgent masters. Nor was it until luxury had corrupted the virtuous simplicity of the ancient manners, that this paternal authority, degenerating into tyrannical abuses, required to be abridged in its power and restrained in its exercise by the enactment of laws. By an apparent contradiction, so long as the paternal authority was absolute, the slaves and children were happy; when it became weakened and abridged, then it was that its terrors were, from the excessive corruption of manners, most severely felt. — TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 13.

408. — — —. Turks. It is a part of the policy of the empire that a certain number of young men should be educated in the seraglio, out of whom the sultan chooses his principal officers. But what is a very extraordinary piece of policy, if we may believe Rycout, it is necessary that these youths should be of Christian parents. . . . He says that the Christian slaves, strangers in the empire, will necessarily have fewer connections or dependents on their interest, and be the better disposed to an absolute submission to the will of their master. One thing is certain, it is a fundamental maxim of the Turkish polity, that the servants of the prince should be such as he can entirely command, and can at any time destroy without danger to himself. — TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 13.

409. AUTHORITY acknowledged. Franks in Gaul. The king had no more than a single suffrage, equally with the meanest soldier; and it was only when actually in the field, or when it was necessary to enforce military discipline, that he ventured to exercise anything like authority. This is strongly exemplified in a story which is recorded of Clovis I. After the battle of Soissons, a large vessel of silver was part of the booty; Clovis, being informed that it had been carried off from the church of Rheims, asked permission of the army to take it, that he might restore it to the church. A soldier, standing by, struck the vessel with his battle-axe, and with great rudeness desired the king to rest satisfied with the share that should fall to his lot. Clovis durst not, at the time, resent this insolence, for all were then upon an equal footing; but he knew the privilege which he had when military discipline was to be enforced, and took advantage of it; for some time afterward observing the same soldier to be negligent in the care of his arms, he called him out of his rank, and charging him with his offence, cut him down with his battle-axe. There was not a murmur heard, for Clovis had not exceeded the limits of his authority. — TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 2.

410. AUTHORITY assumed. Cromwell. [His dissolution of Parliament.] The President, worthy of his office by his courage, commanded him [Cromwell] to be silent. Wentworth, one of the most illustrious and influential of the extreme party by his personal character, demanded that he should be called to order. "This language," said he, "is as extraordinary as criminal in the mouth of a [Cromwell] man who yesterday possessed our entire confidence, whom we have honored with the highest functions of the republic! of a man who—" Cromwell would not suffer him to conclude. "Go to! go to!" exclaimed he in a voice of thunder; "we have had enough of words like these. It is time to put an end to all this, and to silence these babblers!" Then, advancing to the middle of the hall, and placing his hat on his head with a gesture of defiance, he stamped upon the floor, and cried aloud, "You are no longer a Parliament! You shall not sit here a single hour longer! Make room for better men than yourselves!" At these words Harrison, instructed by a glance from the general, disappeared, and returned in a moment after at the head of thirty soldiers, veterans of the long civil wars, who surrounded Cromwell with their naked weapons. These men, hired by the Parliament, hesitated not at the command of their leader to turn their arms against those who had placed them in their hands, and furnished another example, following the Rubicon of Cæsar, to prove the incompatibility of freedom with standing armies. "Miserable wretches!" resumed Cromwell, as if violence without insult was insufficient for his anger, "you call yourselves a Parliament! You!—no, you are nothing but a mass of tipplers and libertines! Thou," he continued, pointing with his finger to the most notorious profligates in the assembly, as they passed him in their endeavors to escape from the hall, "thou art a drunkard! Thou art an adulterer! And thou art a hireling, paid for thy speeches! You are all scandalous sinners, who bring shame on the gospel! And you fancied yourselves a fitting Parliament for God's people! No, no, begone! let me hear no more of you! The Lord rejects you!" During these apostrophes the members, forced by the soldiers, were driven or dragged from the hall.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 61.

411. AUTHORITY, Dependence on. Unwise. [John Howard's only son became a dissolute man.] [See No. 378.] Howard was exceedingly particular with regard to the diet of the boy, and careful to inure him to hardship. This, too, was an excellent thing, but he did not carry it out wisely. He purposely forbore all explanation of his rules and denials. He never thought it right to say to the child, "My son, these pears will make you sick if you eat many of them, or eat them at improper times." He merely said, "Jack, never touch a pear unless I give it to you." If the boy yielded to the temptation afforded by a garden full of fruit, he would place him in a seat and command him not to stir or speak until he should give him permission. Such was his ascendancy over the child, that once when he had given him such an order and had forgotten all about it, he found the child, four hours after, in the precise spot where he had placed him, fast asleep.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 69.

412. AUTHORITY by Gentleness. Joan of Arc. For this great force to act with efficiency, the one essential and indispensable requisite, unity of action, was wanting. Had skill and intelligence sufficed to impart it, the want would have been supplied by Dunois; but there was something more required—authority, and more than royal authority, too, for the king's captains were little in the habit of obeying the king; to subject these savage, untamable spirits, God's authority was called for. Now, the God of this age was the Virgin much more than Christ; and it behooved that the Virgin should descend upon earth, be a popular Virgin, young, beauteous, gentle, bold. . . . It was at once a risible and a touching sight to see the sudden conversion of the old Armagnac brigands. They did not reform by halves. [General] La Hire durst no longer swear; and the Pucelle [Joan] took compassion on the violence he did himself, and allowed him to swear "by his baton." The devils found themselves all of a sudden turned into little saints.—MICHELET'S JOAN OF ARC, p. 12.

413. AUTHORITY, Imprudence with. Charles I. The Commons found a considerable opposition to the extreme violence of their measures from the House of Peers. . . . The Commons framed an impeachment of the whole bench of bishops, as endeavoring to subvert the constitution of Parliament, and they were all committed to custody. These measures had the effect for which, it is presumable, they were intended. The patience of Charles was entirely exhausted, and he was impelled to a violent exertion of authority. The attorney-general, by the king's command, impeached five members of the House of Commons, among whom were John Hampden, Pym, and Holles, the chiefs of the popular party. A sergeant being sent, without effect, to demand them of the Commons, the king, to the surprise of everybody, went in person to the House to seize them. They had notice of his intention, and had withdrawn. The Commons justly proclaimed this attempt a breach of privilege. The streets re-echoed with the clamors of the populace, and a general insurrection was prognosticated. The king acknowledged his error by a humiliating message to the House; but the submission was as ineffectual as the violence had been imprudent.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 29.

414. AUTHORITY, Necessary. Military. [The Scots invited the return of Charles II., and were defeated by the army of Cromwell.] It certainly does appear that David Leslie, the commander of the Scots at Dunbar, found his hands tied by a committee; and any kind of battle anywhere may be lost, but, probably, no battle of any kind was ever gained by a committee. The English army reached Dunbar. . . . the 1st of September, 1650.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 12.

415. AUTHORITY, Personal. American Indians. The Indian chief has no crown. . . . The bounds of his authority float with the current opinion of the tribe; he is not so much obeyed as followed with the alacrity of free volition; and therefore the extent of his power depends on his personal character.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

416. AUTHORITY, Popular. Charles I. [During the agitation which resulted in the overthrow of the king and the establishment of the Commonwealth] the insolence of several members of the House of Commons, which burst forth in evident violation of his dignity and royal prerogative, left him no choice between the shameful abandonment of his title as king or an energetic vindication of his rights. He went down himself to the House, to cause the arrest of those members who were guilty of high treason, and called upon the president to point them out. "Sire," replied he, kneeling, "in the place that I occupy I have only eyes to see and a tongue to speak according to the will of the house I serve. I therefore humbly crave your Majesty's pardon for venturing to disobey you." Charles, humiliated, retired with his guards.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 27.

417. AUTHORITY, Supreme. Joan of Arc. The two authorities, the paternal and the celestial, enjoined her two opposite commands. The one ordered her to remain obscure, modest, and laboring; the other to set out and save the kingdom. The angel bade her arm herself. Her father, rough and honest peasant as he was, swore that, rather than his daughter should go away with men-at-arms, he would drown her with his own hands. One or other, disobey she must. Beyond a doubt this was the greatest battle she was called upon to fight; those against the English were play in comparison.—MICHELET'S JOAN OF ARC, p. 6.

418. AUTHORSHIP, Anxieties of. Samuel Johnson. My book [the dictionary] is now coming in luminis oras. What will be its fate I know not, nor think much, because thinking is to no purpose. It must stand the censure of the great vulgar and the small; of those that understand it, and that understand it not. But in all this, I suffer not alone; every writer has the same difficulties, and, perhaps, every writer talks of them more than he thinks.—BOSWELL'S JOHN-SON, p. 75.

419. AUTHORSHIP imputed. Posthumous Fragments of Margaret Nicholson. Hogg found him one day busily engaged in correcting proofs of some original poems. Shelley asked his friend what he thought of them, and Hogg answered that it might be possible by a little alteration to turn them into capital burlesques. This idea took the young poet's fancy; and the friends between them soon effected a metamorphosis in Shelley's serious verses, by which they became unmistakably ridiculous. Having achieved their purpose, they now bethought them of the proper means of publication. Upon whom should the poems, a medley of tyrannicide and revolutionary raving, be fathered? Peg Nicholson, a mad washerwoman, had recently attempted George the Third's life with a carving-knife. No more fitting author could be found. They would give their pamphlet to the world as her work, edited by an admiring nephew. The printer appreciated the joke no less than the authors of it. He provided splendid paper and magnificent type; and before long the book of nonsense was in the hands of Oxford readers. It sold for the high price of half a crown a copy; and, what is hardly credible, the gowns-men received it as a genuine production. "It was indeed a kind of fashion to be seen reading it in public, as a mark of nice discernment, of a delicate and fastidious taste in poetry, and the best criterion of a choice spirit."—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 2.

420. AUTHORSHIP, Originality in. Thomas Jefferson. From the fulness of his own mind, without consulting one single book, Jefferson [thirty-three years old] drafted the Declaration [of American Independence], submitted it separately to Franklin and to John Adams, accepted from each of them one or two verbal, unimportant corrections . . . on the twenty-eighth of June reported it to Congress.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 70.

421. AUTHORSHIP, Qualified. The Stamp Act. Who was the author of the American stamp tax? At a later day Jenkinson [first Secretary of the Treasury] assured the House of Commons that, "if the Stamp Act was a good measure, the merit was not due to Grenville; if it was a bad one, the ill policy did not belong to him;" but he never confessed to the House where the blame or the merit could rest more justly. In his late old age he delighted to converse freely . . . save only on the one subject of the contest with America. [George Grenville] brought this scheme into form.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 8.

422. AUTHORSHIP, Reward of. John Milton. The agreement, still preserved in the National Museum, between the author, "John Milton, gent. of the one parte, and Samuel Symons, printer, of the other parte," is among the curiosities of our literary history. The curiosity consists not so much in the illustrious name appended (not in autograph) to the deed, as in the contrast between the present fame of the book and the waste-paper price at which the copyright is being valued. The author received £5 down; was to receive a second £5 when the first edition should be sold; a third £5 when the second; a fourth £5 when the third edition should be gone. Milton lived to receive the second £5, and no more—£10, in all, for "Paradise Lost." I cannot bring myself to join in the lamentations of the biographers over this bargain. Surely, it is better so; better to know that the noblest monument of English letters had no money value, than to think of it as having been paid for at a pound the line.—PATTISON'S MILTON, ch. 12.

423. AUTOCRAT, Military. Pompey. When Pompey commanded in the East, he rewarded his soldiers and allies, dethroned princes, divided kingdoms, founded colonies, and distributed the treasures of Mithridates. On his return to Rome he obtained, by a single act of the Senate and people, the universal ratification of all his proceedings. Such was the power over the soldiers and over the enemies of Rome, which was either granted to or assumed by the generals of the republic. They were, at the same time, the governors, or rather monarchs, of the conquered provinces, united the civil with the military character, administered justice as well as the finances, and exercised both the executive and legislative power of the State.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 3.

424. AUTOCRAT, Royal. Henry VIII. From 1515 to 1523 no Parliament was summoned. Henry [VIII.] and his great minister [Cardinal Wolsey] governed the kingdom at their sole will.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 17, p. 275.

425. AVARICE acquired. Samuel Johnson. It was observed, that avarice was inherent in some dispositions. JOHNSON: "No man was born a miser, because no man was born to possession. Every man is born cupidus—desirous of getting; but not avarus—desirous of keeping." BOSWELL: "I have heard old Mr. Sheridan maintain, with much ingenuity, that a complete miser is a happy man—a miser who gives himself wholly to the one passion of saving." JOHNSON: "That is flying in the face of all the world, who have called an avaricious man a miser, because he is miserable. No, sir; a man who both spends and saves money is the happiest man, because he has both enjoyments." —BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 390.

426. AVARICE of the Clergy. Fifteenth Century. [A. D. 1450–1485. The Church had shut the mouths of the boldest complainants.] The abbays might more and more appropriate the revenues that ought to be the reward of the parish-priest; the bishop might neglect his sacred functions, to add to his revenues the fees of the great offices of State, and, like Cardinal Beaufort, procure laws to be made against commercial freedom, and then receive large sums for licenses to violate them. Great spiritual lords might band themselves with great temporal lords to withdraw the funds of hospitals from their proper uses, and leave the old, the lazar, the lunatic, and the pregnant woman, for whose benefit those hospitals were endowed, to perish at their utmost need.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 8, p. 124.

427. AVARICE, Contempt for. Rufinus. [This Roman prefect was assassinated.] His avarice, which seems to have prevailed in his corrupt mind over every other sentiment, attracted the wealth of the East, by the various arts of partial and general extortion, oppressive taxes, scandalous bribery, immoderate fines, unjust confiscations, forced or fictitious testaments, by which the tyrant despoiled of their lawful inheritance the children of strangers or enemies; and the public sale of justice, as well as of favor, which he instituted in the palace of Constantinople. . . . His mangled body was abandoned to the brutal fury of the populace of either sex, who hastened in crowds, from every quarter of the city, to trample on the remains of the haughty minister, at whose frown they had so lately trembled. His right hand was cut off and carried through the streets of Constantinople, in cruel mockery, to extort contributions for the avaricious tyrant, whose head was publicly exposed, borne aloft on the point of a long lance.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 29.

428. AVARICE, Corrupted by. Romans. When the passion of avarice had, as at this time, pervaded all the ranks of the State, it is not wonderful that the public measures should be in the greatest degree mean and disgraceful. The ambition of conquest was now little else than the desire of rapine and plunder. If the allies of the State were opulent, the Romans considered their wealth as a sufficient reason for dissolving all treaties between them, and holding them as a lawful object of conquest. Thus the kingdoms of Numidia, of Pergamus, of Cappadocia, of Bithynia, separate sovereignties bound to the allegiance of the Romans by the most solemn treaties, were invaded as if they had been ancient and natural enemies, and reduced to the condition of conquered provinces. The Senate made a kind of traffic of thrones and governments, selling them openly to the highest bidder. [Plunder was the motive for war, and pretexes were invented.] The Romans engaging along with the Acarnanians against the people of Ætolia, had no other excuse to allege for their interference in this quarrel, than that the Acarnanians had performed a signal act of friendship to their ancestors about a thousand years before—which was, that they had joined the other Grecian States in sending troops to the siege of Troy!—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 6.

429. AVARICE, Criminal. London. [In 1837 the master-tailors were the most notorious for carelessness and avarice of all London employers. Some of them] would huddle sixty or eighty workmen close together, nearly knee to knee, in a room fifty feet by twenty feet broad, lighted from above, where the temperature in summer was thirty degrees higher than the temperature outside. Young men from the country fainted when they were first confined in such a life-destroying prison; the maturer ones sustained themselves by gin till they perished of consumption, or typhus, or delirium tremens. . . . The overworked class of milliners and dressmakers employed in the larger workshops of London, ill-ventilated, and rendered doubly injurious by the constant habit of night-work—this class of young women was being constantly renewed, more than one half dying of lung diseases before they had attained the average age of twenty-eight.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 22, p. 392.

430. AVARICE, Deception of. Henry VII. In October, 1491 [Henry VIII.], proclaimed his intention of publishing the French king. . . . Employing the pretence of war for extorting money under the system of "Benevolences" . . . he obtained a large grant from his faithful Lords and Commons, and procured several laws to be passed which gave encouragement to the prosecution of a war, which had become a national object. But having got the money, and encouraged many knights and nobles in raising men, he still delayed any active measures of hostility, through the spring, summer, and autumn of 1492. At length, in October, he landed at Calais with a well-appointed army. . . . But for three months previous to this costly parade the wily king had been negotiating a peace with Charles of France; and it appears in the highest degree probable that the treaty was actually signed when the English forces landed.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 13, p. 218.

431. AVARICE, Demands of. Henry VII. In March, 1496, he granted letters-patent to John Cabot and his two sons, to sail at their own cost and charges, with five ships, for the discovery of new countries, upon condition that the king should have a fifth of the profits. [In 1497 he gave £10] to him that found the new isle of Newfoundland.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15, p. 236.

432. AVARICE, Glory in. Cato the Censor. In his old age he became exceedingly avaricious, and gained a large fortune by methods which were legal, but not very honorable. He even uttered this sentiment: "That man truly wonderful and godlike, and fit to be registered in the lists of glory, is he by whose account-books it shall appear, after his death, that he had more than doubled what he had received from his ancestors."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOGRAPHY, p. 423.

433. AVARICE, Official. John of Cappadocia. [When the Roman general Belisarius went from Constantinople to the re-conquest of Carthage from the Vandals,] the troops were safely disembarked on the Messinian coast, to repose themselves for awhile after the fatigues of the sea. In this place they experienced how avarice invested with authority may sport with the lives of thousands which are bravely exposed for the public service. According to military practice, the bread or biscuit of the Romans was twice prepared in the oven, and the diminution of one fourth was cheerfully allowed for the loss of weight. To gain this miserable profit, and to save the expense of wood, the prefect, John of Cappadocia, had given orders that the flour should be slightly baked by the same fire which warmed the baths of Constantinople; and when the sacks were opened, a soft and mouldy paste was distributed to the army. Such unwholesome food, assisted by the heat of the climate and season, soon produced an epidemical disease, which swept away five hundred soldiers.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41, p. 122.

434. AVARICE punished. Crassus. The Parthians having conquered the Roman general Crassus, who invaded their country, the Parthian king is said to have poured into his mouth melted gold, saying, "Now be satiated with what thou covetedst through life."

435. AVARICE, Royal. Henry VIII. [A sum of £1500 had been seen in the accounts of Cardinal Wolsey. The dying man had been pressed to account for the money. He said he had borrowed it to distribute among his servants, and for his burial, and had placed it in the hands of an honest man.] The chief business of this magnanimous king, with Cavendish, was to obtain the knowledge where this treasure was hidden; and Cavendish told him, "Well then," quoth the king, "let me alone, and keep this gear secret between yourself and me, and let no man be privy thereof." He had broken the great heart of his faithful servant; but he thought only of the contents of the money-bags, to be appropriated to jewels for Lady Anne and to wagers with Domingo.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 20.

436. ———. William the Conqueror. One great end he never lost sight of, whether he worked by clemency or terror—the plunder of the land. "He had fallen into avarice, and greediness he loved withal." . . . It is a fearful and a disgusting history.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 14, p. 191.

437. ———. George II. The unkingly passion of avarice was predominant in his most trivial disbursements.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 4, p. 59.

438. AVARICE, Ruled by. Rom. Emp. Commodus. Avarice was the reigning passion of his soul and the great principle of his administration. The rank of Consul, of Patrician, of Senator, was exposed to public sale; and it would have been considered as disaffection if any one had refused to purchase these empty and disgraceful honors with the greatest part of his fortune. In the lucrative provincial employments the minister shared with the governor the spoils of the people. The execution of the laws was venal and arbitrary. A wealthy criminal might obtain, not only the reversal of the sentence by which he was justly condemned, but might likewise inflict whatever punishment he pleased on the accuser, the witnesses, and the judge.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4.

439. AVARICE, Shameful. Reign of James II. The property both of the rebels [under the Duke of Monmouth] who had suffered death, and of those more unfortunate men who were withering under the tropical sun [by banishment], was fought for and torn in pieces by a crowd of greedy informers. By law, a subject attainted of treason forfeits all his substance; and this law was enforced after the Bloody Assizes with a rigor at once cruel and ludicrous. The broken-hearted widows and destitute orphans of the laboring men whose corpses hung at the cross-roads were called upon by the agents of the Treasury to explain what had become of a basket, of a goose, of a fitch of bacon, of a keg of cider, of a sack of beans, of a truss of hay.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5.

440. AVARICE, Supremacy of. Confederates. It is a subject of extraordinary remark, that the struggle for our independence should have been attended by the ignoble circumstances of a commercial speculation in the South unparalleled in its heartlessness and selfish greed. War invariably excites avarice and speculation; it is the active promoter of rapid fortunes and corrupt commercial practices. . . . [This,] the only serious blot which defaced our struggle for independence, was, at least to some extent, the creature of circumstances; and that is lost . . . in the lustre of arms and virtues shed on the South in the most sublime trials of the war.—POLLARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 9, p. 237.

441. AWE, Effect of. Persian King. Sapor . . . as he passed under the walls of Amida, resolved to try whether the majesty of his presence would not awe the garrison into immediate submission. The sacrilegious insult of a random dart, which glanced against the royal tiara, convinced him of his error.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 19.

442. AWE, Silence of. Battle of the Nile. [At the battle of the Nile the l'Orient, of one hundred and twenty guns, after burning an hour, blew up.] When the explosion came, there was an awful silence. For ten minutes not a gun was fired on either side. The instinct of self-preservation, as well as the sudden awe on this sublime event, produced this pause in the battle.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 20.

443. AWKWARDNESS and Agility. The Poet Shelley. Hogg gives some details . . . of Shelley's personal appearance. . . . "There were many striking contrasts in the character and behavior of Shelley—of the clumsy with the graceful. He would stumble in stepping across the floor of a drawing-room; he would trip himself up on a smooth-shaven grass-plot, and he would tumble in the most inconceivable manner in ascending the commodious, facile, and well-carpeted staircase of an elegant mansion, so as to bruise his nose or his lips on the upper steps, or to tread upon his hands, and even occasionally to disturb the composure of a well-bred footman; on the contrary, he would often glide without collision through a crowded assembly, tread with unerring dexterity a most intricate path, or securely and rapidly tread the most arduous and uncertain ways."—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 2.

444. BACHELORS discarded. French Revolution. A.D. 1794. The National Convention now prepared another constitution for the adoption of the people of France. . . . The legislative powers were committed to two bodies, as in the United States. The first, corresponding to the United States Senate, was to be called the Council of the Ancients. It was to consist of two hundred and fifty members, each of whom was to be at least forty years of age, and a married man or widower. An unmarried man was not considered worthy of a post of such responsibility in the service of the State.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 3.

445. BACHELORS forced to marry. Rome. [Camillus was called the second founder of Rome. He was for a time censor, an office of great dignity.] There is upon record a very laudable act of his, that took place during his office. As the wars had made many widows, he obliged such of the men as lived single, partly by persuasion, and partly by threatening them with fines, to marry those widows.—PLUTARCH.

446. BACHELORS punished. Sparta. [Lycurgus the lawgiver.] To encourage marriage, some marks of infamy were set upon those that continued bachelors. For they were not permitted to see the exercises of the naked virgins; and the magistrates commanded them to march naked round the market-place in the winter, and to sing a song composed against themselves, which expressed how justly they were punished for their disobedience to the laws. They were also deprived of that honor and respect which the younger people paid to the old. . . . [Note.] The time of marriage was fixed; and if a man did not marry when he was of full age, he was liable to a prosecution, as were such also who married above or below themselves. Such as had three children had great immunities; and those that had four were free from all taxes. Virgins were married without portions, because neither want should hinder a man, nor riches induce him, to marry contrary to his inclinations.—PLUTARCH'S LIVES.

447. BALDNESS, illustrated by. Emp. Carus. His ambassadors entered the camp about sunset, at the time when the troops were satisfying their hunger with a frugal repast. The Persians expressed their desire of being introduced to the presence of the Roman emperor. They were at length conducted to a soldier, who was seated on the grass. A piece of stale bacon and a few hard peas composed his supper. A coarse woollen garment of purple was the only circumstance that announced his dignity. The conference was conducted with the same disregard of courtly elegance. Carus, taking off a cap which he wore to conceal his baldness, assured the ambassadors that, unless their master acknowledged the superiority of Rome, he would speedily render Persia as naked of trees as his own head was destitute of hair.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12.

448. BANISHMENT, Inhuman. Arcadia. In a campaign of less than a month, and with a loss of only twenty men, the English had made themselves masters of the whole country east of the St. Croix. The war in Arcadia was at an end; but what should be done with the people? The French inhabitants still outnumbered the English, three to one. Governor Lawrence and Admiral Boscawen, in conference with the chief justice of the province, settled upon the atrocious measure of driving the people into banishment. The first movement was to demand an oath of allegiance, which was so framed that the French, as honest Catholics, could not take it. . . . The next step on the part of the English was to accuse the French of treason, and to demand the surrender of all their firearms and boats. To this measure the broken-hearted people also submitted. They even offered to take the oath, but Lawrence declared that, having once refused, they must now take the consequences. The British vessels were made ready, and the work of forcible embarkation began. The country around the isthmus was covered with peaceful hamlets. These were now laid waste, and the people driven into the larger towns on the coast. Others were induced by artifice and treachery to put themselves in the power of the English. Wherever a sufficient number of the French could be gotten together they were driven on shipboard. They were allowed to take their wives and children and as much property as would not be inconvenient on the vessels. The estates of the province were confiscated, and what could not be appropriated was given to the flames. The wails of thousands of bleeding hearts were wafted to heaven with the smoke of burning homes. At the village of Grand Pré [Nova Scotia] four hundred and eighteen men were called together and shut up in a church. Then came the wives and children, the old men and the mothers, the sick and the infirm, to share the common fate. The whole company numbered more than nineteen hundred souls. The poor creatures were driven down to the shore, forced into the boats at the point of the bayonet, and carried to the vessels in the bay. As the moaning fugitives cast a last look at their pleasant town, a column of black smoke floating seaward told the story of desolation. More than three thousand of the hapless Arcadians were carried away by the British squadron and scattered, helpless, half-starved, and dying, among the English colonies. The history of civilized nations furnishes no parallel to this wanton, wicked destruction of an inoffensive colony.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 32.

449. BANKERS plunder. Jews. The share taken by the Jews in the business of banking was one strong cause why it continued so long to be in disesteem. To trade in money was considered as little else than to cheat, and accordingly we find that many of the princes of Europe looked upon the fortunes amassed by the Jews as a sort of lawful plunder, and made no scruple to despoil them of their property whenever a public emergency required a speedy supply of money. Thus, in England, King John imprisoned the Jews, in order to force a discovery of their wealth; and many of these unfortunate wretches, who would not reveal their treasures, were punished with the loss of their eyes. But these grievances, which would seem apparently calculated to repress the spirit of commerce, contributed in this instance very materially to its advancement. To guard against these tyrannical depredations made on their property, the Jews invented bills of exchange; and commerce became by this means capable of eluding violence and of maintaining everywhere its ground; for merchants could now convert their effects into paper, and thus easily transport them wherever they thought proper.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 17.

450. BANKERS, Prejudiced against. Italian Merchants. [Called Lombards in various cities of Europe.] These Lombards not only acted as merchants for the importation and exchange of commodities, but as bankers or money-dealers; though in this last branch of business they found a heavy restraint in the ideas of the times. The canon law, proceeding upon a strict interpretation of those passages of Scripture which condemn the taking of usury, was adverse to the custom of demanding even the most moderate interest for the use of money; and hence the banking trade of these Lombard merchants, who very naturally thought themselves entitled to a premium for the loan of their money, fell under the censure of the church, and began to be deemed unlawful. They were obliged, therefore, to carry on their business as bankers to great disadvantage. Their bargains were necessarily kept private, and consequently their exactness, being arbitrary, were often most exorbitant and fraudulent.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 17.

451. BANKRUPTCY predicted. Great Britain. Lord Lyttelton, in 1739; Lord Bolingbroke, in 1745; David Hume, in 1761; Adam Smith, in 1776; Dr. Price, in 1777; Lord Stair, in 1783; each honestly believed that England was fast approaching the condition of inevitable bankruptcy. In 1784 Marshall Conway wrote: "The sums spent in losing America are a blow we shall never recover."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 1, p. 2.

452. BANQUET, Extravagant. Court of Russia. [Napoleon's ambassador arrived from France.] Every day brought new fêtes . . . I will mention one. . . . At a supper given after a ball at the Embassy, a plate of five pears cost five hundred and fifty dollars. On another occasion cherries, which had been purchased at the price of eighty cents, were served as abundantly as though they had cost not more than twenty cents the pound. [Such was the competition in extravagance between the two courts. Napoleon said when he heard of it:] "Such extravagances are only to be expected of madmen or fools."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 2.

453. BAPTISM procrastinated. Converts. Among the proselytes of Christianity, there were many who judged it imprudent to precipitate a salutary rite, which could not be repeated; to throw away an inestimable privilege, which could never be recovered. By the delay of their baptism, they could venture freely to indulge their passions in the enjoyments of this world, while they still retained in their own hands the means of a sure and easy absolution.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 20.

454. BAPTIST, Pioneer. Roger Williams. Roger Williams belonged to that most radical body of dissenters called Anabaptists. By them the validity of infant baptism was denied. Williams himself had been baptized in infancy, but his views in regard to the value of the ceremony had undergone a change during his ministry in Salem. Now that he had freed himself from all foreign authority both of Church and State, he conceived it to be his duty to receive a second baptism. But who should perform the ceremony? Ezekiel Holliman, a layman, was selected for the sacred duty. Williams meekly received the rite at the hands of his friend, and then in turn baptized him and ten other exiles of the colony. Such was the organization of the first Baptist church in America.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 22.

455. BARBARIETY to Animals. Horses. [In the middle of the eighteenth century,] wonderful as it may appear, the "barbarous custom" of ploughing, harrowing, drawing, and working with horses by the tail was not exploded at Castlebar and other places.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 2, p. 32.

456. BARBERS, Surgical. England. [In 1547 the surgeons separated from the barber-surgeons.] The barber-surgeons shaved, and drew teeth, and bled, and attempted cures. . . . In 1540 the two companies were united by statute.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 29, p. 498.

457. BARGAIN, Foolish. St. Thomas Indian. [Columbus' first voyage.] On one occasion an Indian gave half a handful of gold-dust in exchange for one of these toys, and no sooner was he in possession of it than he bounded away to the woods, looking often behind him, fearing the Spaniards might repent of having parted so cheaply with such an inestimable jewel.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 4, ch. 9.

458. BASENESS, Matrimonial. Henry VIII. [Henry VIII. married Jane Seymour the next day after the official murder of Anne Boleyn. He looked upon matrimony as an indifferent official act which his duty required at the moment. This is the apology of the political philosopher.] —KNIGHT'S ENGLAND, vol. 2, ch. 23, p. 378.

459. BATHS, Common. Roman. Following the Romans through the ordinary occupations of the day, it was customary for them to go from the porticos or the theatre to take the bath. Water, which in the more frugal days of the republic was used only for the necessary purposes of life, was not brought to Rome by aqueducts till the 441st year of the city. . . . It soon became one of the chief articles of luxury, to supply as well the public as the private baths, and many aqueducts were accordingly built and public reservoirs and fountains reared in every quarter of the city. This luxury increased to such a degree that, under Augustus, there were seven hundred basins, a hundred and five fountains, and a hundred and thirty public reservoirs, all adorned in the most sumptuous manner, with columns, statues, and basso-relievos. To superintend these became an office of considerable dignity and emolument, and under the emperors was filled mostly by men of the first rank.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 4.

460. BATHS, Magnificent. Roman. The stupendous aqueducts, so justly celebrated by the praises of Augustus himself, replenished the Therma, or baths, which had been constructed in every part of the city, with imperial magnificence. The baths of Antoninus Caracalla, which were open, at stated hours, for the indiscriminate service of the senators and the people, contained above sixteen hundred seats of marble, and more than three thousand were reckoned in the baths of Diocletian. The walls of the lofty apartments were covered with curious mosaics, that imitated the art of the pencil in the elegance of design and the variety of colors. The Egyptian granite was beautifully incrustured with the precious green marble of Numidia; the perpetual stream of hot water was poured into the capacious basins, through so many wide mouths of bright and massy silver; and the meanest Roman could purchase, with a small copper coin, the daily enjoyment of a scene of pomp and luxury which might excite the envy of the kings of Asia. From these stately palaces issued a swarm of dirty and ragged plebeians, without shoes and without a mantle, who loitered away whole days in the street or Forum to hear news and to hold disputes; who dissipated, in extravagant gaming, the miserable pittance of their wives and children, and spent the hours of the night in obscure taverns and brothels, in the indulgence of gross and vulgar sensuality.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31, p. 262.

461. BATTLE, Bloodless. In Armor. [In 1119 the battle of Noyon, or Brenneville, was fought in France.] The battle was not a sanguinary one, and was remarkable for the comparative safety with which the horsemen in complete harness encountered each other. Ordericus says: "In the battle between the two kings, in which nearly nine hundred knights were engaged, I have ascertained that only three were slain. This arose from their being entirely covered with steel armor, and mutually sparing each other for the fear of God and out of regard for the fraternity of arms.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 17, p. 241.

462. ———. Fort Sumter. [After a vigorous bombardment for two days by the Confederates, the barracks took fire.] Major Anderson agreed to an unconditional surrender. . . . on leaving the fort he was permitted to salute his flag with fifty guns, the performance of which was attended with the melancholy occurrence of mortal injuries to four of his men by the bursting of two cannon. There was no other life lost in the whole affair. . . . It was estimated two thousand shots had been fired in all . . . yet not a life had been lost nor a limb injured.—POL-LARD'S FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 2, p. 55.

463. BATTLE, Bloody. Battle of Towton. When Margaret [of Anjou], who had now set her husband at liberty, prepared to enter London in triumph, she found the gates of the city shut against her. Young Edward, the eldest son of the late Duke of York, had begun to repair the losses of his party. London had declared in his favor, and proclaimed him king by the title of Edward IV. Margaret of Anjou, whose greatness of soul was superior to all of her misfortunes, retreated to the north of England, where she found means to assemble an army of 60,000 men. Warwick met her at the head of 40,000, at Towton, on the borders of Yorkshire. An engagement ensued—one of the bloodiest and most desperate that is recorded in the English history. Thirty-six thousand men were left dead upon the field; Warwick gained a complete victory, by which the young Edward was fixed upon the throne, and the vanquished Margaret, with her husband [Henry VI.] and infant son, took refuge in Flanders.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 14, p. 225.

464. BATTLE, Cry in. Battle of Naseby. If any field could have been won by passion alone, Rupert would have won not only Naseby, but many another field; but we know that, as passion is one of the most frail elements of our nature, so Rupert was one of the most frail of men. At the head of his Cavaliers, in white sash and plume, he indeed flamed in brilliant gallantry over the field, shouting, "Queen Mary! Queen Mary!" while the more rough, unknighly soldiers thundered, "God is with us! God is with us!" . . . "God is with us!" struck like light over his soldiers' hearts, like lightning over his enemies. What was there in the poor cry, "Queen Mary!" (and such a Mary!) to kindle feelings like that!—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 10.

465. BATTLE, Decisive. Battle of Chæronea. The Macedonian army amounted to 30,000 foot and 2000 horse; that of the Athenians and their allies was nearly equal in number. The left wing of the Macedonians was commanded by the young Alexander, and it was his fortune to be opposed by that body of the Thebans called the sacred band; the courage of the combatants on both side was, therefore, inflamed by a high principle of honor. The attack of Alexander was impetuous beyond all description, but was sustained with the most determined bravery on the part of the Thebans; and had the courage and conduct of their allies given them an adequate support, the fortune of the day would probably have been fatal to the Macedonians; but, unaided by the timely co-operation of the main body of the Greeks, the sacred band were left alone to sustain this desperate assault, and they fought till the whole of these noble Thebans lay dead upon the field. The Athenians, however, on their part, had made a most vigorous attack on the centre of the Macedonian army, and broke and put to flight a great body of the enemy. Philip, at the head of his formidable phalanx, was not engaged in the fight, but coolly withheld his attack till he saw the Greeks pursuing their success against the centre with a tumultuous impetuosity. He then charged them in the rear with the whole strength and solidity of his phalanx opposed to their deranged and disorderly battalions. The aspect of affairs was now quite changed, and the Grecian army, after a desperate conflict, was broken and entirely put to flight. . . . This decisive engagement, which, in its immediate consequences, put an end to the liberties of Greece, was fought in the year 338 before Christ.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3.

466. BATTLE, Disparity in. Battle of Arbela. Alexander . . . passing the Tigris and Euphrates without opposition, came up with the Persian monarch [Darius] at the head of 700,000 men, near to the village of Arbela . . . the Macedonian army did not exceed 40,000 men. It was toward the close of the day when they came in sight of the prodigious host of the Persians, which extended over an immense plain to the utmost distance that the eye could reach. Even some of Alexander's bravest officers were appalled with this sight. . . . The attack was made at day-break with an ardor and impetuosity on the part of the Greeks which, in the first onset, threw the foremost ranks of the Persian army back in confusion upon the main body, and completely restrained and rendered ineffectual its operations. Disorder, once begun, was propagated like an electrical shock through the whole mass, and the decisive victory was purchased [with a loss not exceeding 1200 Macedonians. The Persian loss was estimated at 300,000].—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4.

467. BATTLE, A Famous. Marathon. The Spartans delayed to march, from an absurd superstition of beginning no enterprise till after the full moon. The Athenians, therefore, may be said to have stood alone to repel this torrent. The amount of their whole army was only 10,000 men; the army of the Persians [under Darius] consisted of 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse—a vast inequality. Miltiades drew up his little army at the foot of a hill, which covered both the flanks, and frustrated all attempts to surround him. They knew the alternative was victory or death, and that all depended on a vigorous effort to be made in one moment; for a lengthened conflict was sure destruction. The Greeks, therefore, laying aside all missile weapons, trusted everything to the sword. At the word of command, instead of the usual discharge of javelins, they rushed at once upon the enemy with the most desperate impetuosity. The disorder of the Persians, from this furious and unexpected assault, was instantly perceived by Miltiades, and improved to their destruction by a charge made by both the wings of the Athenian army, in which with great judgment he had placed the best of his troops. The army of the Persians was broken in a moment; their immense numbers increased their confusion, and the whole were put to flight. A great carnage ensued. Six thousand three hundred were left dead on the field of Marathon. The Athenians, in this day of glory, lost only 190 men. The Spartans came the day after the battle to witness the triumph of their rival State.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 1.

468. ———. Mantinea. The Spartan troops had been suddenly called off from Mantinea to defend their city. Epaminondas now attempted, by a rapid march, to surprise and seize Mantinea; but in the mean time its garrison had been re-enforced by an Athenian army, which met the Thebans in front, on their approach to the town, while the Spartans, aware of their design, were following close upon their rear. An engagement now ensued, one of the most celebrated in the Grecian history. The army of the Thebans amounted to 30,000 foot and 3000 horse; that of the Lacedæmonians and their allies to 20,000 foot and 2000 horse. The battle was fought with the most desperate courage on both sides. [The Thebans were victorious, but were undone by the death of Epaminondas, whom ancient historians ranked] . . . among the greatest heroes and most illustrious characters of antiquity.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3.

469. BATTLE, A great. Austerlitz. [On December 2d, 1805, between nearly 100,000 French under Bonaparte and quite as many Austrians and Russians under their emperors. It has been considered Bonaparte's most glorious victory. He took 40,000 prisoners, and the allies left from 12,000 to 15,000 on the field.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 25, p. 450.

470. ———. Battle of Cressy. [Edward III., King of England, claimed the vacant throne of France by inheritance in right of his mother, the sister of Charles the Fair.] Edward, landing in France with the chief of the nobility of England, and his son, called, from the color of his armor, the Black Prince, then a youth of fifteen years of age, ran a career of the most glorious exploits. The opulent city of Caen in Normandy was taken and plundered, and the English were extending their depredations almost to the gates of Paris, when Philip appeared in their front with an army of 100,000 men . . . the English archers began the engagement, which throwing that wing of the French to whom they were opposed into the utmost confusion, the Prince of Wales, taking advantage of their dismay, attacked them with irresistible impetuosity. The king, who commanded a body of reserve, was determined to allow his intrepid son the honor of the day; he kept aloof from the fight, which was maintained on both sides with the most desperate courage. [The French were defeated.] Thirty thousand were left dead on the spot. Among these were John, King of Bohemia; Ralph, Duke of Lorraine, and a great part of the nobility of France.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 12.

471. ———. Agincourt. On pretence of recovering the ancient patrimony of the crown of England, Henry [IV.] made a descent on Normandy with an army of 50,000 men. He took the tower of Harfleur, and carried devastation into the country. A contagious distemper arrested his progress and destroyed three fourths of his army, and in this deplorable condition, with about 9000 effective troops, he was met by the Constable D'Albret, at the head of 60,000 men. In this situation a retreat was attempted by the English, but they were harassed by the enemy, and compelled to come to an engagement on the plain of Agincourt. On that day the English arms obtained a signal triumph. The French were so confident of success, that they made a proposal to the English about surrendering, and began to treat for the ransom of their prisoners. Henry observed in their immense army the remissness and relaxation which commonly attend a great superiority of numbers. He led on his little band to meet them in order of battle. The French stood for a considerable space of time, and beheld this feeble foe with indignation and contempt. "Come on, my friends," said Henry; "since they scorn to attack us, it is ours to show them the example. Come on, and the blessed Trinity be our protection." . . . The French were broken, dispersed, and entirely cut to pieces. The number of the slain amounted to 10,000, and 14,000 were taken prisoners. The loss of the English in the victory of Agincourt is said not to have exceeded 40 men—a fact bordering upon the incredible.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 13.

472. ——. Blenheim. A.D. 1704. Fifty-six thousand Allies under the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, and 60,000 French and Bavarians under Marshal Tallard, aided by his fellow-general Marsin. The Allies won the battle, taking 12,000 prisoners. They lost 11,000 killed and wounded. Total loss of French and Bavarians, in killed, wounded, prisoners, and deserters, 40,000.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 18, p. 285.

473. ——. Jena. [On the 14th of October, 1806, 250,000 men were engaged, with 700 pieces of cannon. Bonaparte defeated the Prussians, 20,000 being killed or wounded and above 30,000 taken prisoners. Their king, Frederick William III., fled from the field.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 27.

474. ——. Leuthen. [Frederick II. of Prussia, with 30,000 men, attacked 80,000 Austrians.] The Austrians fought bravely, but the genius of the Prussian leader gave him a mighty victory, which Napoleon said was of itself sufficient to place Frederick in the rank of the greatest generals. [Fought at Leuthen, 1757.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 15, p. 231.

475. ——. Navarino. [The British, French, and Russian fleets met the Turkish and Egyptian fleets in the port of Navarino, and after four hours' battle one half of the 120 men-of-war and transports were sunk, burnt, or driven on shore.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 12, p. 227.

476. ——. The Nile. [Battle of the Nile, fought on August 1, 1798. The number of the ships in the two fleets was nearly equal. The French lost the battle; nine sail of the line were taken and two burned. Only two French line-of-battle ships and two frigates escaped.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 20, p. 357.

477. ——. Rosbach. [Frederick II. of Prussia, with 22,000 men, at Rosbach met 40,000 French and 20,000 Germans.] Never was victory more complete. The French and the Imperial troops vied with each other in the swiftness of their flight. They left 7000 prisoners, guns, colors, baggage—all that could manifest the extent of their humiliation.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 15, p. 230.

478. ——. Trafalgar. [Under Admiral Lord Nelson was a British fleet of twenty-seven ships-of-the-line and four frigates. The French and Spaniards had opposed to him thirty-three ships-of-the-line and seven frigates, twenty of which struck their colors. Nelson was killed in the battle.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 25.

479. ——. At Ulm. On the 20th of October [1805] 30,000 [Austrians], with 60 pieces of cannon, marched out of the fortress and laid down their arms [to Bonaparte].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 25.

480. ——. Vitoria. [Fought by 20,000 Spanish and 70,000 British and Portuguese under the Duke of Wellington against the French. Wellington described the result in his despatches.] I have taken from them 151 pieces of cannon, 415 wagons of ammunition, all their baggage, provisions, cattle, treasure, etc., and a considerable number of prisoners.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 31, p. 562.

481. ——. Wagram. [Between 300,000 and 400,000 troops engaged on the 6th of July, 1809. Twenty-four thousand Austrians and 18,000 French are said to have been killed and wounded.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 29, p. 516.

482. ——. Waterloo. [Fought June 18, 1815; about 150,000 men, nearly equally divided, were in the two armies. Wellington commanded the Allies and gave Napoleon his final defeat. The Allies lost 24,679. The French lost 18,500 killed or wounded, and 7800 prisoners.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 2, p. 37.

483. BATTLE, Ineffective. Island No. 10. The bombardment . . . commenced on the 15th of March [1862] . . . General Beauregard telegraphed to the War Department at Richmond . . . on the 1st of April . . . that the bombardment had continued for fifteen days, in which time the enemy had thrown 3000 shells, expending about 100,000 pounds of powder, with the result on our side of one man killed and none seriously wounded . . . that our batteries were intact.—POLLARD'S FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 12, p. 291.

484. BATTLE, Preparation for. Battle of Hastings. The 13th of October was occupied in these negotiations, and at night the duke [William] announced to his men the next day would be the day of battle. That night is said to have been passed by the two armies in very different manners. The Saxon soldiers spent it in joviality, singing their national songs and draining huge horns of ale and wine around their campfires. The Normans, when they had looked to their arms and horses, confessed themselves to the priests, with whom their camp was thronged, and received the sacrament by thousands at a time. On Saturday, the 14th of October, was fought the great battle. [The English were defeated.]—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 306.

485. BATTLE, Religion in. Siege of Damascus. At the principal gate, in the sight of both armies, a lofty crucifix was erected; the bishop, with his clergy, accompanied the march, and laid the volume of the New Testament before the image of Jesus; and the contending parties were scandalized or edified by a prayer that the Son of God would defend His servants and vindicate His truth. The battle raged with incessant fury. [The city was taken.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51.

486. BATTLE, Terrific. Mobile Bay. In the beginning of August, 1864, Admiral Farragut bore down with a powerful squadron upon the defences of Mobile. The entrance to the harbor of this city was commanded on the left by Fort Gaines and on the right by Fort Morgan. The harbor was defended by a Confederate fleet and the monster iron-clad ram Tennessee. On the 5th of August Farragut prepared for battle, and ran past the forts into the harbor. In order to direct the movements of his vessels, the brave old admiral mounted to the maintop of his flagship, the Hartford, lashed himself to the rigging, and from that high perch gave his commands during the battle. One of the Union ships struck a torpedo and went to the bottom. The rest attacked and dispersed the Confederate squadron; but just as the bay seemed won, the terrible Tennessee came down at full speed to strike and sink the Hartford. The latter avoided the blow; and then followed one of the fiercest attacks of the war. The iron-clads closed around their black antagonist, and battered her with their beaks and fifteen-inch bolts of iron until she surrendered. Two days afterward Fort Gaines was taken, and on the 23d of the month Fort Morgan was obliged to capitulate.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 66.

487. BATTLE, A useless. New Orleans. [The battle of New Orleans was fought after the treaty of peace had been signed at Ghent, the news of which arrived soon after.]—KNIGHT'S ENGLAND, vol. 8, ch. 1.

488. BATTLEFIELD, Fruitful. "Blood-fattened." [The battlefield where Marius destroyed the Teutones was enriched with the blood of the barbarians.] The Massilians walled in their vineyards with the bones they found in the field; and . . . the rain which fell the winter following, soaking in the moisture of the putrefied bodies, the ground was so enriched by it, that it produced the next season a prodigious crop. Thus the opinion of Archilochus is confirmed, that fields are fattened with blood.—PLUTARCH'S MARIUS.

489. BATTLES, Decisive. Fifteen. [Marathon, Syracuse, Arbela, Metaurus, victory of Arminius over the Roman legions under Varus, Chalons, Tours, Hastings, Orleans, defeat of the Spanish Armada, Blenheim, Pultowa, Saratoga, Valmy, Waterloo.]—SEE CREASY'S FIFTEEN DEC. BATTLES.

490. BEARD, A significant. Walter Scott. About the middle of the sixteenth century lived Sir Walter's great-grandfather, Walter Scott, generally known in Teviotdale by the surname of Beadie, because he would never cut his beard after the banishment of the Stuarts, and who took arms in their cause and lost by his intrigues on their behalf almost all that he had, besides running the greatest risk of being hanged as a traitor.—HUTTON'S LIFE OF SCOTT, ch. 1.

491. BEARDS, Characteristic. Lombards. Instead of asserting the rights of a sovereign for the protection of his subjects, the emperor invited a strange people to invade and possess the Roman provinces between the Danube and the Alps; and the ambition of the Gepidæ was checked by the rising power and fame of the Lombards. This corrupt appellation had been diffused in the thirteenth century by the merchants and bankers, the Italian posterity of these savage warriors; but the original name of Lango-bards is expressive only of the peculiar length and fashion of their beards.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 42.

492. BEAUTY, Common. Jeanne. The county of Flanders was . . . annexed to the crown of France. A few months later Philip [IV.] and his consort, attended by a brilliant court, made a sumptuous progress through the chief cities of the conquered province. The Flemings . . . welcomed their new sovereign with lively demonstrations of joy. . . . An entertainment given at Bruges was especially distinguished by the radiant beauty and rich attire of the female nobility: "I thought I was the only queen here," exclaimed the envious Jeanne of Navarre; "but I find myself surrounded on all sides by queens."—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 9, § 14, p. 181.

493. BEAUTY, Personal. Mahomet. According to the tradition of his companions, Mahomet was distinguished by the beauty of his person, an outward gift which is seldom despised, except by those to whom it has been refused. Before he spoke, the orator engaged on his side the affections of a public or private audience. They applauded his commanding presence, his majestic aspect, his piercing eye, his gracious smile, his flowing beard, his countenance that painted every sensation of the soul, and his gestures that enforced each expression of the tongue.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50.

494. BEAUTY, Promoted by. George Villiers. [The first introduction of George Villiers to James I. was purely from the beauty of his person. The history of England to the end of this reign is in great part the personal history of George Villiers, the adventurer.] First the cup-bearer; in a few weeks knighted; without any other qualification he was at the same time made Gentleman of the Bedchamber and Knight of the Order of the Garter; and in a short time he was made a baron, a viscount, an earl, a marquis, and became Lord High-Admiral of England, Lord Warden of the Cinque ports, Master of the Horse, and entirely disposed of all the graces of the king, in conferring all the honors and all the offices of three kingdoms, without a rival.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 23, p. 364.

495. BEAUTY, Self-asserted. Sylla. Lucullus tells us when Sylla was sent at the head of an army against the confederates, the earth opened on a sudden near Laverna; and . . . a vast quantity of fire and a flame. . . . shot up to the heavens. The soothsayers being consulted upon it, made answer, "That a person of courage and superior beauty should take the reins of government into his hands and suppress the tumults with which Rome was then agitated." Sylla says he was the man; for his locks of gold were sufficient proof of his beauty, and that he needed not hesitate after so many great actions to avow himself a man of courage.—PLUTARCH'S SYLLA.

496. BEER, Antiquity of. Germans. Strong beer, a liquor extracted with very little art from wheat or barley, and corrupted (as it is strongly expressed by Tacitus) into a certain semblance of wine, was sufficient for the gross purposes of German debauchery. But those who had tasted the rich wines of Italy, and afterward of Gaul, sighed for that more delicious species of intoxication.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9.

497. BEGGAR, An honorable. Martin Luther. His relatives, one of whom was sexton of the church of St. Nicholas, were probably not in the position to assist him for any great length of time. He was therefore obliged, as a charity scholar, to appeal to the common sympathy of all men, as he had already done in Magdeburg. In later years he himself says: "Do not despise the boys that go from house to house asking bread for the sake of God and singing the 'bread, chorus.' I also was one of those 'bread-colts,' and begged bread at the doors, especially in Eisenach, that dear city."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 2.

498. BEGGAR, A literary. Reign of Charles II. The recompense which the wits of that age could obtain from the public was so small, that they were under the necessity of eking out their incomes by levying contributions on the great. Every rich and good-natured lord was pestered by authors with a mendicancy so importunate, and a flattery so abject, as may in our time seem incredible. The patron to whom a work was inscribed was expected to reward the writer with a purse of gold. The fee paid for the dedication of a book was often much larger than the sum which any bookseller would give for the copy-right. Books were therefore often printed merely that they might be dedicated. This traffic in praise completed the degradation of the literary character. Adulation pushed to the verge, sometimes of nonsense, and sometimes of impiety, was not thought to disgrace a poet. Independence, veracity, self-respect, were things not expected by the world from him. In truth, he was in morals something between a pander and a beggar.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3.

499. BEGGARS, Malicious. England. [In 1545 the wandering beggars cut off the ears of people, burnt frames of timber prepared for the erection of a building, cut the heads of ponds and conduits; burnt carts laden with charcoal; set fire to heaps of felled wood; barked apple and pear trees, and cut out the tongues of cattle.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 28, p. 471.

500. BEGGARS, Professional. Monks. In the first century of their institution, the infidel Zosimus has maliciously observed, that, for the benefit of the poor, the Christian monks had reduced a great part of mankind to a state of beggary.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 37.

501. BEGGARS punished. Whipped. [Those who solicited alms without license were to be whipped and set in the stocks.] But if any person being whole in body and able to labor was found begging, every such idle person was to be whipped at the end of a cart, and enjoined to return to the place where he was born, or where he last dwelt for three years, and there put himself to labor as a true man oweth to do. He was to beg his way home; but if he wandered from the prescribed way, or exceeded the prescribed times in his perilous journey, he was in every place to be taken and whipped.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 21, p. 342.

502. ———. Slavery. [From 1384 to 1531] vagabonds were put in the stocks. Then the whip was added to the stocks. In 1536 the whip was a mild punishment, to which mutilation and death were supplemented. But even the cart's tail, the butcher's knife, and the hangman's noose inspired no adequate dread. . . . In 1545 . . . it is provided that every man or woman, not being prevented from work by old age, lameness, or disease, who shall be found loitering or wandering, and not seeking work during three days, or who shall leave work when engaged, may be lawfully apprehended and be brought before two justices of the peace; who, upon confession, or the proof of two witnesses, shall immediately cause the said loiterer to be marked with a hot iron in the breast, the mark of V, and adjudge the said person, living so idly, to be his slave. The presenter, as he is called, is to have and hold the slave for two years; and, only giving him bread and water and refuse food, to "cause the said slave to work, by beating, chaining, or otherwise." [If he runs away, after conviction, he shall be branded on the forehead or ball of the cheek with a hot iron, making an S; he is then to be a slave for life. If he runs away the second time, he is to suffer death as a felon. Infant beggars may be bound to the service of any person who will take them—the males till they are twenty-four and the females till they are twenty years old.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 28, p. 470.

503. BEGGARS, Scheme for. Count Rumford. Bavaria was then infested with beggars, vagabonds, and thieves, native and foreign. These mendicant tramps were in the main stout, healthy, and able-bodied fellows, who found a life of thievish indolence pleasanter than a life of honest work. "These detestable vermin had recourse to the most diabolical arts and the most horrid crimes in the prosecution of their infamous trade." They robbed, they stole, maimed and exposed little children, so as to extract money from the tender-hearted. All this must be put an end to. Four regiments of cavalry were so cantoned that every village had its patrol. This disposition of the cavalry was antecedent to seizing, as a beginning, all the beggars in the capital. [At Munich he established a pauper workhouse, well ordered, clean, and gave instruction and encouragement. It paid expenses, and relieved the government and helped the poor.]—TYNDALL'S COUNT RUMFORD.

504. BEGINNING, Discouragement at the. Pilgrims. On Monday, the 11th of December—old style 1620—the Pilgrim Fathers landed at the Rock of Plymouth. It was now the dead of winter. There was an incessant storm of sleet and snow, and the houseless immigrants, already enfeebled by their sufferings, fell a-dying of hunger, cold, and exposure. After a few days spent in explorations about the coast, a site was selected near the first landing, some trees were felled, the snowdrifts were cleared away, and on the 9th of January the heroic toilers began to build New Plymouth. Every man took on himself the work of making his own house; but the ravages of disease grew daily worse, strong arms fell powerless, lung fevers and consumptions wasted every family. At one time only seven men were able to work on the sheds which were building for shelter from the storms; and if an early spring had not brought relief, the colony must have perished to a man.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 7.

505. BEGINNING, A pious. Reformation. The theses of Dr. Martin Luther were read all over Germany. Numerous strangers who attended the anniversary festival of consecration at Wittenberg, in order that they might adore the many relics and other sacred treasures of the church, carried the news with them to their homes. Up to this time no one had been willing to bell the cat! Great as was the discontent at the shameless proceedings of the traders in indulgences, equally great was the fear of opposing the Pope and the Church. But Luther said: "Whoever will begin anything good, let him see to it that he begin and venture it in reliance upon the favor of God, and never upon human comfort or assistance; let him not fear any man—no, not the whole world!" Everywhere Luther's theses found prepared ground. Everywhere they were spoken of, and with anxious concern was he regarded who had ventured upon so bold a step! Thus the name of the fearless Augustinian monk passed rapidly from nation to nation, and many an inquiry was heard about the antecedents and the experiences of the man who had presumed to take issue with the Pope and his adherents. —REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 1.

506. BEGINNING, A small. American Revolution. A Stamp Act to raise £80,000 produced a war that cost £100,000,000. . . . "What mighty contests rise from trivial things!" —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 16, p. 271.

507. ———. Romans. [A revolution from a blow.] Amid the ruins of Italy the famous Marozia invited one of the usurpers to assume the character of her third husband; and Hugh, King of Burgundy, was introduced by her faction into the mole of Hadrian or castle of St. Angelo, which commands the principal bridge and entrance of Rome. Her son by the first marriage, Alberic, was compelled to attend at the nuptial banquet; but his reluctant and ungraceful service was chastised with a blow by his new father. The blow was productive of a revolution. "Romans," exclaimed the youth, "once you were the masters of the world, and these Burgundians the most abject of your slaves. They now reign, these voracious and brutal savages, and my injury is the commencement of your servitude." The alarm bell rang to arms in every quarter of the city; the Burgundians retreated with haste and shame; Marozia was imprisoned by her victorious son, and his brother, Pope John XI., was reduced to the exercise of his spiritual functions. —GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 49.

508. ———. War. [The Duke of Guise left] his chateau of Joinville with a retinue of two hundred well-armed gentlemen; the duke halted, on the 1st of March, 1562, at the little town of Vassy in Champagne, where, the day being Sunday, the Protestants were assembled for divine service. The duke's attendants, by his orders, interrupted and tried to stop the heretical worship; the sectaries resisted, and a fierce brawl ensued. The duke, followed by his officers, hurried to the spot, and was assailed by a shower of stones, one of which struck him on the cheek. His enraged soldiers now fired upon the unarmed multitude; the carnage was fearful; 60 persons were slain outright, and upward of 200 more grievously wounded. Such was the "massacre of Vassy," which, whether premeditated or accidental, was the first act of the civil and religious wars of France. —STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 16, § 5, p. 334.

509. BELLS, Impressive. Napoleon I. One day when this matter [of religion] was under earnest discussion in the council of State, Napoleon said: "Last evening I was walking alone in the woods, amid the solitude of nature. The tones of a distant church bell fell upon my ear. Involuntarily I felt deep emotions—so powerful is the influence of early habits and associations. I said to myself, If I feel thus, what must be the influence of such impressions upon the popular mind? Let your philosophers answer that if they can. It is absolutely indispensable to have a religion for the people." . . . Says Bourrienne, "I have been twenty times witness to the singular effect which the sound of a bell had on Napoleon." —ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 23.

510. BELLS substituted. Human Voice. [Mahomet established] the usage which subsists still, of calling the faithful to prayer by a signal which unites the people, at the same hours, in the same aspiration. It was first proposed him to employ the trumpet which used to call the Jews to the temple; then the creaker that convoked the Christians before the invention of bells. He preferred, after long hesitations, the human voice, that living signal, that appeal from soul to soul, which gives to sounds the accent of intelligence and piety. He instituted the muezzin, who are servitors of the mosque, selected for the amplitude and sonority of their voice, to mount the summit of the minarets and chant from on high upon city and upon country the hour of prayer. —LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 104.

511. BENEFACTOR, Praise of. Abraham Lincoln. Their masters fled upon the approach of our soldiers, and this gave the slaves a conception of a power greater than their masters exercised. This power they called "Massa Linkum." Colonel McKaye said . . . on a certain day, when there was quite a large gathering of the people [in their praise house], considerable confusion was created by different persons attempting to tell who and what "Massa Linkum" was. . . . "Brederin," said he [their white-haired leader], "you don't know nosen' what you'se talkin' 'bout. Now, you just listen to me. Massa Linkum, he eberywhar. He know eberyting." Then solemnly looking up, he added: "He walk de earf like de Lord!" . . . Mr. Lincoln was very much affected by this account. He did not smile, as another might have done, but got up from his chair and walked in silence two or three times across the floor. As he resumed his seat, he said, very impressively: "It is a momentous thing to be the instrument, under Providence, of the liberation of a race." —RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 734.

512. BENEFACTORS opposed. James Hargreaves. [The inventor of the cotton carding machine.] A man was about to be executed at Cork for stealing. On the appointed day the weavers, who were short of work, and attributed the hard times to cotton, gathered about the gallows, and dressed both the criminal and the executioner in cotton cloth, to mark their contempt and abhorrence of it, and to make the wearing of it disgraceful. The criminal, sympathizing with the object, delivered the following address just before being turned off: "Give ear, O good people, to the words of a dying sinner. I confess I have been guilty of what necessity compelled me to commit; which starving condition I was in, I am well assured, was occasioned by the scarcity of money, that has proceeded from the great discouragement of our woollen manufactures. Therefore, good Christians, consider that, if you go on to suppress your own goods by wearing such cottons as I am now clothed in, you will bring your country into misery which will consequently swarm with such unhappy malefactors as your present object is, and the blood of every miserable felon that will hang after this warning will lay at your door." [Legislation followed unfriendly to cotton-weaving.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 704.

513. BENEVOLENCE, Access by. John Howard. After attempting in vain to gain access to other prisons in Paris, he was so fortunate as to discover an ancient royal decree, which directed jailers to admit to prisons under their charge all persons desirous of giving alms to prisoners, and to permit them to give their alms into the prisoners' own hands. Armed with this decree, he obtained access to all the prisons of Paris, except the impenetrable Bastille.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOGRAPHY, p. 48.

514. BENEVOLENCE, Beauty of. Abraham Lincoln. Hon. Thaddeus Stevens called with an elderly lady in great trouble, whose son had been in the army, but for some offence had been court-martialed and sentenced either to death or imprisonment. . . . After a full hearing, the President . . . proceeded to execute the paper [granting pardon]. The gratitude of the mother was too deep for expression, save by her tears, and not a word was said between her and Mr. Stevens until they were half way down the stairs . . . when she suddenly broke forth in an excited manner with the words, "I knew it was a copper-head lie!" "What do you refer to, madam?" asked Mr. Stevens. "Why, they told me he was an ugly-looking man," she replied, with vehemence. "He is the handsomest man I ever saw in my life!"—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 738.

515. BENEVOLENCE, Blessing on. Oswald. [The Northumbrian king.] For after-times the memory of Oswald's greatness was lost in the memory of his piety. "By reason of his constant habit of praying or giving thanks to the Lord, he was wont wherever he sat to hold his hands upturned on his knees." As he feasted with Bishop Aidan by his side, the thegn or noble of his war-band, whom he had sent to give alms to the poor at his gate, told him of a multitude that still waited fasting without. The king at once bade the untasted meat before him to be carried to the poor, and his silver dish be parted piecemeal among them. Aidan seized the royal hand and blessed it. "May this hand," he cried, "never grow old."—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 50.

516. BENEVOLENCE a Business. John Howard. From 1773 to 1776 Howard's chief employment was to pursue his investigations into the conditions of the prisons of Great Britain. In the course of those three years he personally and most thoroughly inspected every prison in the three kingdoms that offered any peculiarity. He travelled ten thousand miles at his own expense, and delivered from prison a large number of poor debtors by paying their debts. Wherever he went he brought some alleviation to the lot of the prisoners by gifts of money, bread, meat, or tea, and by remonstrating with jailers, surgeons, chaplains, and magistrates. Several prisons underwent a complete renovation and reformation solely in consequence of his conversations with county magistrates and circuit judges.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 45.

517. BENEVOLENCE, Christian. Reign of James II. [The Duke of Monmouth was defeated and his adherents imprisoned.] The jails of Somersetshire and Dorsetshire were filled with thousands of captives. The chief friend and protector of these unhappy men in their extremity was one who abhorred their religious and political opinions, one whose order they hated, and to whom they had done unprovoked wrong, Bishop Ken. That good prelate used all his influence to soften the jailers, and retrenched from his own episcopal state that he might be able to make some addition to the coarse and scanty fare of those who had defaced his beloved cathedral. His conduct on this occasion was of a piece with his whole life. His intellect was indeed darkened by many superstitions and prejudices; but his moral character, when impartially reviewed, sustains a comparison with any in ecclesiastical history, and seems to approach as near as human infirmity permits to the ideal perfection of Christian virtue.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5.

518. BENEVOLENCE, Conscientious. John Wesley. It is estimated that he gave away in the course of his life more than $150,000. [Principally the income from his literary works. When the Commissioners of Excise wrote him,] "We cannot doubt that you have plate, for which you have hitherto neglected to make an entry," his laconic reply was, "I have two silver teaspoons at London, and two at Bristol; this is all the plate which I have at present, and I shall not buy any more while so many around me want bread."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 267.

519. — — —. Mary Fletcher. [The widow of Rev. John Fletcher was as economical as she was benevolent. Her expenses never amounted to £5 a year. During the last year of her life a friend who made up her accounts reports,] that her whole expenditure, on her own apparel, amounted to 19s. 6d. Her "poor account" for the same year amounted to nearly £182.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 3, p. 228.

520. — — —. Lady Huntingdon. Lady Huntingdon . . . gave away, for religious purposes, more than $500,000. She sold all her jewels, and by the proceeds erected chapels for the poor. She relinquished her aristocratic equipage, her expensive residences and liveried servants, that her means of usefulness might be more ample. She purchased theatres, halls, and dilapidated chapels in London, Bristol, and Dublin, and fitted them up for public worship. New chapels were erected by her aid in many places in England, Wales, and Ireland.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 168.

521. BENEVOLENCE, Disinterested. Samuel Johnson. A literary lady, of large fortune, was mentioned as one who did good to many, but by no means "by stealth;" and instead of "blushing to find it fame," acted evidently from vanity. JOHNSON: "I have seen no beings who do as much good from benevolence as she does from whatever motive. If there are such under the earth, or in the clouds, I wish they would come up, or come down. . . . No, sir; to act from pure benevolence is not possible for finite beings. Human benevolence is mingled with vanity, interest, or some other motive."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 301.

522. BENEVOLENCE displayed. Carthaginians. The Bishop of Carthage, from a society less opulent than that of Rome, collected 100,000 sesterces (above £850 sterling) on a sudden call of charity to redeem the brethren of Numidia, who had been carried away captives by the barbarians of the desert. About a hundred years before the reign of Decius, the Roman church had received, in a single donation, the sum of 200,000 sesterces from a stranger of Pontus, who proposed to fix his residence in the capital.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 15.

523. BENEVOLENCE, Enforced. By Fine. [James I. sought financial relief by a "Benevolence," as it was called—the solicitation of gifts.] Mr. Oliver St. John declined to contribute, and wrote a letter setting forth his reasons for refusal. He was brought into the Star-Chamber, and fined in the sum of £5000.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 23, p. 363.

524. BENEVOLENCE, Example of. Mahomet. He laid up no treasure; he distributed the whole produce of the tithe, which he established upon general property and the spoils of war, between his soldiers and the poor. He had made, for his own part, a vow of poverty. He gave all that he received to the hands and hearts of the poor, to keep for him, as depositaries, charged to give all back in heaven. The appurtenances of his house, the porticos adjacent to the mosque, the courts of the edifice, were one vast hospital, where the poor, the widows, the orphans, the infirm, could be seen waiting for nourishment or medicine. They were called the "guests of the bench," because they passed their life seated or lying on the benches of the prophet's house. Every night the prophet visited them, comforted them, clad them, fed them with his barley bread and dates. He brought daily a certain number of them into the house, to take their repast with him. He distributed the others, as guests of God, among the wealthiest of his disciples.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 152.

525. BENEVOLENCE, Excessive. Sewing Girl. George Müller then prayed for a house, for suitable helpers to instruct and take care of the children, and that £1000 sterling might be given him. On the very next day, December 6, 1835, the first donation was received—namely, 1s.—from a poor missionary then visiting at his house. . . . A few days afterward a poor young woman, who earned about 4s. weekly by her needlework, contributed £100, but her donation was courteously declined. When sent for and spoken to on the subject, she stated that this money was part of a little property recently left her by her grandfather, who had died; and that, feeling deeply interested in the contemplated Orphan Work, it was her desire to give this £100 toward the Orphan Fund; but Mr. Müller still refused to accept the contribution. "You are weak and sickly," said he, "and may need this money for yourself. I fear you have acted hastily, and may regret the step hereafter." Her reply, however, was, "I have well weighed the matter; the Lord Jesus freely shed His precious blood for me, a poor, lost sinner, and shall I not in return show my love and gratitude to Him by giving Him this little sum? Rather than this Orphan Work should not come to pass, I would give every penny I possess toward it." After reasoning further with her on the subject, and finding she was thoroughly decided, he at length reluctantly accepted the £100.—LIFE OF GEORGE MÜLLER, p. 27.

526. BENEVOLENCE by Faith. George Müller. [In his Orphan Work.] He began with one day-school, but on May 26, 1882, we had seventy-two, of which thirteen were in Spain, attended by nearly one thousand Catholic children; one was in Italy, five were in the East Indies, six in Demerara and Essequibo, and the others were scattered throughout England and Wales. He began with one Sunday-school; on May 26, 1882, there were thirty-eight connected with the institution. One adult school only was founded at its commencement, but on May 26, 1882, there were six. There were then also in all the various schools nine thousand six hundred and seventy-one pupils, and from the formation of the institution up to that time, eighty-eight thousand one hundred and nineteen children or grown-up persons have been taught in these one hundred and sixteen schools. All of them were established simply through the instrumentality of prayer and faith; and though the annual expenditure connected with them has for many years been £9500, no one has ever been asked to contribute toward their support, and every shilling continues to be obtained in the same manner.—LIFE OF GEORGE MÜLLER, p. 24.

527. BENEVOLENCE, Forced. Altars of the Churches. [When the Duke of Guise captured Calais from the English, he made a proclamation, charging the inhabitants, in the name of the French king, that] all and every person that were inhabitants of the town of Calais, having about them any money, plate, or jewels to the value of one groat, to bring the same forthwith, to lay down upon the high altars of the churches, upon pain of death; bearing them in hand also that they should be searched. By reason of which proclamation there was made a great and sorrowful offertory.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 7, p. 104.

528. BENEVOLENCE, Frustrated. James II. The king was bitterly mortified by the large amount of the collection [for the persecuted Huguenots] which had been made in obedience to his own call. He knew, he said, what all this liberality meant. It was mere Whiggish spite to himself and his religion. He had already resolved that the money should be of no use to those whom the donors wished to benefit. . . . The refugees were zealous for the Calvinistic discipline and worship. James therefore gave orders that none should receive a crust of bread or a basket of coals who did not first take the sacrament according to the Anglican ritual. It is strange that this inhospitable act should have been devised by a prince who affected to consider the Test Act as an outrage on the rights of conscience; for however unreasonable it may be to establish a sacramental test for the purpose of ascertaining whether men are fit for civil or military office, it is surely much more unreasonable to establish a sacramental test for the purpose of ascertaining whether in extreme distress they are fit objects of charity.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6.

529. BENEVOLENCE, Generous. Cimon. [An Athenian general and statesman.] Cimon . . . had acquired a great fortune, and what he had gained gloriously in the war from the enemy he laid out with as much reputation upon his fellow-citizens. He ordered the fences of his fields and gardens to be thrown down, that strangers, as well as his own countrymen, might freely partake of his fruit. He had a supper provided at his house every day, in which the dishes were plain, but sufficient for a multitude of guests. Every poor citizen repaired to it at pleasure, and had his diet without care or trouble; by which means he was enabled to give proper attention to public affairs. Aristotle, indeed, says this supper was not provided for all the citizens in general, but only for those of his own tribe, which was that of Lacia. When he walked out he used to have a retinue of young men, well clothed; and if he happened to meet an aged citizen in a mean dress, he ordered some one of them to change clothes with him. This was great and noble. But beside this, the same attendants carried with them a quantity of money; and when they met in the market-place with any necessitous person of tolerable appearance, they took care to slip some pieces into his hand as privately as possible.—PLUTARCH.

530. BENEVOLENCE, Genuine. Dr. Wilson. The benevolent Dr. Wilson once discovered a clergyman at Bath who, he was informed, was sick, poor, and had a numerous family. In the evening he gave a friend £50, requesting him to deliver it in the most delicate manner, and as from an unknown person. The friend said, "I will wait upon him early in the morning." "You will oblige me, sir, by calling directly. Think of what importance a good night's rest may be to that poor man."

531. ———. Catherine Wilkinson. In 1832, when the cholera first appeared in England, there was a poor woman named Catherine Wilkinson, who was so impressed with the necessity of cleanliness as a preventive to the disease, that she encouraged her neighbors to come to her comparatively better house, which comprised a kitchen, a parlor, three small bed-chambers, and a yard, for the purpose of washing and drying their clothes. The good that was manifest induced some benevolent persons to aid her in extending her operations. The large amount of washing done in one week in a cellar, under the superintendence of this excellent woman, represented the amount of disease and discomfort kept down by her energetic desire to do good without pecuniary reward. Such was the origin of public baths and wash-houses, which Catherine Wilkinson had the satisfaction of seeing matured in Liverpool in 1846, in a large establishment under the corporation, to the superintendence of which she and her husband were appointed.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 22, p. 393.

532. BENEVOLENCE, Incorporated for. Colony of Georgia. [James Oglethorpe planned the colony as an asylum for the poor, for imprisoned debtors, and for persecuted Protestants.] A charter . . . placed it, for twenty-one years, under the guardianship of a corporation, "in trust for the poor." The common seal of the corporation, having on one side a group of silk-worms at their toils, with the motto, Non sibi, sed aliis—"Not for themselves, but for others"—expressed the disinterested purpose of the patrons.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 24.

533. BENEVOLENCE injurious. Constantinople. [Constantine the Great encouraged emigration to Constantinople by his great liberality.] The frequent and regular distributions of wine and oil, of corn or bread, of money or provisions, had almost exempted the poorest citizen of Rome from the necessity of labor. The magnificence of the first Cæsars was in some measure imitated by the founder of Constantinople; but his liberality, however it might excite the applause of the people, has incurred the censure of posterity. The annual tribute of corn imposed upon Egypt was applied to feed a lazy and insolent people.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 17.

534. BENEVOLENCE insulted. Abraham Lincoln. [A cashiered officer was permitted to visit Mr. Lincoln twice to argue a defence. By his own showing he proved the justice of his punishment. He took much precious time at each interview. He forced his way the third time before the President, and went over the same argument. Mr. Lincoln made no reply.] Turning very abruptly, he said: "Well, Mr. President, I see that you are fully determined not to do me justice." This was too aggravating for Mr. Lincoln. Manifesting, however, no more feeling than that indicated by a slight compression of the lips, he very quietly arose, . . . and then suddenly seizing the defunct officer by the coat-collar, he marched him forcibly to the door, saying, as he ejected him, . . . "Sir, I give you fair warning never to show yourself in this room again. I can bear censure, but not insult!"—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 743.

535. BENEVOLENCE an Investment. Spinners. [Samuel Crompton endeavored to conceal his secret after inventing the "mule," which afterward revolutionized the manufacture of cotton. But his superior yarn awakened suspicion. Manufacturers sought admission to his house; they climbed up to the windows to look in. So great was his embarrassment, that he was obliged to destroy the machine or give it to the public.] The manufacturers made a subscription "as a reward for his improvement in spinning." . . . The whole sum subscribed was £67, 6s. 6d. The list is curiously interesting, as containing among the half-guinea subscribers the names of many Bolton firms now of great wealth and eminence as mule-spinners, whose colossal fortunes may be said to have been based upon this singularly small investment.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 3.

536. BENEVOLENCE, Joy of. Abraham Lincoln. One night Schuyler Colfax left all other business to ask him to respite the son of a constituent who was sentenced to be shot . . . for desertion. He heard the story, though he was wearied out with incessant calls, . . . and then replied: "Some of our generals complain that I impair discipline and subordination in the army by my pardons and respites; but it makes me rested after a hard day's work, if I can find some good excuse for saving a man's life, and I go to bed happy as I think how joyous the signing of my name will make him and his family and his friends." And with a happy smile beaming over that care-furrowed face, he signed the name that saved that life.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 741.

537. ———. Michael Faraday. When Faraday began to be famous in England as a chemist, he was frequently applied to by men of business to analyze substances and perform other operations in what is called commercial chemistry. This kind of business increased to such an extent that an immense fortune was within his reach, and he found that he must choose between getting money and investigating science. Having no children, and being blessed with a wife who sympathized with his pursuits, it was not difficult for him to choose the nobler part. "This son of a blacksmith," says his friend Tyndall, "and apprenticed to a book-binder, had to decide between a fortune of £150,000 on the one side, and his undowered science on the other. He chose the latter, and died a poor man. But his was the glory of holding aloft among the nations the scientific name of England for a period of thirty years." And this glory he enjoyed; but far dearer to him was the love which his success in extending the area of knowledge brought him. "Tyndall," said he once, taking his friend by the hand—the hand that had just written a review of Faraday's works—"Tyndall, the sweetest reward of my work is the sympathy and good-will which it has caused to flow in upon me from all quarters of the world." Of all the sons of men, those who benefit mankind most and get from mankind least (that is, considering the services they render), are genuine men of science. The salary attached to this professorship of chemistry, made forever illustrious by Faraday's having held it, was £80 a year, the use of three rooms, with fuel and candles enough to warm and light them.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 765.

538. BENEVOLENCE, Large. For Huguenots. [James II. had announced that a collection would be taken in every church in the kingdom for the persecuted Huguenots. It was designed for political ends.] It had been expected that, according to the practice usual on such occasions, the people would be exhorted to liberality from the pulpits. But James was determined not to tolerate declamations against his religion and his ally. The Archbishop of Canterbury was therefore commanded to inform the clergy that they must merely read the brief, and must not presume to preach on the sufferings of the French Protestants. Nevertheless, the contributions were so large, that, after all deductions, the sum of £40,000 was paid into the chamber at London. Perhaps none of the munificent subscriptions of our own age has borne so great a proportion to the means of the nation. [James frustrated its application. See No. 527.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6.

539. BENEVOLENCE, Ministerial. Thomas Coke. [Rev. Thomas Coke, LL.D., the first Bishop of the Methodist Church, won the title of the "Foreign Minister of Methodism." He crossed the Atlantic eighteen times, defraying himself the expenses. He represented] in his own person, down to his death, the whole missionary operations of Methodism, as their official and sole director, lavishing upon them his affluent fortune, and giving more money to religion than any other Methodist, if not any other Protestant, of his times. Dying at last a veteran of nearly seventy years, a missionary himself, on his way to the East, he was buried beneath the waters of the Indian Ocean.—STEVENS' M. E. CH., vol. 2, p. 154.

540. BENEVOLENCE misconstrued. Dr. Bateman. When Oates, after his scourging, was carried into Newgate insensible, and, as all thought, in the last agony, . . . he had been bled, and his wounds had been dressed by Bateman. This was an offence not to be forgiven. Bateman was arrested and indicted. The witnesses against him were men of infamous character—men, too, who were swearing away their own lives. None of them had yet got his pardon; and it was a popular saying, that they fished for prey, like tame cormorants, with ropes round their necks. The prisoner, stupefied by illness, was unable to articulate or to understand what passed. His son and daughter stood by him at the bar. They read as well as they could some notes which he had set down, and examined his witnesses. It was to little purpose. He was convicted, hanged, and quartered.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5.

541. BENEVOLENCE, Power of. John Howard. No man, perhaps, has ever had such power over criminals as John Howard. There was a terrible rebellion in one of the London prisons, when two hundred ruffians, driven mad by cruelty, were gathered in the prison-yard, threatening death to any man who should approach them. Howard insisted on going in among them, and did so, in spite of the advice of the jailers and the entreaties of his friends. His very appearance disarmed them, and they listened to his quiet and reasonable remonstrances in respectful silence. He listened patiently in his turn to a recital of their grievances, after which he pointed out the folly of their attempting to resist the authorities, advised them at once to submit, and promised to make their complaints known. They took his advice at length, and went peacefully to their cells.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 57.

542. BENEVOLENCE, Premature. Goldsmith's Father. We were told that universal benevolence was what first cemented society; we were taught to consider all the wants of mankind as our own; to regard the human face divine with affection and esteem; he wound us up to be mere machines of pity, and rendered us incapable of withstanding the slightest impulse made either by real or fictitious distress. In a word, we were perfectly instructed in the art of giving away thousands before we were taught the necessary qualifications of getting a farthing.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 2.

543. BENEVOLENCE, Pure. Goldsmith. He was engaged to breakfast with a college inmate one day, but failed to make his appearance. His friend repaired to his room, knocked at the door, and was bidden to enter. To his surprise he found Goldsmith in his bed, immersed to his chin in feathers. A serio-comic story explained the circumstance. In the course of the preceding evening's stroll he had met with a woman with five children who implored his charity. Her husband was in the hospital; she was just from the country, a stranger, and destitute, without food or shelter for her helpless offspring. This was too much for the kind heart of Goldsmith. He was almost as poor as herself, it is true, and had no money in his pocket; but he brought her to the college gate, gave her the blankets from his bed to cover her little brood, and part of his clothes he gave for her to sell and purchase food; and, finding himself cold during the night, had cut open his bed and buried himself among the feathers.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 2.

544. BENEVOLENCE, Religious. Mahomet. The charity of the Mohammedans descends to the animal creation; and the Koran repeatedly inculcates, not as a merit, but as a strict and indispensable duty, the relief of the indigent and unfortunate. Mahomet, perhaps, is the only law-giver who has defined the precise measure of charity; the standard may vary with the degree and nature of property, as it consists either in money, in corn or cattle, in fruits or merchandise; but the Mussulman does not accomplish the law unless he bestows a tenth of his revenue; and if his conscience accuses him of fraud or extortion, the tenth, under the idea of restitution, is enlarged to a fifth. Benevolence is the foundation of justice, since we are forbid to injure those whom we are bound to assist.—GIBBON'S MAHOMET, p. 28.

545. ———. Bishop Acacius. [Roman history mentions] the charity of a bishop, Acacius of Amida, whose name might have dignified the saintly calendar, shall not be lost in oblivion. Boldly declaring that vases of gold and silver are useless to a God who neither eats nor drinks, the generous prelate sold the plate of the church of Amida; employed the price in the redemption of seven thousand Persian captives; supplied their wants with affectionate liberality; and dismissed them to their native country, to inform their king of the true spirit of the religion which he persecuted.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 32.

546. ———. Lady Huntingdon. One day at court the then Prince of Wales asked Lady Charlotte E——, "Where is my Lady Huntingdon, that she is so seldom here?" The lady of fashion replied, with a sneer, "I suppose praying with her beggars." The prince shook his head, and said: "Lady Charlotte, when I am dying I think I shall be happy to seize the skirt of Lady Huntingdon's mantle, to carry me up with her to heaven."

547. BENEVOLENCE, Royal. Emp. Trajan. He was liberal in his donations to the people, but they were not, like those of other emperors, the mean bribes of a despot; they were the largesses of a beneficent prince, for the support of the wretched and indigent. The children of the poor were educated at his expense, and it was computed that two millions of destitute persons were maintained from his private purse. These charges were supplied by a well-ordered economy in his own fortune, and a regular administration of the public finances. He lived himself always with ancient simplicity, and he enriched the State by a careful attention to the minutest articles of public expenditure. Under this excellent mode of government everything enjoyed its due consideration.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1.

548. BENEVOLENCE, Self-sacrificing. John Howard. [Being sent for,] he was determined to go. The rain was falling in torrents—a cold December rain—and the wind was blowing a gale. As he could not, without much delay, procure a vehicle, he mounted an old dray horse and rode the twenty-four miles through the tempest. He arrived to find his patient dying [of hospital fever]. He tried, however, some powerful medicines upon her, with a view to excite perspiration; and, in order to ascertain whether they were producing the wished-for effect, he lifted the bedclothes and felt of her arm. As he did so, the effluvia from her body was so offensive that he could scarcely endure it. She died soon after, and he returned to Cherson. Three days later he was seized with the same fever. The exhaustion of his long and painful ride, and the shock to his feelings at finding his patient in the agonies of death, had rendered his system liable to the contagion, which had struck him, as he believed, at the moment of his lifting the bedclothes.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOGRAPHY, p. 76.

549. BENEVOLENCE, Systematic. John Wesley. When his own income was but £30 a year, he gave away £2; when it was £60, he still confined his expenses to £28, and gave away £32; when it reached £120, he kept himself to his old allowance, and gave away £92. The last insertion in his private journal, written with a trembling hand, reads thus: "For upward of eighty-six years I have kept my accounts exactly; I will not attempt it any longer, being satisfied with the continual conviction that I save all I can, and give all I can—that is, all I have."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 268.

550. BENEVOLENCE A Test. "Giving—living." A poor Christian woman living at some distance from Bristol, a cripple, who began by giving one penny per week out of her little earnings to the work on Ashley Down, was so blessed and prospered by the Lord, that in time she was able to afford a weekly contribution of six shillings for the orphans. Upon one occasion her gift was wrapped up in a little piece of paper, inside which these words were written: "Give; give; give; be ever giving. If you are living, you will be giving. Those who are not giving are not living."—LIFE OF GEORGE MÜLLER, p. 43.

551. BENEVOLENCE, Treasure of. Epitaph. The epitaph of Edward, surnamed, from his misfortune, the blind, from his virtues, the good, earl, inculcates with much ingenuity a moral sentence, which may, however, be abused by thoughtless generosity. After a grateful commemoration of the fifty-five years of union and happiness which he enjoyed with Mabel his wife, the good earl thus speaks from the tomb:

"What we gave, we have;
What we spent, we had;
What we left, we lost."

—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 61.

552. BENEVOLENCE, Unwise. Legacy. [A lady writes:] "Mrs. Williams was blind before she was acquainted with Dr. Johnson. She had many resources, though none very great. With the Miss Wilkinsons she generally passed a part of the year, and received from them presents, and from the first who died a legacy of clothes and money. The last of them, Mrs. Jane, left her an annual rent; but from the blundering manner of the will, I fear she never reaped the benefit of it. That lady left money to erect an hospital for ancient maids; but the number she had allotted being too great for the donation, the Doctor [Johnson] said it would be better to expunge the word maintain, and put in to starve such a number of old maids. They asked him, What name should be given it? He replied, 'Let it be called Jenny's Whim'—the name of a well-known tavern near Chelsea, in former days."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 128.

553. ——. Creating Poverty. Thomas Firmin, a London citizen, was one of the leading advocates of the popular schemes of that day [1698], "for setting the poor to work"—that is, by providing the labor out of a common public stock, which could not be provided by commercial enterprise, and thus increasing production without reference to the demand of the consumers, or making more poor by underselling the producers who were previously in the market.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 13, p. 205.

554. BEQUESTS for Spiritual Benefits. Ecclesiastical. [A.D. 1450-1485.] The wills of the period afford unquestionable evidence of the constant presence of the spiritual adviser. . . . Monkeys bequeathed to the high altar of the abbey or parish-church; requiems to be said, in rich vestments appropriated for the special purpose, with a yearly reward to the priests; a newly painted image of "Our Lady," to be set up, with a taper ever burning; the chimes in the steeple to be repaired; a priest to have a house to dwell in, and at every meal to repeat the name of the testator, that they that hear it may say, "God have mercy on his soul," which greatly may relieve him. . . . It was this undoubted confidence in the prayers of the priesthood that made the church so rich and powerful.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 8, p. 126.

555. BEREAVEMENT, Comfort in. Cromwell. During the periods between the paroxysms of the fever, he occupied the time with listening to passages from the sacred volume, or by a resigned or despairing reference to the death of his daughter. "Read to me," he said to his wife in one of those intervals, "the Epistle of St. Paul to the Philippians." She read these words: "I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: everywhere and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I can do all things through Christ, which strengtheneth me." The reader paused. "That verse," said Cromwell, "once saved my life when the death of my eldest born, the infant Oliver, pierced my heart like the sharp blade of a poniard."—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 77.

556. BEREAVEMENT, Depression by. Southey. [His son Herbert died when nine years old.] From his early discipline in the stoical philosophy some help now was gained; from his active and elastic mind the gain was more; but these would have been insufficient to support him without a heartfelt and ever-present faith that what he had lost was not lost forever. A great change had indeed come upon him. He set his house in order, and made arrangements as if his own death were at hand. He resolved not to be unhappy, but the joyousness of his disposition had received its death-wound; he felt as if he had passed at once from boyhood to the decline of life. He tried dutifully to make head against his depression, but at times with poor success.—DOWDEN'S SOUTHEY, ch. 6.

557. BEREAVEMENT, Distress of. Abraham Lincoln. In the spring of 1862 the President spent several days at Fortress Monroe, awaiting military operations on the Peninsula. . . . His favorite diversion was reading Shakespeare. . . .

One day . . . opening to King John, he read from the third act the passage in which Constance bewails her imprisoned boy. . . . Mr. Lincoln said: "Colonel, did you ever dream of a lost friend, and feel that you were holding sweet communion with that friend, and yet have a sad consciousness that it was not a reality? Just so I dream of my boy Willie." Overcome with emotion, he dropped his head on the table and sobbed aloud.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 756.

558. BEREAVEMENT, Fictitious. Queen Anne. [When Queen Anne lost her husband, Mrs. Freeman wrote:] her love to the prince seemed, in the eyes of the world, to be prodigiously great; and great as was the passion of her grief, her stomach was greater, for that very day he died she ate three very large and hearty meals. [She spent much of her time in retirement in the room where he loved to sit, but it was afterward discovered that it was owing to the convenience which it gave to court intriguers to reach her by the back stairs.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 22, p. 339.

559. BEREAVEMENT, Forgetting. Cares. After dinner Dr. Johnson wrote a letter to Mrs. Thrale, on the death of her son. I said it would be very distressing to Thrale, but she would soon forget it, as she had so many things to think of. JOHNSON: "No, sir; Thrale will forget it first. She has many things that she may think of. He has many things that he must think of." This was a very just remark upon the different effects of those light pursuits which occupy a vacant and easy mind, and those serious engagements which arrest attention and keep us from brooding over grief.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 286.

560. BEREAVEMENT, Memory of. Poet Wordsworth. "Referring once," says his friend Mr. Aubrey de Vere, "to two young children of his who had died about forty years previously, he described the details of their illnesses with an exactness and an impetuosity of troubled excitement such as might have been expected if the bereavement had taken place but a few weeks before. The lapse of time seemed to have left the sorrow submerged indeed, but still in all its first freshness.—MYER'S WORDSWORTH, ch. 8.

561. BEREAVEMENT, Tears of. Daniel Webster. In due time a daughter was born to them, the little Grace Webster who was so wonderfully precocious and agreeable. Unhappily, she inherited her mother's delicate constitution, and she died in childhood. Three times in his life, it is said, Daniel Webster wept convulsively. One of these occasions was when he laid upon the bed this darling girl, who had died in his arms, and turned away from the sight of her lifeless body.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 465.

562. BEREAVEMENT, Weakness in. James Watt. [His wife died when he was absent from home.] She had struggled with him through poverty; had often cheered his fainting spirit when borne down by doubt, perplexity, and disappointment; and often afterward he paused on the threshold of his house, unable to summon courage to enter the room where he was never more to meet "the comfort of his life."—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 38.

563. BETROTHMENT, Early. First Robert Peel. William Yates' eldest child was a girl, named Ellen, and she very soon became an especial favorite with the young lodger. On returning from his hard day's work, he would take the little girl upon his knee, and say to her: "Nelly, thou bonny little dear, wilt be my wife?" to which the child would readily answer, "Yes," as any child would do. "Then I'll wait for thee, Nelly; I'll wed thee, and none else." And Robert Peel did wait. As the girl grew in beauty toward womanhood, his determination to wait for her was strengthened; and after the lapse of ten years—years of close application to business and rapidly-increasing prosperity—Robert Peel married Ellen Yates when she had completed her seventeenth year.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 716.

564. BIBLE, Adaptation of the. Colonial Congress. A.D. 1774. [New Englanders present] believed that a rude soldiery were then . . . taking the lives of their friends. When the psalm for the [second] day was read, it seemed as if Heaven itself was uttering its oracle. "O Lord, fight Thou against them that fight against me! Let them that imagine mischief for me, be as dust before the wind. Lord, who is like unto Thee, who deliverest the poor from him that is too strong for him? Lord, how long wilt Thou look on? Awake, and stand up to judge my quarrel; avenge Thou my cause, my God and my Lord. And as for my tongue, it shall be talking of Thy righteousness and of Thy praise all the day long." After this the [Episcopal minister, Rev. Duche] unexpectedly burst into an extempore prayer for America, for Congress, for Massachusetts, and especially for Boston, with the earnestness of the best divines of New England.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 11.

565. BIBLE, Comfort from the. Burning of Deerfield, Mass. A.D. 1704. "On the last night in February . . . at the approach of morning the unfaithful sentinels retired . . . [the French and Indians soon followed within the palisades]. The village was burnt . . . but few escaped: forty-seven were killed; one hundred and twelve, including the minister and his family, were made captives. One hour after sunrise the party began its return to Canada. But who would know the horrors of that winter march through the wilderness? Two men starved to death. Did a young child weep from fatigue, or a feeble woman totter from anguish under the burden of her own offspring, the tomahawk stilled complaint, or the helpless infant was cast out upon the snow. Eunice Williams, the wife of the minister, had not forgotten her Bible; and when they rested by the wayside, or at night made their couch of branches of evergreen strewn on the snow, the savages allowed her to read it. Having but recently recovered from confinement, her strength failed . . . she commended her five captive children, under God, to their father's care; and then one blow from a tomahawk ended her sorrows.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 21.

566. BIBLE, Diffusion of the. Tyndale. Tyndale passed from Oxford to Cambridge to feel the full impulse given by the appearance there of the New Testament of Erasmus. From that moment one thought was at his heart. He "perceived by experience how that it was impossible to establish the lay people in any truth except the Scripture were plainly laid before their eyes in their mother tongue." "If God spare my life," he said to a learned controversialist, "ere many years I will cause a boy that driveth the plough shall know more of the Scripture than thou dost." But he was a man of forty before his dream became fact . . . it was soon needful to quit England if his purpose was to hold. "I understood at the last not only that there was no room in my Lord of London's palace to translate the New Testament, but also that there was no place to do it in all England.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 543.

567. BIBLE, Discoveries in the. Martin Luther. Although he had been a jovial young fellow, he began his studies in the morning with a heart-felt prayer and by attending a church service. He also spent considerable of his time in the library of the university. Here, on one occasion, he found a Latin Bible, a book that he had never seen until his twentieth year. Greatly astonished, he noticed that there were many more texts, epistles, and gospels than he had read in the pericopes of the church or heard explained in the pulpit. And as he turned over the pages of the Old Testament, his attention was arrested by the story of Samuel and Hannah, which he hurriedly read with great joy.—REIN'S LUTHER, p. 28.

568. BIBLE displaced. By Gloves. [At the solemn entry of Philip and Mary into London, in 1554, shortly after their marriage,] among other decorations of the public places, the conduit in Grace Church Street was painted with devices of the nine worthies, and of Henry VIII. [the father of the queen] and Edward VI. Henry was represented with a Bible in his hand, on which was written Verbum Dei. The Bishop of Winchester, noting the book in Henry VIII's hand, shortly afterward called the painter before him, and with vile words, calling him traitor, asked why, and who bade him describe King Henry with a book in his hand, as is aforesaid, threatening him therefore to go to the Fleet. The painter humbly apologized, and said he thought he had done well. "Nay," said the bishop, "it is against the queen's Catholic proceedings." And so he painted him shortly after, instead of the book of Verbum Dei, to have in his hands a new pair of gloves.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 5, p. 75.

569. BIBLE doubted. John Bunyan. [Before his conversion] Bunyan was hardly dealt with. "Whole floods of blasphemies," he says, "against God, Christ, and the Scriptures, were poured upon my spirit; questions against the very being of God and of His only beloved Son, as whether there was in truth a God or Christ or no, and whether the Holy Scriptures were not rather a fable and cunning story than the holy and pure Word of God." "How can you tell," the tempter whispered, "but that the Turks have as good a Scripture to prove their Mahomet the Saviour, as we have to prove our Jesus is? Could I think that so many tens of thousands, in so many countries and kingdoms, should be without the knowledge of the right way to heaven—if there were indeed a heaven—and that we who lie in a corner of the earth should alone be blessed therewith? Every one doth think his own religion the rightest—both Jews, Moors, and Pagans; and how if all our faith, and Christ, and Scripture should be but 'a think so' too?"—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 3.

570. BIBLE, The first. Eliot's. About half a century after King James' translation of the Bible Massachusetts gave it, through Eliot, to her Indians—the first Bible printed in America.—STEVENS' M. E. CH., vol. 1, p. 21.

571. BIBLE, The best Gift. Coronation. [When Queen Elizabeth made her coronation progress, a great display was made by the people.] When she espied a pageant at the Little Conduit . . . a rest was made, and a Bible in English, richly covered, was let down unto her, by a silk lace, from a child that represented Truth. With both her hands she received it; then she kissed it, afterward applied it to her breast; and lastly held it up, thanking the city especially for that gift, and promising to be a diligent reader thereof.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 8, p. 111.

572. BIBLE, Imperilled by the. Richard Hunne. [In 1515 Richard Hunne was brought before the Bishop of London, charged with heresy. He] was terrified into an admission of some of the crimes of which he was accused, one of which was that he had in his possession the epistles and gospels in English, and "Wycliffe's damnable works." He was sent back to prison, and two days after was found hanging in his cell. A coroner's inquest charged the bishop's chancellor and other officers with murder, but it was maintained by them that the heretic had committed suicide. The bishop and clergy had the incredible folly to begin a new process of heresy against the dead body, which was adjudged guilty, and, according to the sentence, burnt in Smithfield.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 17, p. 277.

573. BIBLE, An incendiary. Reign of James II. The clergy were strictly charged not to reflect on the Roman Catholic religion in their discourses. The chancellor took on himself to send the macers of the Privy Council round to the few printers and booksellers who could then be found in Edinburgh, charging them not to publish any work without his license. It was well understood that this order was intended to prevent the circulation of Protestant treatises. One honest stationer told the messengers that he had in his shop a book which reflected, in very coarse terms, on popery, and begged to know whether he might sell it. They asked to see it, and he showed them a copy of the Bible.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6.

574. BIBLE indestructible. Persecution. The philosophers . . . had diligently studied the nature and genius of the Christian religion; and as they were not ignorant that the speculative doctrines of the faith were supposed to be contained in the writings of the prophets, of the evangelists, and of the apostles, they most probably suggested the order that the bishops and presbyters should deliver all their sacred books into the hands of the magistrates, who were commanded, under the severest penalties, to burn them in a public and solemn manner. By the same edict the property of the church was at once confiscated, and the several parts of which it might consist were either sold to the highest bidder, united to the Imperial domain, bestowed on the cities and corporations, or granted to the solicitations of rapacious courtiers. . . . The Christians, though they cheerfully resigned the ornaments of their churches, resolved not to interrupt their religious assemblies nor to deliver their sacred books to the flames.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16.

575. BIBLE, Influence of the. Cromwell. A great man is ever the personification of the spirit which breathes from time to time upon his age and country. The inspiration of Scripture predominated, in 1600, over the three kingdoms. Cromwell, more imbued than any other with this sentiment, was neither a politician nor an ambitious conqueror, nor an Octavius, nor a Cæsar. He was a Judge of the Old Testament; a sectarian of the greater power in proportion as he was more superstitious, more strict and narrow in his doctrines, and more fanatical. If his genius had surpassed his epoch he would have exercised less influence over the existing generation. His nature was less elevated than the part assigned to him; his religious bias constituted the half of his fortune.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 80.

576. BIBLE, Monopoly in the. British Monopoly. Where was there a house in the colonies that did not cherish, and did not possess, the English Bible? And yet to print that Bible in British America was prohibited as a piracy, and the Bible, except in the native savage districts, was never printed there till the land became free.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 12.

577. BIBLE omitted. Coronation of James II. James had ordered Sancroft to abridge the ritual. The reason publicly assigned was that the day was too short for all that was to be done; but whoever examines the changes which were made will see that the real object was to remove some things highly offensive to the religious feelings of a zealous Roman Catholic. . . . The ceremony of presenting the sovereign with a richly-bound copy of the English Bible, and of exhorting him to prize above all earthly treasures a volume which he had been taught to regard as adulterated with false doctrine, was omitted.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4.

578. BIBLE, A people's. Wycliffe. With the tacit approval of the primate of a church which, from the time of Wycliffe, had held the translation and reading of the Bible in the common tongue to be heresy and a crime punishable with fire, Erasmus boldly avowed his wish for a Bible open and intelligible to all. "I wish that even the weakest woman might read the gospels and the epistles of St. Paul. I wish that they were translated into all languages, so as to be read and understood not only by Scots and Irishmen, but even by Saracens and Turks. But the first step to their being read is to make them intelligible to the reader. I long for the day when the husbandman shall sing portions of them to himself as he follows the plough; when the weaver shall hum them to the tune of his shuttle; when the traveller shall while away with their stories the weariness of his journey."—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 518.

579. BIBLE, Prohibition of the. England. In 1543 an act was passed which limited the reading of the Bible and the New Testament in the English tongue to noblemen and gentlemen, and forbade the reading of the same to "the lower sort"—to artificers, prentices, journey-men, serving-men, husbandmen, and laborers, and to women, under pain of imprisonment.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 27, p. 445.

580. ———. Necessary. [Puerile objections, in 1547.] There was a Cambridge friar, just before the suppression of the monasteries, who denounced the reading of the Bible by the vulgar; for the baker, he said, who found it written that a little leaven would corrupt the whole lump, would give us bad bread; and the ploughman would be afraid to labor, when he learned that if he looked back from his plough he were unfit for the kingdom of heaven.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 29, p. 493.

581. BIBLE, Protected by the. John Knox. The young queen [Mary], feeling the necessity of securing the good-will of such a man, succeeded in attracting him to the palace. He appeared in his Calvinistic dress, a short cloak thrown over his shoulder, the Bible under his arm. "Satan," said he, "cannot prevail against a man whose left hand bears a light to illumine his right, when he searches the Holy Scriptures in the hours of night."—LAMARTINE'S MARY STUART, ch. 7.

582. BIBLE, Searching the "Bible Moths." There was wild enthusiasm enough in some of the followers of Whitefield and Wesley, . . . but these earnest men left a mark. . . . The obscure young students . . . were first called "Sacramentarians," then "Bible Moths," and finally "Methodists."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 7.

583. BIBLE, Three Senses in. Svedenborg. The Word does not belong to men alone, but is the possession likewise of the angels of heaven, to whom it wears different forms, according to their love and intelligence. In general it may be said to have three senses or meanings: First, a celestial sense, apprehended by the celestial or highest angels; secondly, a spiritual sense, apprehended by a lower range of angelic minds, the spiritual; and thirdly, a natural sense, with which we are all familiar, written down to the comprehension of the lowest, most worldly, and sensual of men—the Jews.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, p. 80.

584. BIBLE stimulates. Rev. Samuel Johnson. [Being a victim to the persecution of James II. against Protestants he was sentenced to be flogged for publishing a tract against the overthrow of Protestantism by the use of the army. He suffered with most courageous endurance.] His biographer says: "He observed afterward to one of his most intimate friends, that this text of Scripture, which came suddenly into his mind, 'He endured the cross, and despised the shame,' so much animated and supported him in his bitter journey that he could have sung a psalm while the executioner was doing his office, with as much composure and cheerfulness as ever he had done in the church; though, at the same time, he had a quick sense of every stripe which was given him, with a whip of nine cords knotted, to the number of three hundred and seventeen."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 25, p. 411.

585. BIBLE and Superstition, The. Carolina Indians. The Indians revered the volume rather than its doctrines; and, with a fond superstition, they embraced the book, kissed it, and held it to their breasts and heads, as if it had been an amulet. . . . As the colonists . . . had no women with them, there were some among the Indians who imagined the English were not born of woman, and therefore not mortal; that they were men of an old generation risen to immortality.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 3.

586. BIBLE-READING forbidden. England. [In 1547, in the] "Act for the advancement of religion," there was a special clause against persons not duly appointed reading the Bible aloud in any church. The man who sought to know the truth might muse over the chained volume, but he was not to read any portion of it to the less instructed bystanders. Noblemen and gentlemen might read the Bible aloud to their families. Ladies might only read it privately, and so also might merchants. The qualified permission to read the Scriptures [was] . . . extended to all but artificers, prentices, journeymen, and serving-men.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 29, p. 492.

587. BIGOTRY disclaimed. Prayer. In the Continental Congress, Mr. Jay, a member from New York, spoke against opening the proceedings with prayer, on the ground that as there were in that body Episcopalians, Quakers, Anabaptists, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists, they would hardly be able to join in the same act of worship. Thereupon Mr. Samuel Adams, a strict Congregationalist, arose and said he was no bigot, and could hear a prayer from a gentleman of piety and virtue who was, at the same time, a friend to his country. He then moved that Mr. Duché, an Episcopalian clergyman, read prayers to the Congress. The motion was carried, and the prayers were read.—AM. CYC., "SAMUEL ADAMS."

588. BIGOTRY, Papal. Pius V. [He had distinguished himself as an inquisitor.] A more furious bigot never sat on the papal throne; and his bigotry was more terrible from the circumstance that it was conscientious. When he sent a force to the aid of the French Catholics, he told their leader "to take no Huguenot prisoner, but instantly to kill every one that fell into his hands." When the savage Duke of Alva was butchering without remorse in the Netherlands, the Holy Father sent him a consecrated hat and sword, in admiration of his Christian proceedings.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 11, p. 167.

589. BIGOTRY, Protestant. Mary Stuart. [The evening before her execution Mary Stuart, Queen of Scots, desired the presence of her priest and almoner; but she was refused, and was informed that in the place of her confessor she might have the spiritual assistance of the Dean of Peterborough. She necessarily declined.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 13, p. 201.

590. BIGOTRY, Puritanism. In Prayer. [When the body of Charles I. was deposited in the vault for burial, the governor of St. George's Castle] forbade the church-service to be performed, through his bigoted resolve that the Common Prayer having been put down, he would not suffer it to be read in the garrison where he commanded.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 5, p. 115.

591. BIGOTRY, Strange. Pilgrims. At a session of the general court of the colony [of Massachusetts], held in 1631, a law was passed restricting the right of suffrage. It was enacted that none but members of the church should be permitted to vote at the colonial elections. The choice of governor, deputy-governor, and assistant councillors was thus placed in the hands of a small minority. Nearly three fourths of the people were excluded from exercising the rights of freemen. Taxes were levied for the support of the gospel; oaths of obedience to the magistrates were required; attendance upon public worship was enforced by law; none but church-members were eligible to officers of trust. It is strange that the very men that had so recently, through perils by sea and land, escaped with only their lives to find religious freedom in another continent, should have begun their career with intolerance and proscription. The only excuse that can be found for the gross inconsistency and injustice of such legislation is, that bigotry was the vice of the age rather than of the Puritans.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 13.

592. BIRTH, Accident of. Bonaparte. [Born] on the 15th of August, 1769 . . . [at Ajaccio, Corsica, recently won to France by arms]. Had the young Napoleon seen the light two months earlier, he would have been by birth an Italian, not a Frenchman.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 1.

593. BIRTH concealed. Abraham. The Ishmaelite Arabs . . . call in their books their father Abraham El Khalil-Allah, or the friend of God. His father Azor, say they, was one of the great vassals of Nimrod, a sort of fabulous Jupiter of the Babylonian Olympus. Nimrod, frightened by a prophecy which announced to him the birth of an infant superior to other men and to himself, forbade all intercourse between the sexes in his dominions. Abraham was born through a breach of this order. His parents, to elude the anger of Nimrod, concealed his birth. They had him hid and nursed in a cavern outside the city.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY.

594. BIRTH, Humble. Gabrini. In a quarter of the city [Rome] which was inhabited only by mechanics and Jews, the marriage of an inn-keeper and a washerwoman produced the future deliverer of Rome. From such parents Nicholas Rienzi Gabrini could inherit neither dignity nor fortune; and the gift of a liberal education, which they painfully bestowed, was the cause of his glory and untimely end.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 73, p. 471.

595. —. Rom. Emp. Diocletian. As the reign of Diocletian was more illustrious than that of any of his predecessors, so was his birth more abject and obscure. The strong claims of merit and of violence had frequently superseded the ideal prerogatives of nobility; but a distinct line of separation was hitherto preserved between the free and the servile part of mankind. The parents of Diocletian had been slaves in the house of Anulinus, a Roman senator, nor was he himself distinguished by any other name than that which he derived from a small town in Dalmatia, from whence his mother deduced her origin.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 13.

596. BIRTH, Superior to. Burns. Born in an age the most prosaic Britain had yet seen, and in a condition the most advantageous, where his mind, if it accomplished aught, must accomplish it under the pressure of continual bodily toil—nay, of penury and desponding apprehension of the worst evils—and with no furtherance but such knowledge as dwells in a poor man's hut, and the rhymes of a Ferguson or Ramsay for his standard of beauty, he sinks not under all these impediments. Through the fogs and darkness of that obscure region, his eagle eye discerns the true relations of the world and human life; he grows into intellectual strength, and trains himself into intellectual expertness. Impelled by the irrepressible movement of his inward spirit, he struggles forward into the general view, and with haughty modesty lays down before us, as the fruit of his labor, a gift which Time has now pronounced imperishable.—CARLYLE'S BURNS, p. 15.

597. BIRTH, A welcome. "The King of Rome." [Napoleon's second wife gave birth to a boy March 20, 1811.] If the child were a princess, twenty-one guns were to be fired; if a prince, one hundred. At six o'clock in the morning . . . all Paris was aroused by the deep booming of [cannon]. . . . Every window was thrown open. Every ear was on the alert. . . . Vast throngs stood motionless to count the tidings, which those explosions were thundering in their ears. . . . The twenty-first gun was fired. The interest was now intense beyond conception. For a moment the gunners delayed the next discharge, and Paris stood waiting in breathless suspense. The heavy loaded guns then, with redoubled voice, pealed forth the announcement. From the entire city one universal roar of acclamation rose, and blended with their thunders. . . . Who could then have imagined . . . that this child, the object of a nation's love and expectation, would linger through a few short years of neglect and sorrow, and then sink into a forgotten grave?—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 11.

598. BISHOP corrupted. Theodosius. In A.D. 389 the archiepiscopal throne of Alexandria was filled by Theodosius, the perpetual enemy of virtue—a bold, bad man, whose hands were alternately polluted with gold and blood. . . . When a sentence of destruction against the idols of Alexandria was pronounced, the Christians sent up a shout of joy. . . . Theophilus proceeded to demolish the temple of Serapis, without any other difficulties than those which he found in the weight and solidity of the materials; but these obstacles proved so insuperable, that he was obliged to leave the foundations, and to content himself with reducing the edifice itself to a heap of rubbish, a part of which was soon afterward cleared away, to make room for a church erected in honor of the Christian martyrs. The valuable library of Alexandria was pillaged or destroyed; and nearly twenty years afterward the appearance of the empty shelves excited the regret and indignation of every spectator, whose mind was not totally darkened by religious prejudice.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 28.

599. BISHOPS, Honored. Germans. The ancient Germans had the highest veneration for their priests. It was, therefore, natural for the Franks, after their conversion, to preserve the same reverence for the ministers of their new religion. We find that the bishops held the first place in the national assemblies. They were employed under Clotarius I. to correct the Salic and Riparian laws, and they had a sort of superintendence over the judicial tribunals. In the absence of the king, it was competent to appeal to the bishops from the sentences of the dukes and counts.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 2.

600. BLESSING, A diabolical. Martin Luther. After this interview [with the fanatic Karlstadt] Luther continued on his journey . . . to Orlamünde, headquarters of Karlstadt. But he accomplished nothing here; he narrowly escaped bodily violence. He himself narrates this experience: "When I reached Orlamünde I soon discovered what kind of seed Karlstadt had sown; for I was greeted with such a blessing as this: 'Depart in the name of a thousand devils, and may you break your neck before you leave the city!'"—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 14.

601. BLESSING disdained. Reign of James II. [Seven bishops had been imprisoned because they refused to aid the king in the overthrow of the Protestant faith.] Loud acclamations were raised. The steeples of the churches sent forth joyous peals. The bishops found it difficult to escape from the importunate crowd of their well-wishers. Lloyd was detained in Palace Yard by admirers who struggled to touch his hands and to kiss the skirt of his robe, till Clarendon, with some difficulty, rescued him and conveyed him home by a by-path. Cartwright, it is said, was so unwise as to mingle with the crowd. Some person who saw his episcopal habit asked and received his blessing. A bystander cried out, "Do you know who blessed you?" "Surely," said he who had just been honored by the benediction, "it was one of the seven." "No," said the other, "it is the popish Bishop of Chester." "Popish dog," cried the enraged Protestant, "take your blessing back again."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8.

602. BLESSING, A disguised. American Revolution. During his retreat across New Jersey, Washington had sent repeated despatches to General Lee, in command of the detachment at North Castle, to join the main army as soon as possible. Lee was a proud, insubordinate man, and virtually disobeyed his orders. Marching leisurely into New Jersey, he reached Morristown. Here he tarried, and took up his quarters at an inn at Baskingridge. On the 13th of December a squad of British cavalry dashed up to the tavern, seized Lee, and hurried him off to New York. General Sullivan, who had recently been exchanged, now took command of Lee's division, and hastened to join Washington.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 39.

603. BLINDNESS, Disqualified by. Persia. The crown of Persia is hereditary, with the exclusion of females from the succession; but the sons of a daughter are allowed to inherit the sovereignty. By the laws of Persia the blind are excluded from the throne. Hence it is a customary policy of the reigning prince to put out the eyes of all those of the blood royal of whom he has any jealousy.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 23.

604. BLINDNESS by Study. John Milton. His eyesight, though quick, as he was a proficient with the rapier, had never been strong. His constant headaches, his late study, and (thinks Phillips) his perpetual tampering with physic to preserve his sight, concurred to bring the calamity upon him. It had been steadily coming on for a dozen years before, and about 1650 the sight of the left eye was gone. He was warned by his doctor that if he persisted in using the remaining eye for book-work, he would lose that too. "The choice lay before me," Milton writes in the "Second Defence," "between dereliction of a supreme duty and loss of eyesight; in such a case I could not listen to the physician, not if Æsculapius himself had spoken from his sanctuary; I could not but obey that inward monitor, I know not what, that spake to me from heaven."—MILTON, BY M. PATTISON, ch. 9.

605. BLOCKADE by Chains. Mahomet II. He laid siege to Constantinople . . . while the indolent Greeks made a very feeble preparation for defence, trusting to an immense barricade of strong chains, which blocked up the entry to the port, and prevented all access to the enemy's ships. The genius of Mahomet very soon overcame this obstacle. He laid a channel of smooth planks for the length of six miles, resembling the frames which are constructed for the launching of ships. In one night's time he drew eighty galleys out of the water upon these planks, and next morning, to the utter astonishment of the besieged, an entire fleet descended at once into the bosom of their harbor. . . . Constantine, the emperor, was killed in the assault, and Mahomet immediately converted his palace into a seraglio, and the splendid church of Santa Sophia into a Mohammedan mosque. Thus ended the empire of the East, in the year 1453, eleven hundred and twenty-three years from the building of Constantinople by Constantine the Great.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 13.

606. BLOCKADE of Death. By Cæsar. [Thirty thousand soldiers had fallen.] Munda was at once blockaded, the inclosing wall—savage evidence of the temper of the conquerors—being built of dead bodies pinned together with lances, and on the top of it a fringe of heads on swords' points with the faces turned toward the town.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 25.

607. BLOT, Shameful. William Penn. [Young girls, by order of their schoolmistress, had presented a standard to the rebel Duke of Monmouth.] The queen's maids of honor asked the royal permission to wring money out of the parents of the poor children, and the permission was granted. . . . The maids of honor would not endure delay; they were determined to prosecute to outlawry, unless a reasonable sum were forthcoming; and by a reasonable sum was meant £7000. Warre excused himself from taking any part in a transaction so scandalous. The maids of honor then requested William Penn to act for them, and Penn accepted the commission; yet it should seem that a little of the pertinacious scrupulosity which he had often shown about taking off his hat would not have been altogether out of place on this occasion. He probably silenced the remonstrances of his conscience by repeating to himself that none of the money which he extorted would go into his own pocket; that if he refused to be the agent of the ladies, they would find agents less humane; that by complying he should increase his influence at the court, and that his influence at the court had already enabled him, and might still enable him, to render great services to his oppressed brethren. [More at No. 829.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5.

608. BLOT of the Times. Cæsar. The Gauls paid the expenses of their conquest in the prisoners taken in battle, who were sold to the slave merchants; and this is the real blot on Cæsar's career. But the blot was not personally upon Cæsar, but upon the age in which he lived. The great Pomponius Atticus himself was a dealer in human chattels. That prisoners of war should be sold as slaves was the law of the time, accepted alike by victors and vanquished; and the crowds of libertini who assisted at Cæsar's funeral proved that he was not regarded as the enemy of these unfortunates, but as their special friend.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 18.

609. BLUNDER by Inattention. Goldsmith. Lord Clare and the Duke of Northumberland had houses next to each other, of similar architecture. Returning home one morning from an early walk, Goldsmith, in one of his frequent fits of absence, mistook the house, and walked up into the duke's dining-room, where he and the duchess were about to sit down to breakfast. Goldsmith, still supposing himself in the house of Lord Clare, and that they were visitors, made them an easy salutation, being acquainted with them, and threw himself on a sofa in the lounging manner of a man perfectly at home. The duke and duchess soon perceived his mistake, and, while they smiled internally, endeavored, with the consideration of well-bred people, to prevent any awkward embarrassment.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 30.

610. BOARD, Prayers exchanged for. Napoleon I. The French emigrant priests were quite a burden on the convents of Italy, where they had taken refuge [from Jacobin fury], and the Italian priests were quite ready, upon the arrival of the French army, to drive them away, on the pretext that by harboring the emigrants they should draw upon themselves the vengeance of the Republican army. Napoleon issued a decree commanding the convents to . . . furnish them everything necessary for their support and comfort. In . . . a vein of latent humor, he enjoined that the French priests should make remuneration for this hospitality in prayers and masses at the regular market-price.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 7.

611. BOASTING of Pride. Bajazet I. In the battle of Nicopolis, Bajazet [the Turk] defeated a confederate army of a hundred thousand Christians, who had proudly boasted that if the sky should fall, they could uphold it on their lances. The far greater part were slain or driven into the Danube; and Sigismond, escaping to Constantinople by the river and the Black Sea, returned after a long circuit to his exhausted kingdom. In the pride of victory, Bajazet threatened that he would besiege Buda; that he would subdue the adjacent countries of Germany and Italy; and that he would feed his horse with a bushel of oats on the altar of St. Peter at Rome. His progress was checked, not by the miraculous interposition of the apostle, not by a crusade of the Christian powers, but by a long and painful fit of the gout. The disorders of the moral are sometimes corrected by those of the physical world; and an acrimonious humor falling on a single fibre of one man may prevent or suspend the misery of nations.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51.

612. BOASTING, Ridiculous, Inventor. Once, when checking my boasting too frequently of myself in company, he said to me: "Boswell, you often vaunt so much as to provoke ridicule. You put me in mind of a man who was standing in the kitchen of an inn with his back to the fire, and thus accosted the person next him: 'Do you know, sir, who I am?' 'No, sir,' said the other, 'I have not that advantage.' 'Sir,' said he, 'I am the great Truismley, who invented the New Floodgate Iron.'" [Note.] It was neither more nor less than a kind of box-iron for smoothing linen.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 489.

613. BOASTING, Senseless. New York. A.D. 1765. "I will cram the stamps down their throats with the end of my sword," cried the braggart James, major of artillery, as he busied himself with bringing into the fort more field-pieces, as well as powder, shot, and shells. "If they attempt to rise, I," he gave out, "will drive them all out of town for a pack of rascals, with four and twenty men."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 17.

614. BOASTING, Vain. Persians. The Miranes of Persia advanced, with 40,000 of her best troops, to raze the fortifications of Dara, and signified the day and the hour on which the citizens should prepare a bath for his refreshment, after the toils of victory. He encountered an adversary equal to himself, by the new title of General of the East; his superior in the science of war, but much inferior in the number and quality of his troops, which amounted only to 25,000 Romans and strangers relaxed in their discipline, and humbled by recent disasters. On the level plain of Dara the standard of Persia fell; the immortals fled, the infantry threw away their bucklers, and 8000 of the vanquished fell before the Roman swords [under Belisarius] on the field of battle.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41.

615. BODY, Crippled. Timour the Tartar. The fame of Timour has pervaded the East and West—his posterity is still invested with the imperial title—and the admiration of his subjects, who revered him almost as a deity, may be justified in some degree by the praise or confession of his bitterest enemies. Although he was lame of a hand and foot, his form and stature were not unworthy of his rank; and his vigorous health, so essential to himself and to the world, was corroborated by temperance and exercise.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65.

616. BODY, Perfect. American Indians. How rare is it to find the red-man squint-eyed, or with a diseased spine, halt or blind, or with any deficiency or excess in the organs! . . . The most refined nation is most liable to produce varieties, and to degenerate.—BANCROFT'S HIST. U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

617. BOLDNESS, Verbal. Goldsmith. Goldsmith one day brought to the club a printed ode, which he, with others, had been hearing read by its author in a public room, at the rate of five shillings each for admission. One of the company having read it aloud, Dr. Johnson said: "Bolder words and more timorous meaning, I think, never were brought together.”—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 433.

618. BOMBAST rebuked. “Jupiter.” Mene-crates, the physician, having succeeded in some desperate cases, got the surname of Jupiter. And he was so vain of the appellation, that he made use of it in a letter to the king. “Mene-crates Jupiter to King Agesilaus, health.” His answer began thus: “King Agesilaus to Mene-crates, his senses.”—PLUTARCH.

619. BOMBAST, Ridiculous. James I. [James told his disobedient Parliament:] My integrity is like the whiteness of my robe, my purity like the metal of gold in my crown, my firmness and clearness like the precious stones I wear, and my affections natural, like the redness of my heart.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 23, p. 364.

620. BONDS inflated. Louis XIV. The king wished to give one more of his grand festivals at Versailles, and ordered his Minister of Finance to provide the money—4,000,000 francs. The treasury was empty, and the credit of the government was gone. A royal bond of 100 francs was worth 35 francs. One day when the minister was pacing his antechamber, considering how he should raise the sum required, he perceived, through an open door, two of his servants looking over the papers on his desk. An idea darted into his mind. He drew up the scheme of a grand lottery, which he pretended was designed to pay off a certain description of bonds. This scheme, half written out, he left upon his desk, and remained absent for a considerable time. His two lackeys were, as he supposed, employed by stock-jobbers to discover the intentions of the government with regard to the issue and redemption of its bonds. They did their work, and at once the bonds began to rise in price, and went up in a few days from thirty-five to eighty-five. When they had reached the price last named, and were in active demand, the minister issued and slipped upon the market new bonds enough to furnish him with the needful 4,000,000 francs. The trick was soon discovered, and the bonds dropped to twenty-eight.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG. p. 465.

621. BOOK, A great Gift. Petrarch. [The first of Latin scholars in his day.] The manifold avocations of Petrarch, love and friendship, his various correspondence and frequent journeys, the Roman laurel, and his elaborate compositions in prose and verse, in Latin and Italian, diverted him from a foreign idiom; and as he advanced in life, the attainment of the Greek language was the object of his wishes rather than of his hopes. When he was about fifty years of age, a Byzantine ambassador, his friend, and a master of both tongues, presented him with a copy of Homer; and the answer of Petrarch is at once expressive of his eloquence, gratitude, and regret. After celebrating the generosity of the donor, and the value of a gift more precious in his estimation than gold or rubies, he thus proceeds: “Your present of the genuine and original text of the divine poet, the fountain of all invention, is worthy of yourself and of me; you have fulfilled your promise, and satisfied my desires. Yet your liberality is still imperfect; with Homer you should have given me yourself—a guide who could lead me into the fields of light, and disclose to my wondering eyes the specious miracles of the Iliad and Odyssey. But, alas! Homer is dumb, or I am deaf; nor is it in my power to enjoy the beauty which I possess. I have seated him by the side of Plato, the prince of poets near the prince of philosophers; and I glory in the sight of my illustrious guests.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 66.

622. BOOK, Undelivered. Samuel Johnson. He this year resumed his scheme of giving an edition of Shakespeare with notes. He issued proposals of considerable length, . . . but his indolence prevented him from pursuing it with that diligence which alone can collect those scattered facts, that genius, however acute, penetrating, and luminous, cannot discover by its own force. . . . Yet nine years elapsed before it saw the light. His throes in bringing it forth had been severe and remittent; and at last we may almost conclude that the Cæsarean operation was performed by the knife of Churchill, whose upbraiding satire, I dare say, made Johnson's friends urge him to despatch.

“He for subscribers baits his hook,
And takes your cash; but where's the book?
No matter where; wise fear, you know,
Forbids the robbing of a foe;
But what, to serve our private ends,
Forbids the cheating of our friends?”

—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 85.

623. BOOKS burned. By Hangman. [During the reign of James II. and William III.] seditious, treasonable, and unlicensed books and pamphlets [were burned by the hangman at Charing Cross, by order of Parliament].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 10, p. 158.

624. BOOKS, Dearth of. England. An esquire passed among his neighbors for a great scholar if Hudibras and Baker's Chronicle, Tarlton's Jests and the Seven Champions of Christendom lay in his hall window among the fishing-rods and fowling-pieces. No circulating library, no book society then existed even in the capital; but in the capital those students who could not afford to purchase largely had a resource. The shops of the great booksellers, near Saint Paul's Churchyard, were crowded every day and all day long with readers, and a known customer was often permitted to carry a volume home. . . . As to the lady of the manor and her daughters, their literary stores generally consisted of a prayer-book and a receipt-book. . . . But during the latter part of the seventeenth century, the culture of the female mind seems to have been almost entirely neglected. If a damsel had the least smattering of literature, she was regarded as a prodigy.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3.

625. BOOKS, Divine. Zendavesta. To the first Zoroaster is attributed the composition of the “Zendavesta,” a collection of books which he pretended, like the Roman Numa, to have received from heaven. These books he presented to his sovereign Gustashp, the King of Bactriana; and confirmed their authority, and his own divine mission, by performing, as is said, some very extraordinary miracles. Gustashp became a convert, and abjured, along with the greater part of his subjects, the worship of the stars, represented by several idols, which was then the prevalent religion of those countries, and was termed Sabaism.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 11.

626. BOOKS, Enchanted by. Washington Irving. From his eleventh year he was passionately fond of reading voyages and travels, a little library of which was within his reach; and he used to secrete candles to enable him to read these transporting works in bed. The perusal of such books gave him a strong desire to go to sea, and at fourteen he had almost made up his mind to run away and be a sailor. But there was a difficulty in the way. He had a particular aversion to salt pork, which he endeavored to overcome by eating it at every opportunity. He also endeavored to accustom himself to a hard bed by sleeping on the floor of his room. Fortunately for the infant literature of his country, the pork grew more disgusting instead of less, and the hard floor became harder, until he gave up his purpose of trying a sailor's life.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 719.

627. BOOKS, Forbidden. Reign of Elizabeth. "Whereas divers books," ran a royal proclamation, "filled with heresy, sedition, and treason, have of late and be daily brought into the realm out of foreign countries and places beyond seas, and some also covertly printed within this realm and cast abroad in sundry parts thereof, whereby not only God is dishonored but also encouragement is given to disobey lawful princes and governors," any person possessing such books "shall be reported and taken for a rebel, and shall without delay be executed for that offence according to the order of martial law."—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 686.

628. BOOKS, Passion for. Dr. Harvey. [The famous Dr. Harvey was attending physician to Charles I. During the fight at Edgehill, at the commencement of the Revolution, he withdrew under a hedge, took a book out of his pocket and began to read; but he had not read long before a bullet grazed the ground near him, and caused him to remove.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 1, p. 6.

629. BOOKS, Publication of. Restricted. [In 1662] the number of master printers in London was limited to twenty; no books were allowed to be printed out of London, except at the two universities and at York; and all unlicensed books were to be seized, and the publisher punished with heavy penalties.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 17.

630. BOOKS rejected. By Publishers. Milton could with difficulty find a publisher for his "Paradise Lost;" Crabbe's "Library" and other poems were refused by Dodsley, Beckett, and other London publishers, though Mr. Murray many years after purchased the copyright of them for £3000. Keats could only get a publisher by the aid of his friends. . . . "Robinson Crusoe" was refused by one publisher after another, and at last sold to an obscure bookseller for a trifle. . . . Bulwer's "Pelham" was at first rejected. . . . The "Vestiges of Creation" was repeatedly refused. Thackeray's "Vanity Fair" was rejected by a magazine. "Mary Burton" and "Jane Eyre" went the round of the trade. Howard offered his "Book of the Seasons" to successive publishers. . . . "Uncle Tom's Cabin" could scarcely find a publisher in London.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 506.

631. BOOKS, Religious. Samuel Johnson. I fell into an inattention to religion, or an indifference about it, in my ninth year. The church at Lichfield, in which we had a seat, wanted reparation, so I was to go and find a seat in other churches; and having bad eyes, and being awkward about this, I used to go and read in the fields on Sunday. This habit continued till my fourteenth year, and still I find a great reluctance to go to church. I then became a sort of lax talker against religion, for I did not much think against it; and this lasted till I went to Oxford, where it would not be suffered. When at Oxford I took up Law's "Serious Call to a Holy Life," expecting to find it a dull book (as such books generally are), and perhaps to laugh at it. But I found Law quite an overmatch for me; and this was the first occasion of my thinking in earnest of religion, after I became capable of rational inquiry.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 18.

632. BOOKS, Scarcity of. Age of Charlemagne. The low state of literature may be figured from the extreme scarcity of books, the subjects on which they were written, and the very high estimation which was put upon them by those who possessed them. The gift of a trifling manuscript to a monastery of the life of a saint was sufficient to entitle the donor to the perpetual prayers of the brotherhood, and a mass to be celebrated forever for the salvation of his soul. A complete copy of the sacred Scriptures given to a city or State was esteemed a princely donation. The reputation of learning was then acquired at a very easy rate. Extracts from the different works of the Fathers literally transcribed, and often patched together without order or connection, compose the valuable works of those luminaries and instructors of the age; nothing was more common than those commentaries, called "Catene," which were illustrations of some of the books of Scripture, by borrowing sentences successively from half a dozen of the Fathers, making each to illustrate a verse in his turn.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 8.

633. BOOTY, Division of. Trojan War. The troops had no regular pay; they served at their own charges alone. The levies were made by a general law obliging each family to furnish a soldier, under a certain penalty. The only recompense for the service of individuals was their rated share of the booty, for none were allowed to plunder for themselves; everything was brought into a common stock, and the division was made by the chiefs, who had a larger proportion for their share.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 8.

634. BOY, An enchanted. David Crockett. [At Baltimore he saw a ship for the first time.] As he stood on the dock, gazing at the ship with open eyes and mouth, bewildered at the sight, one of the sailors accosted him and asked him if he would not like to go to Liverpool. Forgetting his engagement with the wagoner, he joyfully consented, and rushed off to the wagon to get his clothes, although ten minutes before he did not know that there was such a thing as a ship in the world. The wagoner positively refused to let him go. Watching his chance, however, he bundled up his clothes and started for the wharf; but it so chanced that, in turning the corner of a crowded street, he came full upon his master, who collared him and brought him back.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 664.

635. BOY, A precocious. Themistocles. [Themistocles, the prudent general,] when a boy, was full of spirit and fire, quick of apprehension, naturally inclined to bold attempts, and likely to make a great statesman. His hours of leisure and vacation he spent, not, like other boys, in idleness and play; but he was always inventing and composing declamations, the subjects of which were either the impeachment or defence of some of his school-fellows; so that his master would often say: "Boy, you will be nothing common or indifferent; you will either be a blessing or a curse to the community."—PLUTARCH.

636. ———. The New England Courant. A.D. 1721. Benjamin [Franklin] . . . a boy of fifteen who wrote pieces for its humble columns, worked in composing the types, as well as in printing off the sheets, and himself, as carrier, distributed the papers to customers.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 23.

637. BOY, A reformed. David Crockett. [He ran away from home, and after two years' absence he returned on a winter eve. He had a joyful welcome.] He now set at work in earnest to assist his old father, to whom he had not given much help or comfort hitherto. By six months' hard work he paid one of his father's debts, which had caused the old man much anxiety. Then he worked six months more to cancel a note of $30 which his father had given, and brought it to his father as a present. Next he went to work for sundry other months, until he had provided himself with a supply of decent clothes. He was now nearly twenty years of age, and being much mortified with his inability to read or write, he made a bargain with a Quaker schoolmaster, agreeing to work two days on the Quaker's farm for every three that he attended his school. He picked up knowledge rapidly, and after six months of this arrangement he could read, write, and cipher sufficiently well for the ordinary purposes of life on the frontier.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 665.

638. BOY, Runaway. Benjamin Franklin. A.D. 1723. Vexed with the arbitrary proceedings of the [Massachusetts] assembly [which required his brother's paper to be supervised] . . . indignant also at the tyranny of a brother who, as a passionate master, often beat his apprentice . . . but seventeen years old, sailed clandestinely for New York; and, finding there no employment, crossed to Amboy; went on foot to the Delaware; for want of a wind rowed in a boat from Burlington to Philadelphia; and bearing the marks of his labor at the oar, weary, hungry, having . . . a single dollar . . . the runaway apprentice—greatest of the sons of New England of that generation . . . stepped on shore to seek food, occupation, shelter, and fortune.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 23.

639. BOY, A "scientific." Robert Stephenson. Occasionally Robert experimented . . . upon the cows in Wigham's enclosure, which he electrified by means of his electric kite, making them run about the field with their tails on end.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 57.

640. BOYHOOD, Dull. Oliver Goldsmith. Oliver's education began when he was about three years old—that is to say, he was gathered under the wings of one of those good old motherly dames, found in every village, who cluck together the whole callow brood of the neighborhood, to teach them their letters and keep them out of harm's way. . . . Apparently he did not much profit by it, for she confessed he was one of the dullest boys she had ever dealt with, inasmuch that she had sometimes doubted whether it was possible to make anything of him: a common case with imaginative children, who are apt to be beguiled from the dry abstractions of elementary study by the picturings of the fancy.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, p. 15.

641. BOYHOOD, Humble. Pizarro. In former times the farmers of Spain let their pigs roam in large droves in the forests, attended by a boy, who kept them from wandering too far, and drove them at night to an enclosure near home. Pizarro, the conqueror of Peru, was one of these pig-tenders when Columbus discovered America in 1492. He was then seventeen years of age—a rude, tough, wilful lad, ignorant of everything except the manners and customs of the animals he drove. To his dying day he could not write his name or read a sentence. . . . Here was a strange piece of timber to make a conqueror of—a swineherd, an illegitimate son, ignorant, living in a secluded region, and regarded by his own father as the meanest of his servants.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 323.

642. BOYHOOD, Ingenuity in. Sir Isaac Newton. His favorite playthings were little saws, hammers, chisels, and hatchets, with which he made many curious and ingenious machines. There was a windmill in course of erection near his home. He watched the workmen with the greatest interest, and constructed a small model of the mill, which, one of his friends said, was "as clean and curious a piece of workmanship as the original." He was dissatisfied, however, with his mill, because it would not work when there was no wind; and therefore he added to it a contrivance by which it could be kept in motion by a mouse. He made a water-clock, the motive-power of which was the dropping of water on a wheel. . . . He constructed also a four-wheeled carriage, propelled by the person sitting in it. To amuse his schoolfellows, he made very ingenious kites, to the tails of which he attached lanterns of crumpled paper, which, being lighted by a candle, and sent up in the evening, alarmed the rustics of the parish. Observing the shadows of the sun, he marked the hours and half hours by driving in pegs on the side of the house, and at length perfected the sun-dial which is still shown.—PARTON'S NEWTON, p. 75.

643. BRAVERY in Battle. Persians. [When the Romans besieged and captured Petra they were met by valiant men.] Of the Persian garrison, 700 perished in the siege, 2800 survived to defend the breach. One thousand and seventy were destroyed with fire and sword in the last assault; and if 730 were made prisoners, only 18 among them were found without the marks of honorable wounds. The remaining 500 escaped into the citadel, which they maintained without any hopes of relief, rejecting the fairest terms of capitulation and service, till they were lost in the flames. They died in obedience to the commands of their prince. — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 42.

644. — — —. 20,000 against 400,000. [When the French and Venetian crusaders had taken the suburbs of Constantinople, their zeal was fired for greater heroism.] By these daring achievements, a remnant of 20,000 Latins solicited the license of besieging a capital which contained above 400,000 inhabitants, able, though not willing, to bear arms in defence of their country. — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 60.

645. BRAVERY, Brilliant. Paul Jones. [At Whitehaven the harbor contained 300 vessels.] At daybreak, with two boats and thirty-one men, he landed on a wharf of the town, provided with a lantern and two tar-barrels. He went alone to a fort defending the town, and, finding it deserted, climbed over the wall, and spiked every gun, without alarming the garrison, who were all asleep in the guard-house near by. Then he surrounded the guard-house, and took every man prisoner. Next, he sprang into the only other fort remaining, and spiked its guns. All this, which was the work of ten minutes, was accomplished without noise and without resistance. The ships being then at his mercy, he made a bonfire in the steerage of one of them, which blazed up through the hatchway, while Jones and his men stood by, pistol in hand, to keep off the people, whom the flames had alarmed, and who now came running down to the shore in hundreds. To the forts! was the cry. But the forts were harmless. When the fire had made such headway that the destruction of the whole fleet seemed certain, Captain Jones gave the order to embark. He was the last to take his place in the boat. He moved off leisurely from the shore, and regained his ship without the loss of a man. The people, however, succeeded in confining the fire to two or three ships. But the whole coast was panic-stricken. Every able-bodied man joined the companies of patrolmen. It was many a month before the inhabitants of that shore went to sleep at night without a certain dread of Paul Jones. — CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 335.

646. BRAVERY in Death. Colonel Frank McCullough. [This Confederate guerrilla was captured in Missouri by the Union army.] A court-martial was held, and he was sentenced to be shot. . . . He received the information of his fate with perfect composure, but protested against it. Leaning against the fence, he wrote a few lines to his wife. These, with his watch, he delivered to the officer to be given to her. Upon the way to his execution, he requested the privilege to give the command to fire, which was granted. All being ready, he said: "What I have done, I have done as a principle of right. Aim at the heart. Fire!" — POLLARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 6, p. 173.

647. BRAVERY, Example of. Napoleon I. [In the terrible reverses which followed Napoleon, he met the Allies at Arcis.] A live shell having fallen in front of one of his young battalions, which recoiled and wavered in expectation of an explosion, Napoleon, to reassure them, spurred his charger toward the instrument of destruction, made him smell the burning match, waited unshaken for the explosion, and was blown up. Rolling in the dust with his mutilated steed, and rising without a wound amid the plaudits of his soldiers, he calmly called for another horse, and continued to brave the grape-shot, and to fly into the thickest of the battle. — ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 20.

648. BRAVERY, Exploit of. Bridge of Lodi. A.D. 1796. Lannes was the first to cross, and Napoleon the second. Lannes, in utter recklessness and desperation, spurred his maddened horse into the very midst of the Austrian ranks, and grasped a banner. At that moment his horse fell dead beneath him, and half a dozen swords glittered above his head. With herculean strength and agility, he extricated himself from the fallen steed, leaped upon the horse of an Austrian officer behind the rider, plunged his sword through the body of the officer, and hurled him from his saddle; taking his seat he fought his way back to his followers, having slain in the mêlée six of the Austrians with his own hand. . . . Napoleon promoted Lannes on the spot. — ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 5.

649. BRAVERY, Fearless. William II. In 1099 William was hunting in the New Forest, when he received a message that Helie had defeated the Normans and surprised the city of Mans. Without drawing bit he galloped to the coast, and jumped into a vessel lying at anchor. The day was stormy, and the sailors were unwilling to embark. "Sail instantly!" cried the bold man; "kings are never drowned." . . . He was soon at the head of his troops. — KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 16, p. 230.

650. — — —. Colonel Moultrie. A.D. 1776. [The British, under Admiral Lord Howe, were preparing to bombard the battery on Sullivan's Island in Charleston harbor, afterward called Fort Moultrie. Ten guns against one.] Captain Lemprier [said to the commander:] "Well, colonel, what do you think of it now?" "We shall beat them," said Moultrie. "The men-of-war," rejoined the captain, "will knock your fort down in half an hour." "Then," said Moultrie, "we will lie behind the ruins and prevent their men from landing." [He drove the British away with a loss of only eleven men.] — BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 66.

651. BRAVERY, Heroic. Robert Devereux. [At the taking of Cadiz by the English in 1596, for a time the result seemed doubtful; but at the critical moment the Earl of Essex threw his own standard over the wall. To save the honor of the ensign, each soldier tried to be first in following it by leaping down from the wall, sword in hand. The town was taken by their valor.] — KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 17, p. 266.

652. — — —. Richard Grenville. [In 1593 Vice-Admiral Richard Grenville, with great odds against him, fought the Indian fleet of Spain from three in the afternoon to daybreak the next morning. He] was three times wounded during the action, in which he again and again repulsed the enemy, who constantly assailed him with fresh vessels. At length the good ship lay upon the waters like a log. Her captain proposed to blow her up rather than surrender; but the majority of the crew compelled him to yield himself a prisoner. He died in a few days, and his last words were: "Here die I, Richard Grenville, with a joyful and quiet mind; for that I have ended my life as a true soldier ought to do, fighting for his country, queen, religion, and honor."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 17, p. 261.

653. BRAVERY, Pre-eminence by. Joan of Arc. Joan of Arc, "an enthusiast herself, she filled a dispirited soldiery and a despairing people with enthusiasm. The great secret of her success was the boldness of her attacks, when military science reposed upon its cautious strategy."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 6, p. 87.

654. BRAVERY, Query of. Lacedæmonians. [It was remarked by] one of their ancient kings: "The Lacedæmonians seldom inquired the number of their enemies, but the place where they could be found."—PLUTARCH'S CLEOMENES.

655. BRAVERY rewarded. Paradise. [During a fierce battle with the Khoreishites] Mahomet was seized with a sudden fainting which deprived him of his senses. He soon recovered from the swoon with a face all radiant with hope. "I have seen the Spirit of God," said he, "with his war-horse behind him. He was preparing to combat on our side. Whoever shall have fought bravely to-day and died of wounds received in front will enjoy Paradise."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 108.

656. BRAVERY, Youthful. Reign of James II. One of the proscribed Covenanters, overcome by sickness, had found shelter in the house of a respectable widow, and had died there. The corpse was discovered by the laird of Westerhall, a petty tyrant. . . . This man pulled down the house of the poor woman, carried away her furniture, and, leaving her and her younger children to wander in the fields, dragged her son Andrew, who was still a lad, before Claverhouse, who happened to be marching through that part of the country. Claverhouse was that day strangely lenient. . . . But Westerhall was eager to signalize his loyalty, and extorted a sullen consent. The guns were loaded, and the youth was told to pull his bonnet over his face. He refused, and stood confronting his murderers with the Bible in his hand. "I can look you in the face," he said; "I have done nothing of which I need be ashamed. But how will you look in that day when you shall be judged by what is written in this book?" He fell dead, and was buried in the moor.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4.

657. BREAD, Public Provision of. Romans. [During the decline of the Roman Empire,] for the convenience of the lazy plebeians, the monthly distributions of corn were converted into a daily allowance of bread; a great number of ovens were constructed and maintained at the public expense; and at the appointed hour each citizen, who was furnished with a ticket, ascended the flight of steps, which had been assigned to his peculiar quarter or division, and received, either as a gift or at a very low price, a loaf of bread of the weight of three pounds, for the use of his family.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31.

658. BREAD Question, The. Precedence to. [During the French Revolution hundreds of market-women, attended by an armed mob of men, went to Versailles, to demand bread of the National Assembly, there being a great destitution in Paris. They entered the hall.] There was a discussion upon the criminal laws. A fish-woman cried out, "Stop that babbler; that is not the question; the question is about bread."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 9, p. 179.

660. BRIBERY, Contemned. Sir Isaac Newton. The duties of his office were performed by him [in the royal mint] with signal ability and purity. He was offered on one occasion a bonus of £6000 for a contract for the coinage of the copper money. Sir Isaac refused the offer on the ground that it was a bribe in disguise. The agent argued the matter with him without effect, and said, at length, that the offer came from "a great duchess." The philosopher roughly replied, "I desire you to tell the lady that if she was here herself, and had made me this offer, I would have desired her to go out of my house; and so I desire you, or you shall be turned out."—PARTON'S NEWTON, p. 85.

661. BRIBERY in Court. For a Hearing. [The Magna Charta] put an end to that enormous corruption by which justice was sold, not by mere personal bribery of corrupt ministers of the Crown, but by bribing the Crown through their hands. The rolls of the Exchequer present constant evidence of sums of money received by the king to procure a hearing in his courts.—KNIGHT, vol. 1, ch. 24, p. 349.

662. BRIBERY, Disguised. England. [Venality was never carried farther. Mr. Hallam says:] "The sale of seats in Parliament, like any other transferable property, is never mentioned in any book that I remember to have seen of an earlier date than 1760." Bribery in the approved form of selling a pair of jack-boots for 30 guineas, and a pair of wash-leather breeches for £50, was notorious enough to be laughed at by Foote. Dr. Johnson held that "if he were a gentleman of landed property, he would turn out all his tenants who did not vote for the candidate whom he supported."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 16, p. 247.

663. BRIBERY, Legislative. £5000 for a Vote. [In the Irish Parliament, in 1800, there was a great contest in bribery. Lord Castlereagh writes to the Duke of Portland:] We have undoubted proofs, though not such as we can disclose, that they are enabled to offer as high as £5000 for an individual vote, and I lament to state that there are individuals remaining among us that are likely to yield to this temptation.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 21, p. 378.

664. — — — Commons. [In 1643 Edmund Waller, once a famous poet and member of Parliament, was arrested as a conspirator in a plot to bring the king's troops into the capital during the civil war. Aubrey says:] He had much ado to save his life; and in order to do it sold his estate in Bedfordshire, worth £1300 per annum, to Dr. Wright, for £10,000 (much under value), which was procured in twenty-four hours' time, or else he had been hanged. With this money he bribed the House, which was the first time a House of Commons was ever bribed.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 1.

665. ———. Scotch Parliament. [In 1712 Lord Oxford said] the Scotch lords were grown so extravagant in their demands, that it was high time to let them see they were not so much wanted as they imagined, for they were now come to expect a reward for every vote they gave.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 24, p. 380.

666. ———. Necessary. [In 1690] Sir John Trevor, being a Tory in principle, undertook to manage that party, provided he was furnished with such sums of money as might purchase some votes; and by him began the practice of buying off men. The king [William III.] said he hated the practice as much as any man could do; but he saw it was not possible, considering the corruption of the age, to avoid it, unless he would endanger the whole.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 7, p. 102.

667. ———. Duke of Newcastle. [The Duke of Newcastle, one of the chief advisers of George II. in 1747,] was the most adroit and experienced trafficker for seats in the House of Commons. He bought boroughs with a profuse employment of his own wealth, that made his family power almost irresistible. He bought members with the secret-service money. He cajoled; he promised; and if wheedling and lying were in vain, he freely paid. This was Newcastle's peculiar talent. He hugged the dirty work to his bosom as if it were the great glory of his life. He would share with no man the distinction of bribing for votes.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 12, p. 178.

668. BRIBERY of the Needy. For Emperor. [In 1519, when the electors of Germany voted for an emperor in place of Maximilian, deceased, Henry VIII. of England, Francis I. of France, and Charles of Spain were all ambitious candidates for the vacant throne.] Each of these monarchs had bribed the needy electoral princes to an enormous extent. The skilful management of Charles secured his unanimous election.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 17, p. 231.

669. BRIBERY, Occasion for. Small Pay. The comptroller of the mint [who was a priest] was usually a jobber of the rankest character. And all the civil-officers were underpaid in their salaries. They all looked to grants and leases for their reward; and they all lived upon something even better than expectancy, for they all were bribed. The secondary offices were openly bought. There was small pay, but large peculation. It was in vain that Latimer cried out to the young King Edward, "Such as be meet to bear office, seek them out; hire them; give them competent and liberal fees, that they shall not need to take any bribes." . . . The high places of the law were those in which the bribe was most regularly administered. When Bacon fell in the next half century, for receiving bribes, he followed the most approved precedents, according to which chancellors and chief-justices before him maintained their state and ennobled their posterity. . . . The bribery of juries was so common, that a man-killer with rich friends could escape for a crown properly administered to each quest-monger; for so the vendor of a verdict was called. [A.D. 1547.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 28, p. 462.

670. BRIBERY, Papal. Alexander VI. Application was made to the Pope for a divorce [of Charles XII. from Jeanne his wife]; and Alexander, who was not a man to hesitate at any infamy, provided he obtained his price, readily agreed to pronounce the desired sentence in return for certain honors and rewards to be conferred upon his son Cæsar Borgia.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 13, § 1, p. 283.

671. BRIBERY, Perilous. Athenians. The sacred war had now lasted about ten years; and every campaign had given a fresh acquisition of power to the daring and the politic Macedonian. The Athenians, finding no advantage on their part, and heartily tired of hostilities, which gave too much interruption to their favorite ease and luxurious enjoyments, sent ambassadors to Philip with instructions to negotiate a general peace. But he bribed the ambassadors, spun out the negotiations, and in the mean time proceeded in the most vigorous prosecution of the war. This conduct might have opened the eyes of the Athenians, had not their corrupted orators, the pensioners of Philip, labored assiduously to foster their blind security. . . . Philip poured down like a torrent and carried all before him. . . . Philip became the arbiter of Greece.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3.

672. BRIBERY, Reproach of. Demosthenes. Harpalus had the charge of Alexander's treasure in Babylon, and, flattering himself that he would never return from his Indian expedition, he gave into all manner of crimes and excesses. At last, when he found that Alexander was really returning, and that he took a severe account of such people as himself, he thought proper to march off, with 5000 talents and 6000 men, into Attica. [Note.] . . . As he applied to the people of Athens for shelter, and desired protection . . . most of the orators had an eye upon the gold, and supported his application with all their interest. Demosthenes at first advised them to order Harpalus off immediately, and to be particularly careful not to involve the city in war again, without any just or necessary cause. Yet a few days after, when they were taking an account of the treasure, Harpalus, perceiving that Demosthenes was much pleased with one of the king's cups, and stood admiring the workmanship and fashion, desired him to take it in his hand, and feel the weight of the gold. Demosthenes being surprised at the weight, and asking Harpalus how much it might bring, he smiled, and said, "It will bring you twenty talents." And as soon as it was night, he sent him the cup with that sum. For Harpalus knew well enough how to distinguish a man's passion for gold by his pleasure at the sight and the keen looks he cast upon it. Demosthenes could not resist the temptation. . . . he received the money. . . . and went over to the interest of Harpalus. Next day he came into the assembly with a quantity of wool and bandages about his neck; and when the people called upon him to get up and speak, he made signs that he had lost his voice. Upon which some that were by said, "it was no common hoarseness that he got in the night; it was a hoarseness occasioned by swallowing gold and silver." Afterward, when all the people were appraised of his taking the bribe, and he wanted to speak in his own defence, they would not suffer him, but raised a clamor, and expressed their indignation. At the same time somebody or other stood up and said sneeringly, "Will you not listen to the man with the cup?"—PLUTARCH.

673. BRIBERY resented. Stephen A. Douglas. His career in Congress presents a strange mixture of good and evil. I believe that he was an incorruptible man, though no one ever had more or better chances to gain money unlawfully. Once when he was confined to his room by an abscess, he was waited upon by a millionaire, who offered to give him a deed for two and a half million acres of land, now worth $20,000,000, if he would merely give up a certain document. "I jumped for my crutches," Douglas used to say in telling the story; "he ran from the room, and I gave him a parting blow upon the head."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 200.

674. BRIBERY, Royal. Charles II. The long prorogation of the Parliament in November, 1675, was a specific arrangement between Charles [II.] and Louis [XIV.], for which the unworthy King of England received 500,000 crowns [from the King of France.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 20.

675. BRIBERY, Seeming. Reign of Charles II. [Louis XIV. sent corruption money to England.] The most upright member of the country party, William, Lord Russell, son of the Earl of Bedford, did not scruple to concert with a foreign mission schemes for embarrassing his own sovereign. This was the whole extent of Russell's offence. His principles and his fortune alike raised him above all temptations of a sordid kind; but there is too much reason to believe that some of his associates were less scrupulous. It would be unjust to impute to them the extreme wickedness of taking bribes to injure their country. On the contrary, they meant to serve her; but it is impossible to deny that they were mean and indelicate enough to let a foreign prince pay them for serving her.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2.

676. BRIBES rejected. Samuel Adams. "Why," asked one of the English Tories of the Tory governor of Massachusetts—"why hath not Mr. Adams been taken off from his opposition by an office?" To which the governor replied: "Such is the obstinacy and inflexible disposition of the man, that he never would be conciliated by any office whatever." This was indeed the truth. His daughter, who long survived him, and with whom living persons have conversed, used to say that her father once refused a pension from the British Government of £2000 a year. Once, when a secret messenger from General Gage threatened him with a trial for treason if he persisted in his opposition to the government, and promised him honors and wealth if he would desist, Adams rose to his feet, and gave him this answer: "Sir, I trust I have long since made my peace with the King of kings. No personal consideration shall induce me to abandon the righteous cause of my country. Tell Governor Gage it is the advice of Samuel Adams to him no longer to insult the feelings of an exasperated people."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 236.

677. BROTHERHOOD acknowledged. American Indians. They hold the bonds of brotherhood so dear, that a brother commonly pays the debt of a deceased brother, and assumes his revenge and his perils. There are no beggars among them, no fatherless children unprovided for. The families that dwell together, hunt together, roam together, fight together, constitute a tribe.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

678. BROTHERS, Division between. Romulus and Remus. [In the founding of Rome the] two brothers first differed about the place where their new city was to be built, and referring the matter to their grandfather, he advised them to have it decided by augury. In this augury Romulus imposed upon Remus; and when the former prevailed that the city should be built upon Mount Palatine, the builders, being divided into two companies, were no better than two factions. At last, Remus, in contempt, leaped over the work, and said, "Just so will the enemy leap over it!" whereupon Celer gave him a deadly blow, and answered, "In this manner will our citizens repulse the enemy." Some say that Romulus was so afflicted at the death of his brother, that he would have laid violent hands upon himself if he had not been prevented.—PLUTARCH'S ROMULUS.

679. BRUTALITY of Persecutors. Dr. Rowland Taylor. [At the stake] he would have spoken to them, but the guard thrust a tipstaff into his mouth. As they were piling the fagots, a brutal man cast a fagot at him, which wounded him so that the blood ran down his face. "O friend," said he, "I have harm enough; what need that?" Let us draw a veil over his sufferings, and see only the poor woman [his wife] who knelt at the stake to join in his prayers, and would not be driven away.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 6.

680. BRUTES, Immortality of. Samuel Johnson. An essay, written by Mr. Deane, a divine of the Church of England, maintaining the future life of brutes, by an explication of certain parts of the Scriptures, was mentioned, and the doctrine insisted on by a gentleman who seemed fond of curious speculation. . . . When the poor speculatist, with a serious metaphysical pensive face, addressed him, "But really, sir, when we see a very sensible dog, we don't know what to think of him." Johnson, rolling with joy at the thought which beamed in his eye, turned quickly round, and replied, "True, sir; and when we see a very foolish fellow, we don't know what to think of him."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 155.

681. BUILDING, Colossal. Colosseum. The amphitheatre of Titus, which so well deserved the epithet of colossal, . . . was a building of an elliptic figure, five hundred and sixty-four feet in length, and four hundred and sixty-seven in breadth, founded on fourscore arches, and rising, with four successive orders of architecture, to the height of one hundred and forty feet. The outside of the edifice was incrustured with marble, and decorated with statues. The slopes of the vast concave which formed the inside were filled and surrounded with sixty or eighty rows of seats of marble likewise, covered with cushions, and capable of receiving with ease about four-score thousand spectators. Sixty-four comitories (for by that name the doors were very aptly distinguished) poured forth the immense multitude; and the entrances, passages, and staircases were contrived with such exquisite skill, that each person, whether of the senatorial, the equestrian, or the plebeian order, arrived at his destined place without trouble or confusion. Nothing was omitted which, in any respect, could be subservient to the convenience and pleasure of the spectators. They were protected from the sun and rain by an ample canopy, occasionally drawn over their heads. The air was continually refreshed by the playing of fountains, and profusely impregnated by the grateful scent of aromatics. In the centre of the edifice the arena, or stage, was strewed with the finest sand, and successively assumed the most different forms. At one moment it seemed to rise out of the earth, like the garden of the Hesperides, and was afterward broken into the rocks and caverns of Thrace. The subterraneous pipes conveyed an inexhaustible supply of water; and what had just before appeared a level plain might be suddenly converted into a wide lake covered with armed vessels and replenished with monsters of the deep. [Furniture of silver, and of gold, and of amber.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12.

682. BUILDING opposed. Reign of James II. [During the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion in the West] the commons authorized the king to raise an extraordinary sum of £400,000 for his present necessities. . . . The scheme of taxing houses lately built in the capital was revived and strenuously supported by the country gentlemen. It was resolved, not only that such houses should be taxed, but that a bill should be brought in prohibiting the laying of any new foundations within the bills of mortality. The resolution, however, was not carried into effect. Powerful men who had land in the suburbs, and who hoped to see new streets and squares rise on their estates, exerted all their influence against the project.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5.

683. BUILDING, Ruined by. Marcus Crassus. Crassus observed how liable the city was to fires, and how frequently houses fell down; which misfortunes were owing to the weight of the buildings, and their standing so close together. In consequence of this, he provided himself with slaves who were carpenters and masons, and went on collecting them until he had upward of five hundred. Then he made it his business to buy houses that were on fire, and others that joined upon them; and he commonly had them at a low price, by reason of the fears and distress the owners were in about the event. Hence, in time, he became master of a great part of Rome. But though he had so many workmen, he built no more for himself than one house in which he lived. For he used to say, "That those who love building will soon ruin themselves, and need no other enemies."—PLUTARCH'S CRASSUS.

684. BURIAL, Companions in. White Huns. Gorgo, which, under the appellation of Carlizme, has since enjoyed a temporary splendor, was the residence of the king, who exercised a legal authority over an obedient people. . . . The only vestige of their ancient barbarism was the custom which obliged all the companions, perhaps to the number of twenty, who had shared the liberality of a wealthy lord, to be buried alive in the same grave.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26.

685. BURIAL questioned. Cromwell's. They give him a magnificent funeral in the old Abbey, where they had buried Blake and the Protector's mother. But when Charles Stuart returned, the bodies were taken up and buried at Tyburn, the head of Cromwell exposed over Westminster Hall. The dastards and the fools! But, after all, it is not certain that the body buried in the Abbey was his body. In a rare old volume we have—one hundred and sixty years old—it is confidently asserted, on the authority of the nurse of Cromwell, that he was privately buried by night in the Thames, in order to avert the indignities which it was foreseen would be wreaked on his body; and this by his own direction. Other rumors assign another spot to his burial. Ah well! it matters little. We know where his work is, and how far that is buried. We see him standing there, ushering in a new race of English kings.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, p. 227.

686. BURIAL, Respect by. Battlefield. Nicias happened to leave the bodies of two of his men, who were missed in carrying off the dead. But as soon as he knew it, he stopped his course, and sent a herald to the enemy, to ask leave to take away those bodies. This he did, though there was a law and custom subsisting by which those who desire a treaty for carrying off the dead give up the victory, and are not at liberty to erect a trophy. And, indeed, those who are so far masters of the field, that the enemy cannot bury their dead without permission, appear to be conquerors, because no man would ask that as a favor which he could command. Nicias, however, chose rather to lose his laurels than to leave two of his countrymen unburied.—PLUTARCH.

687. BURIAL, Secreted. Alaric. The ferocious character of the barbarians [who invaded Italy] was displayed in the funeral of a hero whose valor and fortune they celebrated with mournful applause. By the labor of a captive multitude, they forcibly diverted the course of the Busentinus, a small river that washes the walls of Consentia. The royal sepluchre, adorned with the splendid spoils and trophies of Rome, was constructed in the vacant bed; the waters were then restored to their natural channel; and the secret spot where the remains of Alaric had been deposited was forever concealed by the inhuman massacre of the prisoners who had been employed to execute the work.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 33.

688. BURIAL, A Tyrant's. Attila. [He died suddenly, from the bursting of an artery.] His body was solemnly exposed in the midst of the plain, under a silken pavilion; and the chosen squadrons of the Huns, wheeling round in measured evolutions, chanted a funeral song to the memory of a hero, glorious in his life, invincible in his death, the father of his people, the scourge of his enemies, and the terror of the world. According to their national custom, the barbarians cut off a part of their hair, gashed their faces with unseemly wounds, and bewailed their valiant leader as he deserved, not with the tears of women, but with the blood of warriors. The remains of Attila were enclosed within three coffins—of gold, of silver, and of iron—and privately buried in the night; the spoils of nations were thrown into his grave; the captives who had opened the ground were inhumanly massacred; and the same Huns, who had indulged such excessive grief, feasted, with dissolute and intemperate mirth, about the recent sepulchre of their king.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 35.

689. BUSINESS detested. James Watt. He was timid and reserved . . . he hated higgling, and declared that he would rather "face a loaded cannon than settle an account or make a bargain."—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 33.

690. BUSINESS, Joys of. Chauncey Jerome. [The famous brass clockmaker was made almost dizzy, early in his career,] by an order from South Carolina for twelve clocks. When he finished his clocks and was conveying them to the appointed place in a farmer's wagon, he was perfectly bewildered at the idea of having so immense a sum as $144 all at once, and all his own. He could not believe that such good fortune was in store for him. He thought something would be sure to happen to prevent his receiving the money. But no; his customer was ready, and slowly counted out the sum in silver, and the clockmaker took it with trembling hands, and carried it home, dreading lest some robbers might have heard of his vast wealth, and were in ambush to rob and murder him.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 213.

691. BUSINESS, Nobility in. England. In an age of loose morality among the higher classes, Burnet writes, in 1708: "As for the men of trade and business, they are, generally speaking, the best body in the nation—generous, sober, charitable."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 3, p. 41.

692. BUSINESS prevented. Boycotting. Boston Patriots. A.D. 1769. The people of Boston . . . were impatient that a son of [Tory Governor] Bernard, two sons of [Lieutenant-Governor] Hutchinson, and about five others would not accede to the agreement [not to import tea while it was taxed]. At a great public meeting of merchants in Faneuil Hall, . . . as the best means of coercion it was voted not to purchase anything of the recusants; subscription papers to that effect were carried round from house to house, and everybody complied.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 42.

693. CALAMITIES combined. Reign of Charles II. London suffered two great disasters, such as never, in so short a time, befell one city. A pestilence, surpassing in horror any that during three centuries had visited the island, swept away, in six months, more than a hundred thousand human beings; and scarcely had the dead-cart ceased to go its rounds, when a fire, such as had not been known in Europe since the conflagration of Rome under Nero, laid in ruins the whole city, from the Tower to the Temple, and from the river to the purlieus of Smithfield.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2.

694. CALAMITIES desired. Pagans. After the fall of Serapis [by the attack of the Christians, in which the dismembered image was dragged through the streets of Alexandria] some hopes were entertained by the pagans that the indignation of the gods would be expressed by the refusal of the Nile's annual inundation; but the waters began to swell with most unusual rapidity. They now comforted themselves with the thought that the same indignation was to be expressed by a deluge; but were mortified to find at last that the inundation brought with it no other than its usual salutary and fertilizing effects.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 4.

695. CALAMITIES, Effect of. National. England was now involved in a war both with France and Holland. After several desperate but indecisive engagements, England began to perceive that this war promised nothing but expense and bloodshed. A plague which was then raging in London consumed above a hundred thousand of its inhabitants; a most dreadful fire, happening almost at the same time, had reduced almost the whole of the city to ashes; and amid so many calamities it was not wonderful that the warlike ardor of the nation should be considerably abated. A negotiation was carried on at Breda, and a peace was concluded between the belligerent powers in 1667. By the treaty of Breda, New York was secured to the English, the Isle of Polorone, in the East Indies, to the Dutch, and Acadia, in North America, to the French.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 30.

696. CALENDAR corrected. Julius Cæsar. One remarkable and durable reform was undertaken and carried through amid the jests of Cicero and the other wits of the time—the revision of the Roman calendar. The distribution of the year had been governed hitherto by the motions of the moon. The twelve annual moons had fixed at twelve the number of the months, and the number of days required to bring the lunar year into correspondence with the solar had been supplied by irregular intercalations, at the direction of the Sacred College. But the Sacred College during the last distracted century had neglected their office. The lunar year was now sixty-five days in advance of the sun. The so-called winter was really the autumn, the spring the winter. The summer solstice fell at the beginning of the legal September.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 25.

697. ———. Roger Bacon. [The distinguished Franciscan monk.] He observed an error in the calendar with regard to the duration of the solar year, which had been increasing from the time that it was regulated by Julius Cæsar. He proposed a plan for the correction of this error to Pope Clement IV., and has treated of it at large in the fourth book of his "Opus Majus." Dr. Jebb, his editor and commentator, is of opinion that this was one of the noblest discoveries ever made by the human mind. In his optical works he has very plainly described the construction and use of telescopic glasses, an invention which Galileo, four hundred years afterward, attributed to himself.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 16.

698. CALMNESS, Christian. John Wesley. [When the mob were pulling down the house of his lay preacher, John Nelson, in the town of Bristol, he and his companions approached it singing hymns, and the mob fled before them.] Some of his finest lyrics were composed during the tumults so frequently experienced. He often recited and sometimes sung them among the raging crowds. Four of them were written "to be sung in a tumult," and one was "a prayer for the first martyr."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 203.

699. CALMNESS of Discipline. Napoleon I. [His enemies exploded a barrel of powder in the streets of Paris, hoping to destroy him. But his carriage had just passed it.] The carriage rocked as on the billows of the sea, and the windows were shattered to fragments. . . . "Ha!" said he, with perfect composure, "we are blown up." One of his companions, greatly terrified, thrust his head through the demolished window and called loudly for the driver to stop. "No, no!" said Napoleon; "drive on." . . . More than thirty of these conspiracies were detected by the police.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 21.

700. CALMNESS, Exasperating. Socrates. The populace, whom their demagogues had strongly prejudiced against this great and good man, were affected by his defence, and showed marks of a favorable disposition; when Anytus and several others, men of high consideration in the republic, now openly stood forth and joined the party of his accusers. The weak and inconstant rabble were drawn along by their influence, and a majority of thirty suffrages declared Socrates guilty. The punishment was still undetermined, and he himself had the right of choosing it. "It is my choice," said he, "that since my past life has been employed in the service of the public, that public should for the future be at the charge of my support." This tranquillity of mind, which could sport with the danger of his situation, served only to exasperate his judges.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 2, p. 156.

701. CALUMNY, Instigated. Maximus Fabius. [When he was defending the Romans against the Carthaginian general.] Hannibal, to incense the Romans against him, when he came to his lands, ordered them to be spared, and set a guard upon them to prevent the committing of the least injury there, while he was ravaging all the country around him, and laying it waste with fire. An account of these things being brought to Rome, heavy complaints were made thereupon. The tribunes alleged many articles of accusation against him, before the people.—PLUTARCH'S FABIVS.

702. CALUMNY, Opposition by. Charles Wesley. Mobs destroyed the houses and injured the persons of early Methodists in Cork. . . . Twenty-eight depositions were presented to the grand jury at the assizes against these disgraceful proceedings, but they were all thrown out, and the jury made a "remarkable presentment," which still stands on the city records, and which declares that "we find and present Charles Wesley to be a person of ill-fame, a vagabond, and a common disturber of his Majesty's peace, and we pray that he may be transported."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 282.

703. CANDIDATE, A dead. Daniel Webster. It is stated as a fact that many persons in Georgia, and including Robert Toombs and Alexander H. Stephens, showed their respect for the great expounder of the Constitution by voting for him after he was dead.—NORTON'S LIFE OF STEPHENS, p. 12.

704. CANDIDATE, A dignified. Thomas Jefferson. As Mr. Jefferson then held the office of vice-president, he presided daily over the Senate, and thus lived in the midst of the strife and intrigue. Coming out of the Senate chamber one day, he was stopped by Gouverneur Morris, a leader of the Federalists, who began to converse with him on the alarming state of things around them. "The reasons," said Morris, "why the minority of the States are so opposed to your being elected is this: they apprehend that, first, you will turn all Federalists out of office; secondly, put down the navy; thirdly, wipe off the public debt. Now, you only need to declare, or authorize your friends to declare, that you will not take these steps, and instantly the event of the election will be fixed." Mr. Jefferson replied. . . . that he should leave the world to judge of the course he meant to pursue by that which he had pursued hitherto, believing it to be his duty to be passive and silent during the present scene. "I shall certainly," continued Mr. Jefferson, "make no terms; I shall never go into the office of President by capitulation, nor with my hands tied by any conditions which would hinder me from pursuing the measures which I deem for the public good."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 351.

705. CANDOR, Christian. Discussion. [At the first Wesleyan Conference] it was asked, Should they be fearful of thoroughly debating every question which might arise? "What are we afraid of? Of overturning our first principles? If they are false, the sooner they are overturned the better. If they are true they will bear the strictest examination. Let us all pray for a willingness to receive light to know every doctrine, whether it be of God."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 212.

706. CANNIBALISM, Christian. Crusaders. They consumed, with heedless prodigality, their stores of water and provision; their numbers exhausted the inland country; the sea was remote, the Greeks were unfriendly, and the Christians of every sect fled before the voracious and cruel rapine of their brethren. In the dire necessity of famine they sometimes roasted and devoured the flesh of their infant or adult captives. Among the Turks and Saracens the idolaters of Europe were rendered more odious by the name and reputation of cannibals; the spies, who introduced themselves into the kitchen of Bohemond, were shown several human bodies turning on spits.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58.

707. CANON, A great. Urban the Founder. [Cast for Mahomet II., in siege of Constantinople.] A foundry was established at Adrianople; the metal was prepared; and at the end of three months Urban produced a piece of brass ordnance of stupendous and almost incredible magnitude; a measure of twelve palms is assigned to the bore; and the stone bullet weighed above six hundred pounds. A vacant place before the new palace was chosen for the first experiment; but to prevent the sudden and mischievous effects of astonishment and fear, a proclamation was issued, that the cannon would be discharged the ensuing day. The explosion was felt or heard in a circuit of a hundred furlongs ; the ball, by the force of gunpowder, was driven above a mile ; and on the spot where it fell, it buried itself a fathom deep in the ground. For the conveyance of this destructive engine, a frame or carriage of thirty wagons was linked together and drawn along by a team of sixty oxen ; two hundred men on both sides were stationed to poise and support the rolling weight ; two hundred and fifty workmen marched before to smooth the way and repair the bridges ; and near two months were employed in a laborious journey of one hundred and fifty miles. . . . We may discern the infancy of the new science. Under a master who counted the moments, the great cannon could be loaded and fired no more than seven times in one day. The heated metal unfortunately burst ; several workmen were destroyed ; and the skill of an artist was admired who bethought himself of preventing the danger and the accident by pouring oil, after each explosion, into the mouth of the cannon.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 68.

708. CANT, Political. Samuel Johnson. Boswell : "Perhaps, sir, I should be the less happy for being in Parliament. I never would sell my vote, and I should be vexed if things went wrong." JOHNSON : "That's cant, sir. It would not vex you more in the house than in the gallery ; public affairs vex no man." . . . Boswell : "I declare, sir, upon my honor, I did imagine I was vexed, and took a pride in it ; but it was, perhaps, cant ; for I own I neither eat less nor slept less." JOHNSON : "My dear friend, clear your mind of cant. You may talk as other people do ; you may say to a man, 'Sir, I am your most humble servant.' You are not his most humble servant. You may say, 'These are bad times ; it is a melancholy thing to be reserved to such times.' You don't mind the times. You tell a man, 'I am sorry you had such bad weather the last day of your journey, and were so much wet.' You don't care sixpence whether he is wet or dry. You may talk in this manner ; it is a mode of talking in society ; but don't think foolishly."—Boswell's JOHNSON, p. 498.

709. CAPITAL, Conservative. Cicero. [Cæsar had been superseded by the appointment of Domitius Ahenobarbus, the most inveterate and envenomed of his enemies, by the Senate.] A day later, before the final vote had been taken, he thought still that the Senate was willing to let Cæsar keep his province, if he would dissolve his army. The moneyed interests, the peasant landholders, were all on Cæsar's side ; they cared not even if monarchy came, so that they might have peace.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 20.

710. CAPITAL a Crime. Jews. [In 1290 King Edward I.,] by an arbitrary exercise of power, destroyed the great money capitalists of the time. The Jews throughout England were all seized on one day, upon a charge of clipping the coin ; and . . . of both sexes, there were hanged in London two hundred and eighty, and a very great multitude in other cities of England. Some Christians were involved in the accusation ; and for most of them the king received ransom.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 25, p. 386.

711. CAPITAL, Spiritual. Indulgences. The following circumstances led to the traffic in indulgences. The Roman Catholic Church maintained that the saints, during their life on earth, had accumulated a treasury of merit because of their good work ; that they had done more good than they were obliged to do. This surplus might be used for the benefit of sinful men who had accomplished less good than was needed for their salvation. The Pope claimed that he had received authority from God to draw from this reservoir of merit, and to apply it to those who had shown themselves worthy by their sorrow and repentance. But soon sorrow and repentance were dispensed with, and matters were satisfactorily arranged by the use of money. Thus arose the so-called traffic in indulgences, which proved to be a source of great revenue to the popes. This was the case under Leo X., who at this time occupied the papal chair.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 1.

712. CAPITALISTS, Extortionate. Jews. The capitalist was the Jew ; but his mode of dealing suited only unthrifty abbots and plundering barons ; for when the borrower came into the gripe of the Israelite, bond was heaped upon bond, so that we have a record how a debt of £200 became, with accumulated interest, £880 in four years. [A.D. 1194.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 22, p. 326.

713. CAPITALISTS, Nation of. Jews. There used to be a conundrum current in Europe, which was something like this : "What is the difference between ancient and modern times ? Answer : In ancient times, all the Jews had one king ; in modern times, all the kings have one Jew." The Jew referred to in this conundrum was Meyer Anselm Rothschild, the founder of the great banking-house so famous throughout the world.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 564.

714. CAPTIVES, Inhumanity to. Mexican Emp. He was treated at first with humanity, and every persuasive made use of to prompt him to make a discovery of the place where it was supposed he had concealed his treasures ; but in vain. It was next tried what torture might produce, and by the command of one of the Spanish captains, the monarch, together with some of his chief officers, were stretched naked upon burning coals. While Guatimozin bore the extremity of torment with more than human fortitude, one of his fellow-sufferers, of weaker constitution, turned his eyes upon his prince and uttered a cry of anguish : "Think-est thou," said Guatimozin, "that I am laid upon a bed of roses ?" Silenced by this reproof, the sufferer stifled his complaints, and expired in an act of obedience to his sovereign. To the honor of Cortez, he was ignorant of this act of shocking inhumanity.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 21.

715. CAPTIVITY, Chosen. Napoleon's Friends. [At St. Helena.] The household now consisted of the emperor, General Bertrand, wife, and three children ; Count Montholon, wife, and two children ; Count Las Casas and son ; General Gourgaud, and Dr. O'Meara. There were also four servants of the chamber, three grooms, and four servants of the table. These had all followed the emperor to his dreary prison from their love of his person. [Others wept because denied the opportunity to follow him by the British Government. His friends were treated as prisoners as well as himself.]—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 31.

716. CAPTURE, An important. City of Washington. The British advanced on Washington [in 1814]. . . . The President, the Cabinet officers, and the people betook themselves to flight, and [General] Ross marched unopposed into the city. He had been ordered by his superiors to use the torch, and the work of destruction was accordingly begun. All the public buildings except the Patent Office were burned. The beautiful but unfinished Capitol and the President's house were left a mass of blackened ruins. Many private edifices were also destroyed. [Note.] An excuse for this outrageous barbarism was found in the previous conduct of the Americans, who . . . at Toronto . . . had behaved but little better.—RIDPATH'S HIST., ch. 51.

717. CARELESSNESS, Censure of. Samuel Johnson. Though he used to censure carelessness with great vehemence, he owned that he once, to avoid the trouble of locking up five guineas, hid them, he forgot where, so that he could not find them.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 435.

718. CARELESSNESS, Habitual. Goldsmith. [He went to Edinburgh to study medicine.] Having taken lodgings at haphazard, he left his trunk there, containing all his worldly effects, and sallied forth to see the town. After sauntering about the streets until a late hour, he thought of returning home, when, to his confusion, he found he had not acquainted himself with the name either of his landlady or of the street in which she lived. Fortunately, in the height of his whimsical perplexity, he met the cawdy or porter who had carried his trunk, and who now served him as a guide.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, p. 37.

719. CASTE, Absence of. Irish Kings. [In 1394 Sir Henry Cristall was sent by Richard II. to attend on the Irish kings, who submitted themselves to him.] It was Richard's wish that in manners and apparel they should conform to the usages of England. It was his purpose to create them knights; but they were wedded to their ancient customs. They would sit at the same table as their minstrels and servants, eating out of the same dish and drinking out of the same cup.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 2, p. 27.

720. CASTE, Anglo-Saxon. Germany. The Saxons were divided, as all the other German nations, into three ranks of men—the noble, the free, and the slaves. The nobles were called thanes, and these were of two kinds—the king's thanes and the lesser thanes. The latter seem to have been dependent on the former, and to have received lands, for which they either paid rent or military services. There were two laws of the Anglo-Saxons which breathe a spirit very different from what one would naturally expect from the character of the age, when the distinction of superior and inferior is commonly very strongly marked. One of the laws of Athelstan declared, that a merchant who had made three long sea voyages on his own account was entitled to the quality ofthane; and another declared that a ceorle, or husbandman, who had been able to purchase five hides of land, or five plough-gates, and who had a chapel, a kitchen, a hall, and a bell, was entitled to the same rank. The freemen of the lower rank, who were denominated ceorles, cultivated the farms of the thanes for which they paid rent, and they appear to have been removable at the pleasure of the thane. The lowest and most numerous of the orders was that of the slaves or villains; of these slaves there were two kinds—the household slaves, and those employed in the cultivation of the lands; of the latter species are the serfs, which we find at this day in Poland, in Russia, and in others of the northern states. A master had not, among the Anglo-Saxons, an unlimited power over his slaves. He was fined for the murder of a slave, and if he mutilated one, the slave recovered his liberty. The laws of Edgar inform us that slavery was the lot of all prisoners taken in war.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 6.

721. CASTE, Barbarian. Gauls. It should seem that very many of those institutions, referred by an easy solution to the feudal system, are derived from the Celtic barbarians. When Cæsar subdued the Gauls, that great nation was already divided into three orders of men—the clergy, the nobility, and the common people. The first governed by superstition, the second by arms; but the third and last was not of any weight or account in their public councils.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 13.

722. CASTE of Birth. Italians. Till the privileges of Romans had been progressively extended to all the inhabitants of the empire, an important distinction was preserved between Italy and the provinces. The former was esteemed the centre of public unity and the firm basis of the constitution. Italy claimed the birth, or at least the residence, of the emperors and the Senate. The estates of the Italians were exempt from taxes, their persons from the arbitrary jurisdiction of governors. Their municipal corporations, formed after the perfect model of the capital, were intrusted, under the immediate eye of the supreme power, with the execution of the laws. From the foot of the Alps to the extremity of Calabria, all the natives of Italy were born citizens of Rome.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2.

723. CASTE, English. Jealousy. The rise of the commonalty was always regarded with extreme jealousy by the born great. The servile literature before the days of the Revolution echoed this sentiment.—KNIGHT'S ENGLAND, vol. 5, ch. 6, p. 49.

724. CASTE, Hostility to. Louis Philippe. [In 1795 he travelled incognito, with two other princes, in the United States.] At Winchester, in the Valley of the Shenandoah, a democratic inn-keeper turned them out of his house because (one of them being sick) they asked the privilege of eating by themselves. "If you are too good," roared this despotic democrat, "to eat at the same table with my other guests, you are too good to eat in my house. Begone!" Despite the instant apology of the Duke of Orleans, the landlord insisted on their going, and they were compelled to seek other quarters.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 509.

725. CASTE in Judgment. Queen Elizabeth. [When Elizabeth was remonstrating in behalf of Mary Queen of Scots, she charged her ambassadors to insist that subjects were not to be judges of a sovereign ;] it was contrary to Scripture and unreasonable, that the foot should judge the head.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 10, p. 151.

726. CASTE, National. French. [William I.,] the Conqueror, and his descendants to the fourth generation were not Englishmen ; most of them were born in France ; they spent the greater part of their time in France ; their ordinary speech was French ; almost every high office in their gift was filled by a Frenchman ; every acquisition which they made on the Continent estranged them more and more from the population of our island. One of the ablest among them, indeed, attempted to win the hearts of his English subjects by espousing an English princess ; but by many of his barons this marriage was regarded as a marriage between a white planter and a quadroon girl would now be regarded in Virginia. In history he is known by the honorable surname of Beaulerc ; but in his own time his own countrymen called him by a Saxon nickname, in contemptuous allusion to his Saxon connection.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1.

727. ———. English. [Reign of James II.] No man of English blood then regarded the aboriginal Irish as his countrymen. They did not belong to our branch of the great human family. They were distinguished from us by more than one moral and intellectual peculiarity, which the difference of situation and of education, great as that difference was, did not seem altogether to explain. They had an aspect of their own, a mother tongue of their own. When they talked English their pronunciation was ludicrous ; their phraseology was grotesque, as is always the phraseology of those who think in one language and express their thoughts in another. They were therefore foreigners, and of all foreigners they were the most hated and despised—the most hated, for they had, during five centuries, always been our enemies ; the most despised, for they were our vanquished, enslaved, and despoiled enemies. The Englishman compared with pride his own fields with the desolate bogs, whence the rapparees issued forth to rob and murder ; and his own dwelling with the hovels where the peasants and the bogs of Shannon wallowed in filth together.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9.

728. CASTE in Parliament. Worsteds Stockings. [In 1645 there were] certain mean sort of people in the House, whom, to distinguish them from the more honorable gentlemen, they called Worsteds-stockmen.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 4.

729. CASTE, Prejudice of. Parliament. [At the second session of Parliament, under the protectorate of Cromwell, only one of the peers who had accepted the writ of summons took his seat. The Earl of Warwick could not be persuaded to sit with Colonel Hewson and Colonel Pride—the one had been a shoemaker, and the other a drayman.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 13.

730. CASUISTRY, Difficult. Missionary to the Indians. [John] Eliot preached against polygamy. "Suppose a man, before he knew God," inquired a convert, "hath had two wives—the first childless, the second bearing him many sweet children, whom he exceedingly loves ; which of these is he to put away ?"—BANCROFT'S U. S., ch. 2, vol. 2.

731. CATASTROPHE, An appalling. Earthquake. November 1, 1755, the people of Lisbon were alarmed by that awful rumbling beneath the earth which, as they well knew, usually preceded an earthquake. Before they could escape from their houses the shock came, which overthrew the greater part of the city, and buried thousands of persons in its ruins. The sea retired, leaving the bottom of the harbor bare, but immediately returned in a fearful wave fifty feet high, overwhelming everything in its course. The inhabitants who could get clear of the ruins rushed in thousands to a magnificent marble wharf, just completed, which seemed to offer a place of safety. This massive structure, densely covered with men, women, and children, suddenly sunk, bearing with it to unknown depths the entire multitude. Not a creature escaped ; not a human body rose again to the surface ; not a fragment of anything that was on the wharf was ever again seen by human eye ; and when, by and by, the water was sounded over the place where it had stood, the depth was found to be six hundred feet. Within the space of six minutes sixty thousand persons are supposed to have perished ; and those who survived were so encompassed about with horror, that they might well have envied those whom the sea had submerged or the falling houses crushed.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 30.

732. CATHOLICS, Disfranchised. Marylanders. A.D. 1681. The prelates [in England] demanded . . . an establishment to be maintained at the common expense of the province. Lord Baltimore resisted. The Roman Catholic was inflexible in his regard for freedom of worship. The opposition to Lord Baltimore as a feudal sovereign easily united with Protestant bigotry . . . The English ministry soon issued an order, that officers of government in Maryland should be exclusively intrusted to Protestants. Roman Catholics were disfranchised in the province which they had planted.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 14.

733. CATHOLICS, Justice to. English. [Dr. Arnold plead for it, saying :] It is the direct duty of every Englishman to support the claims of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, even at the hazard of injuring the Protestant establishment—because those claims cannot be rejected without great injustice—and it is a want of faith in God and an unholly zeal to think that he can be served by injustice, or to guard against contingent evil by committing certain sin.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 13.

734. CATHOLICS, Prejudice against. Catholic Relief Bill. [In 1829 it was passed by Parliament.] It would admit a Roman Catholic to Parliament upon taking an oath, in place of the old oath of supremacy, that he would support the existing institutions of the State, and not injure those of the Church. It would admit a Roman Catholic to all the greatest offices of government, with the exception of Regent, Lord Chancellor of England, and Lord Chancellor and Viceroy of Ireland. All corporate offices and municipal privileges, all that pertained to the administration of justice, would be open to Roman Catholics. From all offices connected with the Church, with its universities and schools, and from Church patronage, they would be necessarily excluded. Commands in the army and navy had been open to them before this measure. Connected with the Bill of Relief there were securities and restrictions proposed.—Knight's Eng., vol. 8, ch. 13, p. 239.

735. CATHOLICISM, Benefits of. England.

It is difficult to say whether England owes more to the Roman Catholic religion or to the Reformation. For the amalgamation of races and for the abolition of villanage she is chiefly indebted to the influence which the priesthood, in the middle ages, exercised over the laity. For political and intellectual freedom, and for all the blessings which political and intellectual freedom have brought in their train, she is chiefly indebted to the great rebellion of the laity against the priesthood. From the time when the barbarians overran the Western Empire to the time of the revival of letters, the influence of the Church of Rome had been generally favorable to science, to civilization, and to good government; but during the last three centuries, to stunt the growth of the human mind has been her chief object. Throughout Christendom, whatever advance has been made in knowledge, in freedom, in wealth, and in the arts of life, has been made in spite of her, and has everywhere been in inverse proportion to her power. The loveliest and most fertile provinces of Europe have, under her rule, been sunk in poverty, in political servitude, and in intellectual torpor, while Protestant countries, once proverbial for sterility and barbarism, have been turned by skill and industry into gardens, and can boast of a long list of heroes and statesmen, philosophers and poets. Whoever, knowing what Italy and Scotland naturally are, and what, four hundred years ago, they actually were, shall now compare the country round Rome with the country round Edinburgh, will be able to form some judgment as to the tendency of papal domination. The descent of Spain, once the first among monarchies, to the lowest depths of degradation; the elevation of Holland, in spite of many natural disadvantages, to a position such as no commonwealth so small has ever reached, teach the same lesson. Whoever passes in Germany from a Roman Catholic to a Protestant principality, in Switzerland from a Roman Catholic to a Protestant canton, in Ireland from a Roman Catholic to a Protestant country, finds that he has passed from a lower to a higher grade of civilization. On the other side of the Atlantic the same law prevails. The Protestants of the United States have left far behind them the Roman Catholics of Mexico, Peru, and Brazil. The Roman Catholics of Lower Canada remain inert, while the whole continent round them is in a ferment with Protestant activity and enterprise. The French have doubtless shown an energy and an intelligence which, even when misdirected, have justly entitled them to be called a great people. But this apparent exception, when examined, will be found to confirm the rule; for in no country that is called Roman Catholic has the Roman Catholic Church, during several generations, possessed so little authority as in France.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1,

736. CATHOLICISM, Wisdom of. Broad Plans.

In the latter half of the seventeenth century the French began to push their way westward and southward; first along the shores of the great lakes, then to the head waters of the Wabash, the Illinois, the Wisconsin, and the St. Croix, then down these streams to the Mississippi, and then to the Gulf of Mexico. The purpose of the French, as manifested in these movements, was no less than to divide the American continent and to take the larger portion, to possess the land for France and Catholicism. For it was the work of the Jesuit missionaries.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 30.

737. CAUSE and Effect. Samuel Johnson.

Of Dr. Hurd, Bishop of Worcester, Johnson said to a friend: "Hurd, sir, is one of a set of men who account for everything systematically; for instance, it has been a fashion to wear scarlet breeches; these men would tell you, that according to causes and effects, no other wear could at that time have been chosen." He, however, said of him at another time to the same gentleman: "Hurd, sir, is a man whose acquaintance is a valuable acquisition."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 488.

738. CAUTION needful. Abraham Lincoln.

"Well, you see," said Mr. Lincoln [to a visitor who introduced the subject of emancipation], "we've got to be very cautious how we manage the negro question. If we're not, we shall be like the barber out in Illinois, who was shaving a fellow with a hatchet face and lantern jaws like mine. The barber stuck his finger in his customer's mouth to make his cheek stick out; but while shaving away he cut through the fellow's cheek and cut off his own finger! If we are not very careful we shall do as the barber did."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 752.

739. CAVALRY, Formidable. Elephants.

An ambassador from the Emperor Zeno accompanied the rash and unfortunate Perozes in his expedition against the Nephthalities, or white Huns, whose conquests had been stretched from the Caspian to the heart of India, whose throne was enriched with emeralds, and whose cavalry was supported by a line of two thousand elephants. The Persians were twice circumvented in a situation which made valor useless and flight impossible; and the double victory of the Huns was achieved by military stratagem. They dismissed their royal captive after he had submitted to adore the majesty of a barbarian.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40.

740. CAVIL answered. Reign of James II.

[Session of the former members of the House of Commons.] Sir Robert Sawyer declared that he could not conceive how it was possible for the prince to administer the government without some distinguishing title, such as Regent or Protector. Old Maynard, who, as a lawyer, had no equal, and who was also a politician versed in the tactics of revolutions, was at no pains to conceal his disdain for so puerile an objection, taken at a moment when union and promptitude were of the highest importance. "We shall sit here very long," he said, "if we sit till Sir Robert can conceive how such a thing is possible;" and the assembly thought the answer as good as the cavil deserved.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10.

741. CELEBRATED, Marriage. Grandsons of Timour. The marriage of six of the emperor's grandsons was esteemed an act of religion as well as of paternal tenderness; and the pomp of the ancient caliphs was revived in their nuptials. They were celebrated in the gardens of Canighul, decorated with innumerable tents and pavilions, which displayed the luxury of a great city and the spoils of a victorious camp. Whole forests were cut down to supply fuel for the kitchens; the plain was spread with pyramids of meat, and vases of every liquor, to which thousands of guests were courteously invited; the orders of the state and the nations of the earth were marshalled at the royal banquet; nor were the ambassadors of Europe (says the haughty Persian) excluded from the feast; since even the cassres, the smallest of fish, find their place in the ocean. The public joy was testified by illumination and masquerades; the trades of Samarcand passed in review; and every trade was emulous to execute some quaint device, some marvellous pageant, with the materials of their peculiar art. After the marriage contracts had been ratified by the cadhis, the bridegrooms and their brides retired to the nuptial chambers; nine times, according to the Asiatic fashion, they were dressed and undressed; and at each change of apparel pearls and rubies were showered on their heads, and contemptuously abandoned to their attendants. A general indulgence was proclaimed: every law was relaxed, every pleasure was allowed; the people was free, the sovereign was idle.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65.

742. CELEBRATION, Municipal. Constantinople. As often as the birthday of the city returned, the statue of Constantine, framed by his order, of gilt wood, and bearing in his right hand a small image of the genius of the place, was erected on a triumphal car. The guards, carrying white tapers, and clothed in their richest apparel, accompanied the solemn procession as it moved through the Hippodrome. When it was opposite to the throne of the reigning emperor, he rose from his seat, and with grateful reverence adored the memory of his predecessor. At the festival of the dedication, an edict, engraved on a column of marble, bestowed the title of Second or New Rome on the city of Constantine.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 17.

743. CELEBRATION, National. Centennial. As the Centennial of American Independence drew near, the people made ready to celebrate the great event with appropriate ceremonies, . . . but the development of the project was discouraged for a while with considerable opposition and much lukewarmness. The whole scheme was a vision of enthusiasm, a Quixotical dream, said the critics and objectors. No such an enterprise could be carried through except under the patronage of the government, and the government had no right to make appropriations merely to preserve an old reminiscence. We had had enough of the Fourth of July already. Besides—said the wits and caricaturists—the other nations would present a ludicrous figure in helping us to celebrate an anniversary of a rebellion that they had tried to crush a hundred years ago. Victoria was expected—so said they—to send over commissioners to heap contumely and contempt on the grave of her grandfather!

No nation of Europe would consent to its own stultification by joining in the jubilees of Republicanism. Besides all this cavilling, it was foreseen that Philadelphia would quite certainly be selected as the scene of the proposed display, and on that account a good deal of local jealousy was excited in the other principal cities of the Union.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 58.

744. CELIBACY of Clergy. Britain, tenth Century. The celibacy of the clergy was the leading principle to be contended for in making the Church Romish instead of national. Although the strict canons of the Anglo-Church did not recognize a married priesthood, the law of celibacy had never been rigidly enforced, especially among the parochial clergy. Their marriages were discountenanced; they were admonished or threatened. But the law of nature was triumphant over the decrees of councils; and the English priests were not forced into those immoralities which were the result of this ordinance in other countries. Mr. Kemble says: "We have an almost unbroken chain of evidence to show that, in spite of the exhortations of the bishops and the legislation of the witan, those at last of the clergy who were not bound to a cœnobitical order did contract marriage, and openly avow the families which were its issue."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 9.

745. CEMETERY, Saddest. London Tower. The head and body were placed in a coffin covered with black velvet, and were laid privately under the communion-table of St. Peter's Chapel in the Tower. Within four years the pavement of that chancel was again disturbed, and hard by the remains of Monmouth were laid the remains of Jeffreys. In truth, there is no sadder spot on the earth than that little cemetery. Death is there associated, not, as in Westminster Abbey and Saint Paul's, with genius and virtue, with public veneration and with imperishable renown; not, as in our humblest churches and churchyards, with everything that is most endearing in social and domestic charities, but with whatever is darkest in human nature and in human destiny, with the savage triumph of implacable enemies, with the inconstancy, the ingratitude, the cowardice of friends, with all the miseries of fallen greatness and of blighted fame. Thither have been carried, through successive ages, by the rude hands of jailers, without one mourner following, the bleeding relics of men who had been the captains of armies, the leaders of parties, the oracles of senates, and the ornaments of courts.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5.

746. CENSOR, Official. Roman. [Words of the Emperor Decius.] As soon as the decree of the Senate was transmitted to the emperor, he assembled a great council in his camp, and before the investiture of the censor-elect he apprised him of the difficulty and importance of his great office. "Happy Valerian," said the prince to his distinguished subject, "happy in the general approbation of the Senate and of the Roman republic! Accept the censorship of mankind, and judge of our manners. You will select those who deserve to continue members of the Senate; you will restore the equestrian order to its ancient splendor; you will improve the revenue, yet moderate the public burdens. You will distinguish into regular classes the various and infinite multitude of citizens, and accurately view the military strength, the wealth, the virtue, and the resources of Rome. Your decisions shall obtain the force of laws. The army, the palace, the ministers of justice, and the great officers of the empire are all subject to your tribunal. None are exempted, excepting only the ordinary consuls, the prefect of the city, the king of the sacrifices, and (as long as she preserves her chastity inviolate) the eldest of the vestal virgins. Even these few, who may not dread the severity, will anxiously solicit the esteem of the Roman censor."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 10.

747. ——. Roman. Livy remarks, they kept in dependence both the Senate and people. They possessed a constitutional power of degrading such as had manifested any irregularity of conduct, and depriving them of the rank and office which they held in the State. It was not an authority which extended to the punishment of those ordinary crimes and delicts which fall under the penal laws of a State. But there are offences which, in point of example, are worse than crimes, and more pernicious in their consequences. It is not the breach of express laws that can ever be of general bad effect, or tend to the destruction of a government; but it is that silent and unpunishable corruption of manners which, undermining private and public virtue, weakens and destroys those springs to which the best-ordered constitution owes its support. The counteracting this latent principle of decay was the most useful part of the office of the censors. If any citizen had imprudently contracted large debts; if he had consumed his fortune in extravagance, or in living beyond his income; if he had been negligent in the cultivation of his lands—nay, if, being in good circumstances and able to maintain a family, he had declined, without just cause, to marry—all these offences attracted the notice of the censors, who had various modes of inflicting a penalty. The most usual, and not the least impressive, was a public denunciation of the offender as an object of disapprobation—ignominia notabant. It did not amount to a mark of infamy, but punished solely by inflicting the shame of a public reprimand. A penalty, however, of this kind is not fitted to operate on all dispositions, and, accordingly, the censors had it in their power to employ means more generally effectual. They could degrade a senator from his dignity and strike his name out of the roll. They could deprive a knight of his rank by taking from him the horse which was maintained for him at the public expense, and was the essential mark of his station. A citizen might be punished by degrading him from his tribe to an inferior one, or doubling his proportion of the public taxes.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 6.

748. CENSURE resented. Dionysius. The philosopher Plato had been invited to Syracuse by Dionysius the elder . . . Dionysius . . . being offended with the freedom which the philosopher used in censuring whatever he disapproved in the maxims and government of the tyrant, the latter ordered him to be sold as a slave in the public market. His disciples paid the price of five minæ for their master, and sent him safe back to Greece.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 8.

749. CENSURE, Unmoved by. Pres. Jackson. [He vetoed the bill to recharter the Bank of the United States, and] ordered the accumulated funds, amounting to about ten millions, to be distributed among certain State banks. . . . He had no warrant of law . . . he was denounced . . . arbitrary, dangerous. In the Senate a powerful coalition, headed by Calhoun, Clay, and Webster, was formed against the President. . . . A resolution censuring his conduct was . . . carried; but a similar proposition failed in the House of Representatives. There was a general cry of indignation, and it seemed as if the President would be overwhelmed; but the President, ever as fearless as he was self-willed and stubborn, held on his course unmoved by the clamor. The resolution of censure stood upon the journal of the Senate for four years, and was then expunged.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 54.

750. CEREMONY, Comedy of. Court. Portland, the ambassador for William III., 1698, made his public entry into Paris on the 9th of March. He disputes with "the conductor of ambassadors" about matters of etiquette. "In my case," he says, "difficulties have been raised on every conceivable point; and as I do not understand the ceremonial I am embarrassed by them, and can only meet them with obstinacy, which is here rather indispensable." Comedy cannot imagine a richer scene than the burly Dutchman refusing to come from the top of his staircase to meet the representative of the Duchess of Burgundy, who refused to go more than half way up, "messengers passing backward and forward between us."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 13, p. 208.

751. CEREMONY, Dislike for. Napoleon I. [He had been crowned emperor with gorgeous display and grand ceremony.] He hastened to his room, and exclaimed impatiently to an attendant as he entered, "Off! off with these confounded trappings!" He threw the mantle into one corner of the room, the gorgeous robe into another, and thus violently disencumbering himself, declared that hours of such mortal tediousness he had never passed before.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 28.

752. CEREMONY, Slaves of. Royalty. In the Byzantine palace the emperor was the first slave of the ceremonies which he imposed, and the rigid forms which regulated each word and gesture besieged him in the palace, and violated the leisure of his rural solitude.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53.

753. CHALLENGE, A dangerous. Invasion of Pennsylvania. At Chambersburg . . . one female had seen fit to adorn her ample bosom with a huge Yankee flag, and she stood at the door of her house, her countenance expressing the greatest contempt for the barefooted Rebs; several companies passed her without taking any notice; but at length a Texan gravely remarked, "Take care, madam, for Hood's boys [from Texas, Alabama, and Arkansas] are great at storming breastworks when the Yankee color is on them." After this speech the patriotic lady beat a precipitate retreat.—POLLARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, p. 337.

754. CHALLENGE, Offered. Revolutionary War. [In Florida British troopers] summoned the fort at Sunbury to surrender. But when Colonel Mackintosh answered, "Come and take it," they retreated.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 10, ch. 13.

755. CHALLENGE, Political. Lincoln—Douglas. A.D. 1858. Both spoke in Springfield on the same day, but before different audiences . . . Mr. Lincoln addressed a letter to Mr. [S. A.] Douglas, challenging him to a series of debates during the campaign. The challenge was accepted, and arrangements were at once made for the meetings. Seven joint debates were held . . . [and they] raised the greatest excitement throughout the State.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 2, p. 42.

756. CHALLENGE, Royal. Maria Theresa. [Frederick II. declared war. Her father had recently died.] In the midst of distress and peril she had given birth to a son, afterward the Emperor Joseph II. Scarcely had she risen from her couch when she hastened to Pressburg. There, in the sight of an innumerable multitude, she was crowned with the crown and robed with the robe of St. Stephen. No spectator could refrain his tears when the beautiful young mother, still weak from child-bearing, rode, after the fashion of her fathers, up the Mount of Defiance, unsheathed the ancient sword of state, shook it toward north and south, east and west, and, with a glow on her pale face, challenged the four corners of the world to dispute her rights and those of her boy.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 35.

757. CHALLENGE, Unaccepted. Alexius Comnenus. [Greek emperor—time of the crusades.] High on his throne, the emperor sat mute and immovable; his Majesty was adored by the Latin princes, and they submitted to kiss either his feet or his knees—an indignity which their own writers are ashamed to confess and unable to deny. . . . But a French baron (he is supposed to be Robert of Paris) presumed to ascend the throne, and to place himself by the side of Alexius. The sage reproof of Baldwin provoked him to exclaim, in his barbarous idiom, "Who is this rustic that keeps his seat, while so many valiant captains are standing round him?" The emperor maintained his silence, dissembled his indignation, and questioned his interpreter concerning the meaning of the words, which he partly suspected from the universal language of gesture and countenance. Before the departure of the pilgrims he endeavored to learn the name and condition of the audacious baron. "I am a Frenchman," replied Robert, "of the purest and most ancient nobility of my country. All that I know is, that there is a church in my neighborhood, the resort of those who are desirous of approving their valor in single combat. Till an enemy appears, they address their prayers to God and His saints. That church I have frequently visited. But never have I found an antagonist who dared to accept my defiance." Alexius dismissed the challenger with some prudent advice for his conduct in the Turkish warfare.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58, p. 572.

758. CHANGE, A life. Loyola. It was during the siege of Pampeluna by the French . . . that a young officer of Guipuzcoa, actively engaged in conducting the defence, received a severe wound which confined him for many weeks to his bed, an occurrence which proved the turning-point of his subsequent extraordinary career. This gallant soldier, soon to reappear upon the scene in a very different and far more influential character, was none other than Ignatius Loyola, founder of the Order of Jesus.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 14, § 5, p. 300.

759. CHANGE of Sides. "Bobbing John." John Erskine, Earl of Mar, who came to Edinburgh as Secretary of State in 1706 [became distinguished in this manner:] his happy art of accommodating himself to circumstances procured him the name of "Bobbing John."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 1.

760. CHARACTER, Changeful. Boniface VIII. Boniface expired at Rome in a frenzy of rage and revenge. His memory is stained with the glaring vices of avarice and pride; nor has the courage of a martyr promoted this ecclesiastical champion to the honors of a saint; a magnanimous sinner (say the chronicles of the times), who entered like a fox, reigned like a lion, and died like a dog. He was succeeded by Benedict XI., the mildest of mankind.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 69.

761. CHARACTER, Composite. Luther. [Heine's opinion of Luther:] "He created the German language. He was not only the greatest, but the most German man of our history. In his character all the faults and all the virtues of the Germans are combined on the largest scale. Then he had qualities which are very seldom found united, which we are accustomed to regard as irreconcilable antagonisms. He was, at the same time, a dreamy mystic and a practical man of action. His thoughts had not only wings, but hands. He spoke and he acted. He was not only the tongue, but the sword of his time. When he had plagued himself all day long with his doctrinal distinctions, in the evening he took his flute and gazed at the stars, dissolved in melody and devotion. He could be as soft as a tender maiden. Sometimes he was wild as the storm that uproots the oak, and then again he was gentle as the zephyr that dallies with the violet."—REIN'S LUTHER, p. 205.

762. CHARACTER, Contradictory. James II. A libertine without love, a devotee without spirituality, an advocate of toleration without the sense of the natural right of conscience—in him the muscular force prevailed over the intellectual. He floated between the sensuality of indulgence and the sensuality of superstition, hazarding heaven for an ugly mistress, and, to the great delight of abbots and nuns, winning it back again by pricking his flesh with sharp points of iron, and eating no meat on Saturdays. Of the two brothers, the Duke of Buckingham said well, that Charles [II.] would not and James could not see.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 17.

763. ———. Queen Elizabeth. To the world about her, the temper of Elizabeth recalled in its strange contrasts the mixed blood within her veins. She was at once the daughter of Henry [VIII.] and of Anne Boleyn. From her father she inherited her frank and hearty address, her love of popularity and of free intercourse with the people, her dauntless courage, and her amazing self-confidence. Her harsh, manlike voice, her impetuous will, her pride, her furious outbursts of anger, came to her with her Tudor blood. She rated great nobles as if they were schoolboys; she met the insolence of Lord Essex with a box on the ear; she broke now and then into the gravest deliberations to swear at her ministers like a fishwife. Strangely in contrast with these violent outlines of her father's temper stood the sensuous, self-indulgent nature she drew from Anne Boleyn.—HIST. OF ENGLISH PEOPLE, § 710.

764. CHARACTER, Discipline of. Cromwell's Soldiers. Nor would it be safe, in our time, to tolerate in any regiment religious meetings, at which a corporal versed in scripture should lead the devotions of his less gifted colonel, and admonish a backsliding major. But such was the intelligence, the gravity, and the self-command of the warriors whom Cromwell had trained, that in their camp a political organization and a religious organization could exist without destroying military organization. The same men who, off duty, were noted as demagogues and field-preachers, were distinguished by steadiness, by the spirit of order, and by prompt obedience on watch, on drill, and on the field of battle.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1.

765. CHARACTER, disclosed. Samuel Johnson. BOSWELL: "Mr. Burke has a constant stream of conversation." JOHNSON: "Yes, sir; if a man were to go by chance at the same time with Burke under a shed, to shun a shower, he would say, 'This is an extraordinary man.' If Burke should go into a stable to see his horse dressed the ostler would say, 'We have had an extraordinary man here.'" BOSWELL: "Foote was a man who never failed in conversation. If he had gone into a stable—" JOHNSON: "Sir, if he had gone into the stable, the ostler would have said, Here has been a comical fellow; but he would not have respected him."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 517.

766. CHARACTER, Elevation of. Aristides the Just. When the chief command of the war was given to Athens, a new system was established with regard to the contributions of the confederate States, trusting no longer to contingent and occasional supplies or free gifts. The subsidies to be levied from each were to be exacted in proportion to its means, and the revenue of its territory; and a common treasury was appointed to be kept in the Isle of Delos. The high character of Aristides was exemplified in the important and honorable trust with which he was invested by the common consent of the nation. It appears that not only the custody of the national supplies, but the power of fixing their proportions, was conferred on this illustrious man; nor was there ever a complaint or murmur heard against the equity with which this high but invidious function was administered. The best testimony of his virtue was the strict frugality of his life and the honorable poverty in which he died.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 1, p. 138.

767. CHARACTER estimated. Cromwell's. It cannot be doubted that the estimate of his character will always be formed, not merely from sympathy with a certain set of opinions, but even more from that strange, occult, and undefinable sentiment which, arising from peculiarity of temperament, becomes the creator of intellectual and even moral appreciation. Hence there are those to whom, whatever may be the amount of evidence for his purity, Cromwell can only be hateful; while there are others, again, to whom, even if certain flaws or faults of character appear in him, he can only be admirable.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 1, p. 2.

768. CHARACTER, Foundation for. Germans. Now, "in two remarkable traits the Germans differed from the Sarmatic as well as from the Slavic nations, and, indeed, from all those other races to whom the Greeks and Romans gave the designation of barbarians. I allude to their personal freedom and regard for the rights of men; secondly, to the respect paid by them to the female sex, and the chastity for which the latter were celebrated among the people of the North. These were the foundations of that probity of character, self-respect, and purity of manners which may be traced among the Germans and Goths even during pagan times, and which, when their sentiments were enlightened by Christianity, brought out those splendid traits of character which distinguish the age of chivalry and romance."—DECISIVE BATTLES, ch. 6.

769. CHARACTER, Greatness of. Luther. [Opinion of Thomas Carlyle.] "I will call this Luther a true great man, great in intellect, in courage, affection, and integrity, one of our most lovable and precious men. Great not as a hewn obelisk, but as an Alpine mountain, so simple, honest, spontaneous, not setting up to be great at all; there for quite another purpose than being great! Ah, yes, unsubduable granite, piercing far and wide into the heavens; yet in the clefts of its fountains, green beautiful valleys with flowers! A right spiritual Hero and Prophet; once more a true son of Nature and Fact, for whom these centuries and many that are to come yet will be thankful to heaven."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 26, p. 206.

770. CHARACTER, Grotesque. Poet Shelley. To the world he presented the rare spectacle of a man passionate for truth and unreservedly obedient to the right as he discerned it. The anomaly which made his practical career a failure lay just here. The right he followed was too often the antithesis of ordinary morality; in his desire to cast away the false and grasp the true, he overshot the mark of prudence. The blending in him of a pure and earnest purpose with moral and social theories that could not but have proved pernicious to mankind at large, produced at times an almost grotesque mixture in his actions no less than in his verse. We cannot, therefore, wonder that society, while he lived, felt the necessity of asserting itself against him.—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 8.

771. CHARACTER, Inherited. Americans. By the middle of the eighteenth century the American colonies had, to a certain extent, assumed a national character; but they were still strongly marked with the peculiarities which their ancestors brought with them from Europe. In New England, especially in Massachusetts and Connecticut, the principles and practices of Puritanism still held universal sway. On the banks of the Hudson the language, manners, and customs of Holland were almost as prevalent as they had been a hundred years before. By the Delaware the Quakers were gathered in such numbers as to control all legislation and to prevent serious innovations upon the simple methods of civil and social organization introduced by Penn. On the northern bank of the Potomac, the youthful Frederick, the sixth Lord Baltimore, a frivolous and dissolute governor, ruled a people who still conformed to the order of things established a hundred and thirty years previously by Sir George and Cecil Calvert. In Virginia—mother of States and statesmen—the people had all their old peculiarities: a somewhat haughty demeanor; pride of ancestry; fondness for aristocratic sports; hospitality; love of freedom. The North Carolinians were, at this epoch, the same rugged and insubordinate race of hunters that they had always been. In South Carolina . . . the people, mostly of French descent, were as hot-blooded and as jealous of their rights as their ancestors.—RID-JATH'S HIST., ch. 36, p. 280.

772. CHARACTER misinterpreted. Charles II. That the late king had been at heart a Roman Catholic had been, during some months, suspected and whispered, but not formally announced. The disclosure, indeed, could not be made without great scandal. Charles had, times without number, declared himself a Protestant, and had been in the habit of receiving the Eucharist from the bishops of the Established Church. Those Protestants who had stood by him in his difficulties, and who still cherished an affectionate remembrance of him, must be filled with shame and indignation by learning that his whole life had been a lie; that, while he professed to belong to their communion, he had really regarded them as heretics; and that the demagogues who had represented him as a concealed papist had been the only people who had formed a correct judgment of his character.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 40.

773. CHARACTER moulded by Theology. Cromwell. Cromwell was all that we include in the term Puritan. His whole public life was the result of that mental experience by which his faith was moulded. In him there was a profound reverence for the law of God. He had an instinctive apprehension of order. To disfranchise, to rout, and put to flight the imbecilities of anarchists—such was his work. A sworn soldier of the Decalogue was he. Say that he read with keen vividness into men's hearts and men's purposes; well, he did so, as any man may do, by the light of high intelligent principles within him. In many things, we do not doubt, he much misinterpreted the texts of the Divine Book. Perhaps he was too much a "Hebrew of the Hebrews." Some do not see how a man can be faithfully a Christian man and also a soldier; but if he will be a soldier, then we do not see how he can fulfil a soldier's duty better than by looking into the Old Testament. We see plainly that we shall not know Cromwell's character and deeds unless we acquaint ourselves with Cromwell's theology.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 1, p. 22.

774. CHARACTER, Natural. Fostered. The most important care of Mammæa [the mother of Alexander] and her wise counsellors, was to form the character of the young emperor . . . the fortunate soil assisted, and even prevented, the hand of cultivation. An excellent understanding soon convinced Alexander of the advantages of virtue, the pleasure of knowledge, and the necessity of labor. A natural mildness and moderation of temper preserved him from the assaults of passion and the allurements of vice. His unalterable regard for his mother . . . guarded his inexperienced youth from the poison of flattery.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6.

775. CHARACTER above Office. Emperor. The great Theodosius, in his judicious advice to his son, . . . distinguishes the station of a Roman prince from that of a Parthian monarch. Virtue was necessary for the one; birth might suffice for the other.—MILMAN, IN GIBBON'S ROME.

776. CHARACTER, Trifling. Greeks. The warmth of the climate disposed the natives of Antioch to the most intemperate enjoyment of tranquillity and opulence; and the lively licentiousness of the Greeks was blended with the hereditary softness of the Syrians. Fashion was the only law, pleasure the only pursuit, and the splendor of dress and furniture was the only distinction of the citizens of Antioch. The arts of luxury were honored; the serious and manly virtues were the subject of ridicule; and the contempt for female modesty and reverent age announced the universal corruption of the capital of the East. The love of spectacles was the taste, or rather passion, of the Syrians—the most skilful artists were procured from the adjacent cities; a considerable share of the revenue was devoted to the public amusements; and the magnificence of the games of the theatre and circus was considered as the happiness and as the glory of Antioch.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 24.

777. CHARITY for the Dead. Bolingbroke. The great Duke of Marlborough and the first Lord Bolingbroke were in opposite political interests, and were consequently, on most occasions, ranged against each other. Some gentlemen, after the duke's decease, were canvassing his character with much severity, and particularly charged him with being excessively avaricious. At length they appealed for the truth of their statements to Lord Bolingbroke, who was one of the company. This nobleman, with a generosity which did him real honor, answered: "The Duke of Marlborough was so great a man that I quite forget his failings."

778. CHARITY distrusted. Joseph II. Joseph II., walking one day on the Prater at Vienna, met a young woman who seemed in great distress. He inquired the cause, and found that she was the daughter of an officer who had been killed in the Imperial service, and that she and her mother had supported themselves by their industry, but were now unemployed. "Have you received no assistance from the government?" said the emperor. "None," was the reply. "But why not apply to the emperor? he is easy of access." "They say he is avaricious, and such a step would then be useless." The monarch immediately gave the young woman some ducats and a ring, telling her that he was in the emperor's service, and would serve her, if with her mother she would come to the palace on a certain day. The appointment was kept, and the young woman recognized her benefactor in the person of the emperor, who bade her not to be alarmed, as he had settled a pension on her and her mother, adding,

"At another time, I hope you will not despair of a heart that is just."

779. CHARITY, Nobility of. Aristotle. Being blamed for giving alms to an unworthy person, he said, "I gave; but it was to mankind."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 558.

780. CHARITY, Wise. John Howard. In times of scarcity he exerted himself to find employment for those [of his tenants] who needed it, getting situations among his friends for deserving girls and young men, keeping many hands busy upon his own grounds and in weaving linen for his family. It is said that he had linen enough in his house when he died to last fifty years longer. He was reluctant to give money in charity, except to persons who could not work. His way was to provide work, even if the work was not needed. This principle, however, did not prevent his giving presents on proper occasions to deserving objects. All his servants were generously remembered by him at Christmas and on their birthdays; and when one of their daughters was married, he was fond of presenting the bride with a good cow.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 38.

781. CHARITY, Wonderful. Father Mathew said: A poor woman found in the streets a male infant, which she brought to me, and asked imploringly what she was to do with it. Influenced, unhappily, by cold caution, I advised her to give it to the church-wardens. It was then evening. On the ensuing morning, early, I found this poor woman at my doors. She was a poor water-carrier. She cried bitterly, and said, "I have not slept one wink all night for parting with that child which God had put in my way, and, if you will give me leave, I will take him back again." I was filled with confusion at the pious tenderness of this poor creature, and I went with her to the parish nurse for the infant, which she brought to her home with joy, exclaiming, in the very words of the prophet, "Poor child, though thy mother has forgotten thee, I will not forget thee." Eight years have elapsed since she brought to her humble home that exposed infant, and she is now blind from the constant exposure to wet and cold; and ten times a day may be seen that poor water-carrier passing with her weary load, led by this little foundling boy. O merciful Jesus, I would gladly sacrifice the wealth and power of this wide world, to secure to myself the glorious welcome that awaits this poor blind water-carrier on the great accounting day! Oh, what, compared to charity like this, the ermined robe, the ivory sceptre, the golden throne, the jewelled diadem!—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 113.

782. CHARM, Protecting. Numa. [Numa, one of the earliest kings of Rome,] having mixed the fountain of which they used to drink with wine and honey, surprised and caught [the demigods, who] . . . acquainted him with many secrets of futurity and taught him a charm for thunder and lightning, composed of onions, hair, and pilchards, which is used to this day.—PLUTARCH'S NUMA.

783. ———. Agnus Dei. The agnus dei, in the Roman Catholic Church, is a cake of wax, bearing the image of a lamb bearing a cross. Being blessed by the pope, they are worn by many Catholics, and believed to drive away bad spirits and preserve their wearers from harm.—AM. CYC., "AGNUS DEI."

784. CHASTISEMENT of Children. Scourge. Severe corporal punishment was the accustomed instrument of good education in the fifteenth century. The scourge was recommended even by gentle mothers to be administered to their sons.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 5.

785. CHASTITY and Civilization. Opposed. Although the progress of civilization has undoubtedly contributed to assuage the fiercer passions of human nature, it seems to have been less favorable to the virtue of chastity, whose most dangerous enemy is the softness of the mind. The refinements of life corrupt while they polish the intercourse of the sexes. The gross appetite of love becomes most dangerous when it is elevated, or rather, indeed, disguised by sentimental passion. The elegance of dress, of motion, and of manners gives a lustre to beauty, and inflames the senses through the imagination. Luxurious entertainments, midnight dances, and licentious spectacles present at once temptation and opportunity to female frailty.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9.

786. CHASTITY, Invincible. Roman General Belisarius. Belisarius was chaste and sober. In the license of a military life, none could boast that they had seen him intoxicated with wine; the most beautiful captives of Gothic or Vandal race were offered to his embraces; but he turned aside from their charms, and the husband of Antonina was never suspected of violating the laws of conjugal fidelity.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41.

787. CHASTITY, Rare. Early Christians. It was with the utmost difficulty that ancient Rome could support the institution of six vestals; but the primitive church was filled with a great number of persons of either sex, who had devoted themselves to the profession of perpetual chastity.—GIBBON'S ROME, vol. 1, ch. 15, p. 550.

788. CHEERFULNESS, Simulated. Mary. The ship in which the Princess of Orange had embarked lay off Margate, and on the following morning anchored at Greenwich. She was received with many signs of joy and affection; but her demeanor shocked the Tories, and was not thought faultless even by the Whigs. A young woman, placed, by a destiny as mournful and awful as that which brooded over the fabled houses of Labdacus and Pelops, in such a situation that she could not, without violating her duty to her God, her husband, and her country, refuse to take her seat on the throne from which her father [James II.] had just been hurled, should have been sad, or at least serious. Mary was not merely in high, but in extravagant spirits. She entered Whitehall, it was asserted, with a girlish delight at being mistress of so fine a house, ran about the rooms, peeped into the closets, and examined the quilt of the state bed, without seeming to remember by whom those stately apartments had last been occupied. [Bishop] Burnet, who had, till then, thought her an angel in human form, could not, on this occasion, refrain from blaming her. He was the more astonished, because, when he took leave of her at the Hague, she had, though fully convinced that she was in the path of duty, been deeply dejected. To him, as to her spiritual guide, she afterward explained her conduct. William had written to inform her that some of those who had tried to separate her interests from his still continued their machinations; they gave it out that she thought herself wronged; and, if she wore a gloomy countenance, the report would be confirmed. He therefore entreated her to make her first appearance with an air of cheerfulness. Her heart, she said, was far indeed from cheerful; but she had done her best; and, as she was afraid of not sustaining well a part which was uncongenial to her feelings, she had overacted it. Her deportment was the subject of reams of scurrility in prose and verse; it lowered her in the opinion of some whose esteem she valued; nor did the world know, till she was beyond the reach of praise and censure, that the conduct which had brought on her the reproach of levity and insensibility was really a signal instance of that perfect disinterestedness and self-devotion of which man seems to be incapable, but which is sometimes found in woman.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 606.

789. CHEERING effective. War of Rebellion. The Southern troops when charging, or to express their delight, always yell in a manner peculiar to themselves. The Yankee cheer is much more like ours; but the Confederate officers declare that the rebel yell has a peculiar merit, and always produces a salutary and useful effect upon their adversaries. A corps is sometimes spoken of as a "good yelling regiment." [British officer's diary, quoted in] POLLARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, p. 349.

790. CHILD, Influence of a. Sovereign. In 1425, with a view probably to diminish the influence of the protector [the Duke of Gloucester], by exhibiting the child Henry [VI., then five years old] as a shadow of royalty, he was brought into the House of Lords and seated upon the throne upon his mother's knee. "It was a strange sight," says Speed, the chronicler, "and the first time it was ever seen in England, an infant sitting in his mother's lap, and before it could tell what English meant, to exercise the place of sovereign direction in open Parliament."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 5, p. 78.

791. CHILD, A passionate. Blaise Pascal. When the boy was a year old he was observed to resent, in the most violent manner, any caresses which his parents exchanged. Either of them might kiss him in welcome, but if they kissed one another, he cried, kicked, and made a terrible ado. He had also the peculiarity (not very rare among children) of making a great outcry whenever a basin of water was brought near him. "Every one," writes an inmate and relative of the family, "said the child was bewitched by an old woman who was in the habit of receiving alms from the house." [The "witch" applied her sorcery, and appeared to have killed the child, but it was restored.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 96.

792. CHILD, Power of. Ruler. Themistocles' son being master of his mother, and by her means, of him, he said, laughing, "This child is greater than any man in Greece; for the Athenians command the Greeks, I command the Athenians, his mother commands me, and he commands his mother."—PLUTARCH.

793. CHILD, Precocious. Samuel Johnson. When Dr. Sacheverell was at Lichfield, Johnson was not quite three years old. My grandfather Hammond observed him at the cathedral perched upon his father's shoulders, listening and gaping at the much-celebrated preacher. Mr. Hammond asked Mr. Johnson how he could possibly think of bringing such an infant to church, and in the midst of so great a crowd. He answered, because it was impossible to keep him at home; for, young as he was, he believed he had caught the public spirit and zeal for Sacheverell, and would have stayed forever in the church.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 5.

794. CHILD, A ruined. Grief. Mrs. Susanna Wesley [the mother of John Wesley] had seen much affliction. Her husband had been in prison for debt, she had suffered from poverty and sickness, some of her children had died, and others married unhappily. She wrote thus to her brother in bereavement: "O sir, happy, thrice happy are you; happy is my sister that buried your children in infancy! Secure from temptation, secure from guilt, secure from want or shame or loss of friends, they are safe beyond the reach of pain or sense of misery. Being gone hence, nothing can touch them further. Believe me, sir, it is better to mourn ten children dead than one living, and I have buried many."

795. CHILD, Value of a. Heathen. Abdallah-Ben-Abd-el-Mottalib, the father of Mahomet, when a youth narrowly escaped sacrifice at his father's hands, who, being childless, made a vow that he would sacrifice one of his children to the gods if they would grant him a family. The family came, and the lot being taken fell on Abdallah. The father was on the point of fulfilling his vow, when, by the advice of his friends, he stayed his hand and consulted a wise woman, who directed him to place ten camels, the price of blood among the Arabs, on one side, and his son on the other, and to cast lots between them; and as often as the lots should be against the youth, he was to add ten more camels. The experiment was tried, and the lot was against Abdallah ten times; the father sacrificed one hundred camels, and saved his son.—APP. CYC., "ABDALLAH."

796. CHILDHOOD, Impressible. Rev. John Davis. [He was early trained in the doctrines of religion.] He attributed his conversion, in his nineteenth year, to the ineffaceable impression of a lesson of the Holy Scriptures, heard while sitting on his father's knee when he was a child.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 4, p. 230.

797. CHILDHOOD, Terrors of. William Cowper. My chief affliction consisted in my being singled out from all the other boys by a lad of about fifteen years of age as a proper object upon whom he might let loose the cruelty of his temper. I choose to conceal a particular recital of the many acts of barbarity with which he made it his business continually to persecute me. It will be sufficient to say that his savage treatment of me impressed such a dread of his figure upon my mind, that I well remember being afraid to lift my eyes upon him higher than to his knees, and that I knew him better by his shoe-buckles than by any other part of his dress. May the Lord pardon him, and may we meet in glory !

—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 1.

798. CHILDREN abused. Paupers. [In the British collieries, 1837,] it was the custom of many of the hard task-masters to take two or three apprentices at a time, supporting themselves and families out of the labor of these unfortunate orphans, who from the age of fourteen to twenty-one never received a penny for themselves, by a servitude in which there was nothing to learn beyond a little dexterity readily acquired by short practice. [Some of them were whipped to death.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 22, p. 396.

799. ——. Spinning. Children of very tender age, collected from the London workhouses and other abodes of the friendless, were transported to Manchester and the neighborhood as apprentices. They were often worked through the whole night ; had no regard paid to their cleanliness ; and received no instruction. [They were employed on the newly invented spinning machines.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 3, p. 52.

800. CHILDREN a Blessing. Mahomet. His enemies, who regarded the privation of a male child as a disfavor of Heaven, gave to Mahomet the ignominious epithet of a man without a continuation of himself.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 140.

801. CHILDREN, Delight in. Mahomet. Mahomet's politeness to men of all conditions who approached him was gentle and respectful. "He never," says Aboulfeda, "withdrew his hand the first from the hand of those who were saluting him." He played . . . with the children of Ali, the husband of his daughter, Fatima, in default of any of his own. One of these little ones, of a tender age, named Hossein, having crept upon his back while he was prostrated in prayer, with his face against the earth, the prophet remained in this attitude, to gratify the child, until its mother came to deliver him of the burden.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 152.

802. CHILDREN, Discipline of. Severity. [A.D. 1547.] Severe discipline of children was the characteristic of an age in which men and boys, and even girls, were governed more by terror than by love. Peter Carewe, when he ran away from school, was led home in chains like a dog, and was coupled to a hound in a filthy outhouse. Lady Jane Grey described to Ascham how, in the presence of her parents, she was compelled to deport herself in every action of life according to the strictest rules ; "or else I am so sharply taunted, so cruelly threatened, yea presently, sometimes with pinches, nips, and bobs, and other ways which I will not name for the honor I bear them, so without measure disordered that I think myself in hell." The poor lady, however, considered the severity as a blessing, for it taught her to value the exceptional kindness of her schoolmaster, "who teacheth me so gently, so pleasantly, with such fair allurements to learning, that I think all the time nothing while I am with him."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 29, p. 496.

803. CHILDREN frightened. Reign of James II. [The ladies of the queen's household, prompted by avarice, plundered the victims of Jef-fneys' court.] The prey on which they pounced most eagerly was one which it might have been thought that even the most ungentle natures would have spared. Already some of the girls who had presented a standard to Monmouth [the rebel and pretended king] at Taunton had cruelly expiated their offence. One of them had been thrown into a prison where an infectious malady was raging. She had sickened and died there. Another had presented herself at the bar before Jeffreys to beg for mercy. "Take her, jailer," vociferated the judge, with one of those frowns which had often struck terror into stout hearts than hers. She burst into tears, drew her hood over her face, followed the jailer out of court, fell ill of fright, and in a few hours was a corpse. Most of the young ladies, however, who had walked in the procession were still alive. Some of them were under ten years of age. All had acted under the orders of their schoolmistress, without knowing that they were committing a crime. The queen's maids of honor asked the royal permission to wring money out of the parents of the poor children, and the permission was granted. An order was sent down to Taunton that all these little girls should be seized and imprisoned. [See more at No. 607.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 607.

804. CHILDREN, Labors of. Reign of Charles II. At Norwich, the chief seat of the clothing trade, a little creature six years old was thought fit for labor. Several writers of that time, and among them some who were considered as eminently benevolent, mention, with exultation, the fact, that in that city boys and girls of a tender age created wealth exceeding what was necessary for their own subsistence by £12,000 a year.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 390.

805. CHILDREN, Mistrained. John Milton's. He did not allow his daughters to learn any language, saying with a gibe that one tongue was enough for a woman. They were not sent to any school, but had some sort of teaching at home from a mistress. But in order to make them useful in reading to him, their father was at the pains to train them to read aloud in five or six languages, of none of which they understood one word. When we think of the time and labor which must have been expended to teach them to do this, it must occur to us that a little more labor would have sufficed to teach them so much of one or two of the languages as would have made their reading a source of interest and improvement to themselves. This Milton refused to do. The consequence was, as might have been expected, the occupation became so irksome to them that they rebelled against it. In the case of one of them, Mary, . . . this restiveness passed into open revolt. She first resisted, then neglected, and finally came to hate, her father. When some one spoke . . . she said, that was no news to her of his wedding ; but if she could hear of his death, that was something. She combined with Anne, the eldest daughter, "to counsel his maid-servant to cheat him in his marketings." They sold his books without his knowledge. "They made nothing of deserting him," he was often heard to complain.—MILTON, BY M. PATTISON, ch. 12.

806. CHILDREN, Overgovernment of. John Howard. [He had an only son.] He was exceedingly fond of his son, though he governed him, as some of his friends thought, a little too much in the patriarchal style, demanding from him the most prompt and exact obedience, and avoiding, on principle, to give him any explanation of the reasons of his requirements. He never struck the boy a blow in his life. The severest punishment he ever inflicted was compelling him to sit still for a certain time without speaking, and such was his ascendancy over the child, that one of his neighbors said that if he should tell the boy to hold his hand in the fire, he would do it. He appears to have carried the patriarchal principle too far. The boy obeyed his father, but did not confide in him; respected his father, but was not very fond of him; was proud of his father, but did not feel at home in his company. [See more at No. 418.]—CYC. OF BIOG., p. 51.

807. CHILDREN, Protection of. Roman. The same protection was due to every period of existence; and reason must applaud the humanity of Paulus for imputing the crime of murder to the father who strangles, or starves, or abandons his new-born infant, or exposes him in a public place to find the mercy which he himself had denied. But the exposition of children was the prevailing and stubborn vice of antiquity; it was sometimes prescribed, often permitted, almost always practised with impunity, by the nations who never entertained the Roman ideas of paternal powers.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44.

808. CHILDREN of the State. Spartan. Children at Sparta were not considered as belonging to the individual parents, but to the State. After the performance of the first maternal duties, the youth were educated at the charge of the public; and every citizen had as much authority over his neighbor's children as over his own. Slaves, in the same manner, were, at Sparta, a species of common property; every man might make use of his neighbor's slaves, and hunt, as Xenophon informs us, not only with his neighbor's servants, but with his dogs and horses.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 9.

809. CHILDREN to save the State. Washington. [In the dark days of the war of the Revolution Washington was returning to his army after a brief absence.] The population of the town where he was to spend the night went out to meet him. A crowd of children, repeating the acclamations of their elders, gathered around him, stopping his way, all wishing to touch him and calling him father. Pressing the hand of [Count] Dumas [one of his French allies], he said to him: "We may be beaten by the English in the field; it is the lot of arms; but see there the arm that they will never conquer."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 10, ch. 18.

810. CHILDREN, Surrender of. To Valens. The liberality of the [Roman] emperor was accompanied, however, with two harsh and rigorous conditions, which prudence might justify on the side of the Romans, but which distress alone could extort from the indignant Goths. Before they passed the Danube, they were required to deliver their arms; and it was insisted that their children should be taken from them, and dispersed through the provinces of Asia, where they might be civilized by the arts of education, and serve as hostages to secure the fidelity of their parents.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26.

811. CHILDREN surviving. Samuel Johnson. BOSWELL: "I believe, sir, a great many of the children born in London die early." JOHNSON: "Why, yes, sir." BOSWELL: "But those who do live are as stout and strong people as any; Dr. Price says they must be naturally strong to get through." JOHNSON: "That is system, sir. A great traveller observes, that it is said there are no weak or deformed people among the Indians; but he with much sagacity assigns the reason of this, which is, that the hardship of their life as hunters and fishers does not allow weak or diseased children to grow up. Now, had I been an Indian I must have died early; my eyes would not have served me to get food. I indeed now could fish, give me English tackle; but had I been an Indian I must have starved, or they would have knocked me on the head, when they saw I could do nothing."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 495.

812. CHILDREN are Treasures. Poor Man's. [When the rabble for the second time fired the rectory of Rev. Samuel Wesley, it was with difficulty that the lives of the children were saved, his son John barely getting out of the house before the roof fell, crushing the chamber where he had slept to the ground.] The father exclaimed as he received his son, "Come, neighbors, let us kneel down; let us give thanks unto God; He has given me all my eight children; let the house go, I am rich enough."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 60.

813. CHILDREN, Unfortunate. Tartars. There still remained a more disgraceful article of tribute, which violated the sacred feelings of humanity and nature. The hardships of the savage life, which destroy in their infancy the children who are born with a less healthy and robust constitution, introduced a remarkable disproportion between the numbers of the two sexes. . . . A select band of the fairest maidens of China were annually devoted to the rude embraces of the Huns.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26.

814. CHIMERA, Pursuit of. Isaac Newton. Who would have thought to find Newton an alchemist? It is a fact, that for several years this great man was intensely occupied in endeavoring to discover a way of changing the baser metals into gold. This is, perhaps, the reason why he added little to our knowledge of chemistry, though he seems to have labored at this science a longer time and with more pleasure than at any other. Being in pursuit of a chimera, he lost his time. There were periods when his furnace fires were not allowed to go out for six weeks, he and his secretary sitting up alternate nights to replenish them.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 256.

815. CHIVALRY, Baseness of. Edward I. [Edward I.] was challenged to a tournament by the Count of Chalons. . . . Edward entered the lists with a thousand retainers, both horsemen and spearmen. In the mêlée many were killed; and the English appear to have behaved with most despicable ferocity. Edward himself, when he had unhorsed the athletic count, his challenger, stood over his suppliant enemy, and labored him with a brutality of which an English costermonger would now be ashamed. Such was chivalry—that compound of cruelty and generosity, of physical daring and moral cowardice, of sensitive honor and broken faith.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 20, p. 282.

816. CHIVALRY, Modern. Battle of Lexington, Mo. [The Federals surrendered to the Confederates after a protracted siege.] When Colonel Mulligan surrendered his sword, General Price asked him for the scabbard. Mulligan replied that he had thrown it away. The general, upon receiving his sword, returned it to him, saying he disliked to see a man of his valor without a sword. . . . While awaiting his exchange Colonel Mulligan and his wife became the guests of General Price, the general surrendering to them his carriage.—POLLARD'S FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 5, p. 148.

817. CHIVALRY, Order of. Knights of St. John. The military and religious order of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem was the inspiring sigh of chivalry after the crusades. A triple spirit at that time animated the European nobility—the spirit of faith, the spirit of war, the spirit of adventure. What is called a knight was born of these three spirits combined. A pious heart, a militant arm, a chimerical imagination—those three elements composed the perfect Christian knight. Religion, war, glory, were his three souls.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 347.

818. CHIVALRY, Patriotic. Capt. Paul Jones. He landed near the castle of the Earl of Selkirk, intending to take the earl prisoner, and keep him as a hostage for the better treatment of American prisoners in England, whom the king affected to regard as felons, and who were confined in common jails. The earl was absent from home. The crew demanded liberty to plunder the castle, in retaliation for the ravages of British captains on the coast of America. Captain Jones could not deny the justice of their demand; yet, abhorring the principle of plundering private houses, and especially one inhabited by a lady, he permitted the men to take the silver plate only, forbidding the slightest approach to violence or disrespect. That silver plate he himself bought when the plunder was sold, and sent it back to the Countess of Selkirk, with a polite letter of explanation and apology. The haughty earl refused to receive it; but Captain Jones, after a long correspondence, won his heart, and the silver was replaced in the plate closet of Selkirk Castle eleven years after it had been taken from it.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 336.

819. CHOICE of Both. Lysander. [Lysander having been sent an] ambassador to Dionysius, the tyrant offered him two vests, that he might take one of them for his daughter; upon which he said his daughter knew better how to choose than he, and so took them both.—PLUTARCH'S LYSANDER.

820. CHOICE manifested. Pizarro. His followers ran down to the ship and demanded to be conveyed to Panama. Pizarro joined them, gathered them around him, and, drawing a line in the sand with his sword, addressed them thus: "Comrades, on that side," pointing to the south, "are toil, hunger, nakedness, the drenching storm, battle, and death. On this side," pointing to the north, "are ease and safety. But on that side lies Peru, with its wealth. On this side is Panama and its poverty. Choose, each man, what best becomes a brave Castilian. For my part, I go to the south." Having said these words, he stepped to the southern side of the line, and there stood, eying the homesick crowd. Twelve soldiers, one priest, and one muleteer joined him. The rest went on board the ship and returned to Panama.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 325.

821. CHOICE, Necessary. Independents. Self-preservation, uniting with ambition and wild enthusiasm, urged them to uncompromising hostility with Charles I. He or they must perish. "If my head or the king's must fall," argued Cromwell, "can I hesitate which to choose?" By an act of violence the Independents seized on the king, and held him in their special custody. "Now," said the exulting Cromwell—"now that I have the king in my hands, I have the Parliament in my pocket."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 11.

822. CHOICE, Painful. Death of Strafford. The Parliament was inflexible; the queen wept; England was in a ferment. Charles [I.], although ready to yield, still hesitated. The Queen Henrietta, of France, daughter of Henry IV., a beautiful and accomplished princess, for whom until his death the king preserved the fidelity of a husband and the passion of a lover, presented herself before him in mourning, accompanied by her little children. She besought him on her knees to yield to the vengeance of the people, which he could not resist without turning upon the innocent pledges of their love that death which he was endeavoring vainly to avert from a condemned head. "Choose," said she, "between your own life, mine, these dear children's, and the life of this minister so hateful to the nation." Charles, struck with horror at the idea of sacrificing his beloved wife and infant children, the hopes of the monarchy, replied that he cared not for his own life, for he would willingly give it to save his minister; but to endanger Henrietta and her children was beyond his strength and desire. [He signed the death-warrant of his chief minister and faithful friend.]—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 12.

823. CHRIST caricatured. Martin Luther. Bitterly did he complain that, from childhood on, he had been so trained that he paled and trembled at the mere mention of the name of Christ, whom he had been taught to regard as a severe and angry judge.—REIN'S LUTHER, p. 22.

824. CHRIST, Defence of. King of the Franks. [After his conversion] the mind of Clovis was susceptible of transient fervor; he was exasperated by the pathetic tale of the passion and death of Christ; and, instead of weighing the salutary consequences of that mysterious sacrifice, he exclaimed, with indiscreet fury, "Had I been present at the head of my valiant Franks, I would have revenged His injuries."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 37, p. 575.

825. CHRIST, Honors for. Proof. [The mind of the Emperor Theodosius was confirmed in orthodox doctrine.] He had lately bestowed on his eldest son, Arcadius, the name and honors of Augustus, and the two princes were seated on a stately throne to receive the homage of their subjects. A bishop, Amphilochius of Iconium, approached the throne, and after saluting, with due reverence, the person of his sovereign, he accosted the royal youth with the same familiar tenderness which he might have used toward a plebeian child. Provoked by this insolent behavior, the monarch gave orders that the rustic priest should be instantly driven from his presence. But while the guards were forcing him to the door, the dexterous polemic had time to execute his design, by exclaiming, with a loud voice, "Such is the treatment, O emperor, which the King of heaven has prepared for those impious men who affect to worship the Father, but refuse to acknowledge the equal majesty of His divine Son!" Theodosius immediately embraced the Bishop of Iconium, and never forgot the important lesson which he had received from this dramatic parable.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 27.

826. CHRIST, Preaching. Erasmus. Erasmus desired to set Christ Himself in the place of the church, to recall men from the teaching of Christian theologians to the teaching of the Founder of Christianity. The whole value of the gospels to him lay in the vividness with which they brought home to their readers the personal impression of Christ Himself. "Were we to have seen Him with our own eyes, we should not have so intimate a knowledge as they give us of Christ, speaking, healing, dying, rising again, as it were in our very presence." All the superstitions of mediæval worship faded away in the light of this personal worship of Christ. "If the footprints of Christ are shown us in any place, we kneel down and adore them. Why do we not rather venerate the living and breathing picture of Him in these books? We deck statues of wood and stone with gold and gems for the love of Christ. Yet they only profess to represent to us the outer form of His body, while these books present us with a living picture of His holy mind." In the same way the actual teaching of Christ was made to supersede the mysterious dogmas of the older ecclesiastical teaching. "As though Christ taught such subtleties," burst out Erasmus—"subtleties that can scarcely be understood even by a few theologians—or as though the strength of the Christian religion consisted in man's ignorance of it! It may be the safer course," he goes on, with characteristic irony, "to conceal the state mysteries of kings, but Christ desired His mysteries to be spread abroad as openly as was possible." In the diffusion, in the universal knowledge of the teaching of Christ, the foundation of a reformed Christianity had still, he urged, to be laid.—ENG. PEOPLE, § 518.

827. CHRIST substituted. Pope. In his addresses to the people he maintained in plain speech: "Christ has laid down His authority over all Christendom, until the day of judgment, and has intrusted the pope with plenary power in His stead. The pope therefore can forgive each and every sin, whether already committed or yet to be committed, and that without sorrow and repentance. The greatest guilt can be effaced by purchasing a papal certificate of forgiveness, No crime, however horrible and inconceivable in reality, is excluded from this forgiveness. The indulgence cross of the pope is not inferior in sacredness to the cross of Christ, and hence the former must be honored as highly as the latter."—REIN'S LUTHER, p. 12.

828. CHRIST, Theory of. Mahomet's. For the author of Christianity the Mohammedans are taught by the prophet to entertain a high and mysterious reverence. "Verily, Christ Jesus, the Son of Mary, is the apostle of God, and His word, which He conveyed unto Mary, and a Spirit proceeding from Him; honorable in this world and in the world to come; and one of those who approach near to the presence of God." The wonders of the genuine and apocryphal gospels are profusely heaped on His head; and the Latin church has not disdained to borrow from the Koran the immaculate conception of His virgin mother. Yet Jesus was a mere mortal; and at the day of judgment His testimony will serve to condemn both the Jews, who reject Him as a prophet, and the Christians, who adore Him as the Son of God. The malice of His enemies asspersed His reputation and conspired against His life; but their intention only was guilty; a phantom or a criminal was substituted on the cross, and the innocent saint was translated to the seventh heaven.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 108.

829. CHRISTIAN by Bereavement. Abraham Lincoln. [See No. 830.] "I had lived," he continued, "until my boy Willie died, without realizing fully these things. That blow overwhelmed me. It showed me my weakness as I had never felt it before; and if I can take what you have stated as a test, I think I can safely say that I know something of that change of which you speak; and I will further add, that it has been my intention for some time, at a suitable opportunity, to make a public religious profession!" —RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 732.

830. CHRISTIAN, Experience of a. Abraham Lincoln. [A lady interested in the work of the Christian Commission had several interviews with the President. On one occasion he said to her:] "Mrs. —, I have formed a very high opinion of your Christian character; and now, as we are alone, I have a mind to ask you to give me, in brief, your idea of what constitutes a true religious experience." The lady replied at some length, stating that, in her judgment, it consisted of a conviction of one's sinfulness and weakness and personal need of the Saviour for strength and support; that views of mere doctrine might and would differ, but when one was really brought to feel his need of divine help and to seek the aid of the Holy Spirit for strength and guidance, it was satisfactory evidence of his being born again . . . . When she had concluded Mr. Lincoln was very thoughtful for a few moments. He at length said, very earnestly: "If what you have told me is really a correct view of this great subject, I think I can say, with sincerity, that I hope I am a Christian." —RAYMOND'S LINCOLN.

831. CHRISTIAN, Spirit of the. Cromwell. [Cromwell's last prayer.] Lord, though I am a miserable and wretched creature, I am in covenant with Thee, through grace. And I may, I will, come to Thee, for thy people. Thou hast made me, though very unworthy, a mean instrument to do them some good, and Thee service ; and many have set too high a value upon me, though others wish and would be glad of my death. Lord, however Thou do dispose of me, continue and go on to do good for them. Give them consistency of judgment, one heart and mutual love ; go on to deliver them and the work of reformation ; and make the name of Christ glorious in the world. Teach those who look too much on thy instruments to depend more upon thyself. Pardon such as desire to trample upon the dust of a poor worm, for they are thy people too. And pardon the folly of this short prayer—even for Jesus Christ's sake. And give us a good night, if it be thy pleasure. Amen.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 13, p. 215.

§32. CHRISTIANITY, An absurd. Abyssinian. Its ruling characteristics are intolerance and formality. The number of regular fast-days is two hundred and sixty in each year, and a regular fast implies abstinence from drinking as well as eating. Besides these the Church decrees extraordinary fasts from time to time. Should an Abyssinian be known to neglect these fasts, his body would be refused sepulture. On the other hand, there are abundance of feasts in the Church holidays and saints' days, and travellers relate that the Abyssinian divines are at least as scrupulous in the observance of these as the fasts. Nights are spent in alternate prayer, dancing, and drinking, and the sacrament is administered before sunrise. It is reported that it has happened that when the sun rose none of the divines present were in a condition to officiate ; but it was well understood that such accidents were the fruit of excessive religious fervor.—APP. CYC., "ABYSSINIAN CHURCH."

§33. CHRISTIANITY, Advancement of. Pri-mary Cause. Our curiosity is naturally prompted to inquire by what means the Christian faith obtained so remarkable a victory over the established religions of the earth. To this inquiry an obvious but satisfactory answer may be returned—that it was owing to the convincing evidence of the doctrine itself, and to the ruling providence of its great Author.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 15.

§34. — — — Secondary Causes. What were the secondary causes of the rapid growth of the Christian church ? It will, perhaps, appear, that it was most effectually favored and assisted by the five following causes : I. The inflexible, and, if we may use the expression, the intolerant zeal of the Christians, derived, it is true, from the Jewish religion, but purified from the narrow and unsocial spirit, which, instead of inviting, had deterred the Gentiles from embracing the law of Moses. II. The doctrine of a future life, improved by every additional circumstance which could give weight and efficacy to that important truth. III. The miraculous powers ascribed to the primitive church. IV. The pure and austere morals of the Christians. V. The union and discipline of the Christian republic, which gradually formed an independent and increasing state in the heart of the Roman Empire.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 15.

§35. CHRISTIANITY, Civilization by. Cruelty. The first Christian emperor may claim the honor of the first edict which condemned the art and amusement of shedding human blood ; but this benevolent law expressed the wishes of the prince, without reforming an inveterate abuse, which degraded a civilized nation below the condition of savage cannibals. Several hundred, perhaps several thousand, victims were annually slaughtered in the great cities of the empire, and the month of December, more peculiarly devoted to the combats of gladiators, still exhibited to the eyes of the Roman people a grateful spectacle of blood and cruelty. Amid the general joy of the victory of Pollentia, a Christian poet exhorted the emperor to extirpate, by his authority, the horrid custom which had so long resisted the voice of humanity and religion. The pathetic representations of Prudentius were less effectual than the generous boldness of Telemachus, an Asiatic monk, whose death was more useful to mankind than his life. The Romans were provoked by the interruption of their pleasures ; and the rash monk, who had descended into the arena to separate the gladiators, was overwhelmed under a shower of stones. But the madness of the people soon subsided ; they respected the memory of Telemachus, who had deserved the honors of martyrdom, and they submitted, without a murmur, to the laws of Honorius, which abolished forever the human sacrifices of the amphitheatre.—GIBBON'S ROME, vol. 3, ch. 30.

§36. — — — Barbarians. Before the age of Charlemagne the Christian nations of Europe might exult in the exclusive possession of the temperate climates, of the fertile lands, which produced corn, wine, and oil ; while the savage idolaters and their helpless idols were confined to the extremities of the earth, the dark and frozen regions of the North. Christianity, which opened the gates of heaven to the barbarians, introduced an important change in their moral and political condition. They received, at the same time, the use of letters, so essential to a religion whose doctrines are contained in a sacred book ; and while they studied the divine truth, their minds were insensibly enlarged by the distant view of history, of nature, of the arts, and of society.—GIBBON'S ROME, vol. 3, ch. 37.

§37. — — — Barbarians. The admission of the barbarians into the pale of civil and ecclesiastical society delivered Europe from the depredations, by sea and land, of the Normans, the Hungarians, and the Russians, who learned to spare their brethren and cultivate their possessions. The establishment of law and order was promoted by the influence of the clergy, and the rudiments of art and science were introduced into the savage countries of the globe.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 55.

§38. CHRISTIANITY commended. Worth. If we consider the purity of the Christian religion, the sanctity of its moral precepts, and the innocent as well as the austere lives of the greater number of those who during the first ages embraced the faith of the gospel, we should naturally suppose that so benevolent a doctrine would have been received with due reverence, even by the unbelieving world.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16.

§39. CHRISTIANITY compromised. Constan-tine. The awful mysteries of the Christian faith and worship were concealed from the eyes of strangers, and even of catechumens, with an affected secrecy, which served to excite their wonder and curiosity. But the severe rules of discipline which the prudence of the bishops had instituted were relaxed by the same prudence in favor of an Imperial proselyte, whom it was so important to allure, by every gentle condescension, into the pale of the Church; and Constantine was permitted, at least by a tacit dispensation, to enjoy most of the privileges before he had contracted any of the obligations of a Christian.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 20.

§40. CHRISTIANITY discarded. France. A.D. 1794. At this time it can hardly be said that there was any religion in France. Christianity had been almost universally discarded. The priests had been banished; the churches demolished or converted into temples of science or haunts of amusement. The immortality of the soul was denied, and upon the gateways of the graveyards was inscribed, "Death is an eternal sleep!"—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 3.

§41. CHRISTIANITY and Discovery. Columbus. As the conversion of the heathens was professed to be the grand object of these discoveries, twelve zealous and able ecclesiastics were chosen for the purpose, to accompany the expedition. . . . By way, it was said, of offering to Heaven the first-fruits of these pagan nations, the six Indians whom Columbus had brought to Barcelona were baptized with great state and ceremony, the king, the queen, and Prince Juan officiating as sponsors. Great hopes were entertained that, on their return to their native country, they would facilitate the introduction of Christianity among their countrymen.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 5, ch. 8.

§42. CHRISTIANITY, Diversity in. National. In the profession of Christianity the variety of national characters may be clearly distinguished. The natives of Syria and Egypt abandoned their lives to lazy and contemplative devotion; Rome again aspired to the dominion of the world; and the wit of the lively and loquacious Greeks was consumed in the disputes of metaphysical theology. The incomprehensible mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation, instead of commanding their silent submission, were agitated in vehement and subtle controversies, which enlarged their faith at the expense, perhaps, of their charity and reason.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 54.

§43. CHRISTIANITY indestructible. By Persecution. The resentment, or the fears, of Diocletian transported him beyond the bounds of moderation, which he had hitherto preserved, and he declared, in a series of cruel edicts, his intention of abolishing the Christian name. By the first of these edicts the governors of the provinces were directed to apprehend all persons of the ecclesiastical order; and the prisons, destined for the vilest criminals, were soon filled with a multitude of bishops, presbyters, deacons, readers, and exorcists. By a second edict the magistrates were commanded to employ every method of severity which might reclaim them from their odious superstition and oblige them to return to the established worship of gods. This rigorous order was extended, by a subsequent edict, to the whole body of Christians, who were exposed to a violent and general persecution.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16.

§44. CHRISTIANITY misunderstood. Gibbon. Gibbon's account of the early Christians is vitiated by his narrow and distorted conception of the emotional side of man's nature. Having no spiritual aspirations himself, he could not appreciate or understand them in others. Those emotions which have for their object the unseen world and its centre, God, had no meaning for him; and he was tempted to explain them away when he came across them, or to ascribe their origin and effects to other instincts which were more intelligible to him. The wonderland which the mystic inhabits was closed to him; he remained outside of it, and reproduced in sarcastic travesty the reports he heard of its marvels.—MORRISON'S GIBBON, ch. 7.

§45. CHRISTIANITY, Muscular. Salem Witches. A.D. 1692. Edward Bishop, a farmer, cured the Indian servant of a fit by flogging him; he declared, moreover, his belief that he could, in like manner, cure the whole company of the afflicted; and for his scepticism found himself and his wife in prison.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 19.

§46. CHRISTIANITY, Offence of. Amusements. The public games and festivals. On those occasions the inhabitants of the great cities of the empire were collected in the circus or the theatre, where every circumstance of the place, as well as of the ceremony, contributed to kindle their devotion and to extinguish their humanity. While the numerous spectators, crowned with garlands, perfumed with incense, purified with the blood of victims, and surrounded with the altars and statues of their tutelar deities, resigned themselves to the enjoyment of pleasures which they considered as an essential part of their religious worship, they recollected that the Christians alone abhorred the gods of mankind, and by their absence and melancholy on these solemn festivals seemed to insult or to lament the public felicity.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16.

§47. CHRISTIANITY, Qualified Faith in. Poet Shelley. Leigh Hunt gives a just notion of his relation to Christianity, pointing out that he drew a distinction between the Pauline presentation of the Christian creeds and the spirit of the gospels. "His want of faith in the letter, and his exceeding faith in the spirit of Christianity, formed a comment, the one on the other, very formidable to those who chose to forget what Scripture itself observes on that point." We have only to read "Essays on Christianity," in order to perceive what reverent admiration he felt for Jesus, and how profoundly he understood the true character of His teaching.—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 5.

§48. CHRISTIANITY, Success of. World-wide. [During the decay of the Roman Empire] a pure and humble religion gently insinuated itself into the minds of men, grew up in silence and obscurity, derived new vigor from opposition, and finally erected the triumphant banner of the cross on the ruins of the Capitol. Nor was the influence of Christianity confined to the period or to the limits of the Roman Empire. After a revolution of thirteen or fourteen centuries, that religion is still professed by the nations of Europe, the most distinguished portion of human kind in arts and learning, as well as in arms. By the industry and zeal of the Europeans it has been widely diffused to the most distant shores of Asia and Africa; and by the means of their colonies has been firmly established from Canada to Chili, in a world unknown to the ancients.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 15.

849. CHRISTIANS, Uncompromising. Idolatry. Punishment was not the inevitable consequence of conviction, and the Christians, whose guilt was the most clearly proved by the testimony of witnesses, or even by their voluntary confession, still retained in their own power the alternative of life or death. It was not so much the past offence as the actual resistance which excited the indignation of the magistrate. He was persuaded that he offered them an easy pardon, since, if they consented to cast a few grains of incense upon the altar, they were dismissed from the tribunal in safety and with applause.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16.

850. CHRISTMAS, Celebration of. Revelry in France and Italy. Among the revels of the Christmas season were the so-called feasts of fools and of asses, grotesque saturnalia, which were sometimes termed "December liberties," in which everything serious was burlesqued, inferiors personified their superiors, great men becoming frolicsome, and which illustrate the proneness of man to occasionally reverse the order of society and ridicule its decencies.—ARPLETON'S AM. CYC., "CHRISTMAS."

851. CHRISTMAS changed. Puritans. Christmas had been from time immemorial the season of joy and domestic affection, the season when families assembled, when children came home from school, when quarrels were made up, when carols were heard in every street, when every house was decorated with evergreens, and every table was loaded with good cheer. At that season all hearts not utterly destitute of kindness were enlarged and softened. At that season the poor were admitted to partake largely of the overflowings of the wealth of the rich, whose bounty was peculiarly acceptable on account of the shortness of the days and of the severity of the weather. At that season the interval between landlord and tenant, master and servant, was less marked than through the rest of the year. Where there is much enjoyment there will be some excess; yet, on the whole, the spirit in which the holiday was kept was not unworthy of a Christian festival. The Long Parliament gave orders, in 1644, that the 25th of December should be strictly observed as a fast, and that all men should pass it in humbly bemoaning the great national sin which they and their fathers had so often committed on that day by romping under the mistletoe, eating boar's head, and drinking ale flavored with roasted apples. No public act of that time seems to have irritated the common people more.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2.

852. CHURCH, Attendance at. Compulsory. [In 1581 Parliament passed an enactment by which those who said mass or attended mass, or did not attend church, were subject to heavy penalties].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 12.

853. ———. Puritans. [In 1653 the Puritans punished non-attendants at church.]

"Catherine Bartlett, widow, upon her own confession, did absent herself from church the last Lord's day, contrary to the law, in the morning. Was ordered to pay 2s. 6d., and in default of paying was ordered to be set in the stocks." So says an old record. The law prohibited "sweethearts" from walking abroad in sermon time.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 11.

854. CHURCH, Befriended. Miles Standish. The colony . . . assumed a military organization; and Standish, a man of the greatest courage, the devoted friend of the church, which he never joined, was appointed to the chief command.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 8.

855. CHURCH, Bloody. Huguenots in Florida. The Spanish were masters of the port. A scene of carnage ensued; soldiers, women, children, the aged, the sick, were alike massacred. . . . After the carnage was completed mass was said, a cross was raised, and the site for a church selected, on ground still smoking with the blood of a peaceful colony. . . . So easy can fanaticism connect acts of savage ferocity with the rites of a merciful religion. . . . [In all 900 were killed].—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 2.

856. CHURCH, Caste in the. Aaron Burr. The clergyman then urged him again to repentance; advised him to return, like the prodigal son, to attend church and devote his future life to good works. Colonel Burr interrupted his visitor, and said: "You don't seem to know how I am viewed by the religious public, or by those who resort to your churches. Where is there a man among all such whom I would be willing to meet, and who would welcome me into his pew? Of your own congregation, would —, or —, or — give me a seat? These are our merchant princes—men who give tone to Wall Street, and fix the standard of mercantile morals in our city. Would they make Aaron Burr a welcome visitor to your church? Rather, indeed, I may ask, would you yourself do so? How would you feel walking up the aisle with me, and opening your pew door for my entrance?" Dr. Matthews replied that such an event would give him great pleasure. "Then," said Burr, "you would indulge your feelings of kindness at the expense of your usefulness as the minister of your congregation."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 119.

857. CHURCH conservative. James II. The Church of England was, in his view, a passive victim, which he might, without danger, outrage and torture at his pleasure; nor did he ever see his error till the universities were preparing to coin their plate for the purpose of supplying the military chest of his enemies, and till a bishop, long renowned for loyalty, had thrown aside his cassock, girt on a sword, and taken the command of a regiment of insurgents.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6.

858. CHURCH corrupted. Prosperity. When a sect becomes powerful, when its favor is the road to riches and dignities, worldly and ambitious men crowd into it, talk its language, conform strictly to its ritual, mimic its peculiarities, and frequently go beyond its honest members in all the outward indications of zeal. No discernment, no watchfulness on the part of ecclesiastical rulers, can prevent the intrusion of such false brethren. The tares and the wheat must grow together. Soon the world begins to find out that the godly are not better than other men, and argues, with some justice, that, if not better, they must be much worse. In no long time all those signs which were formerly regarded as characteristic of a saint are regarded as characteristic of a knave.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2.

859. CHURCH, A costly. St. Sophia. The dome of St. Sophia, illuminated by four-and-twenty windows, is formed with so small a curve, that the depth is equal only to one sixth of its diameter; the measure of that diameter is one hundred and fifteen feet, and the lofty centre, where a crescent has supplanted the cross, rises to the perpendicular height of one hundred and eighty feet above the pavement. The circle which encompasses the dome lightly reposes on four strong arches, and their weight is firmly supported by four massy piles, whose strength is assisted, on the northern and southern sides, by four columns of Egyptian granite. . . . The solid piles which contained the cupola were composed of huge blocks of freestone, hewn into squares and triangles, fortified by circles of iron, and firmly cemented by the infusion of lead and quicklime; but the weight of the cupola was diminished by the levity of its substance, which consists either of pumice-stone that floats in the water or of bricks from the Isle of Rhodes, five times less ponderous than the ordinary stone. This triumph of Christ was adorned with the last spoils of paganism, but the greater part of these costly stones was extracted from the quarries of Asia Minor, the isles and continents of Greece, Egypt, Africa, and Gaul. Eight columns of porphyry, which Aurelian had placed in the temple of the sun, were offered by the piety of a Roman matron; eight others of green marble were presented by the ambitious zeal of the magistrates of Ephesus; both are admirable by their size and beauty, but every order of architecture disclaims their fantastic capitals. A variety of ornaments and figures was curiously expressed in mosaic, and the images of Christ, of the Virgin, of saints, and of angels, which have been defaced by Turkish fanaticism, were dangerously exposed to the superstition of the Greeks. According to the sanctity of each object, the precious metals were distributed in thin leaves or in solid masses. The balustrade of the choir, the capitals of the pillars, the ornaments of the doors and galleries were of gilt bronze; the spectator was dazzled by the glittering aspect of the cupola; the sanctuary contained forty thousand pound weight of silver, and the holy vases and vestments of the altar were of the purest gold, enriched with inestimable gems. Before the structure of the church had arisen two cubits above the ground £45,200 were already consumed; and the whole expense amounted to £320,000; each reader, according to the measure of his belief, may estimate their value either in gold or silver; but the sum of £1,000,000 sterling is the result of the lowest computation. A magnificent temple is a laudable monument of national taste and religion; and the enthusiast who entered the dome of St. Sophia might be tempted to suppose that it was the residence, or even the workmanship, of the Deity. Yet how dull is the artifice, how insignificant is the labor, if it be compared with the formation of the vilest insect that crawls upon the surface of the temple! [See No. 863.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40.

860. CHURCH desecration. Horses. [In 1649 Cromwell used St. Paul's, in London, to stable his cavalry. An Italian passing the grand old Gothic cathedral, and seeing it full of horses, taunted Englishmen with the remark,] Now I perceive that in England men and beasts serve God alike.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 8, p. 118.

861. CHURCH, Destruction of the. James II. James did not even make any secret of his intention to exert vigorously and systematically for the destruction of the Established Church all the powers which he possessed as her head. . . . He was authorized by law to repress spiritual abuses; and the first spiritual abuse which he would repress should be the liberty which the Anglican clergy assumed of defending their own religion and of attacking the doctrines of Rome.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6.

862. CHURCH, Devotion to the. Laymen. [When in 1768 Thomas Taylor wrote Wesley to send an able and experienced preacher to care for the handful of Methodists in New York, he said,] With respect to the money for the payment of the preacher's passage over, if they cannot procure it we will sell our coats and shirts to procure it for them.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, ch. 1, p. 82.

863. CHURCH erection. Enthusiastic. This minister [Alypius], to whom Julian communicated, without reserve, his most careless levities and his most serious counsels, received an extraordinary commission to restore, in its pristine beauty, the temple of Jerusalem; and the diligence of Alypius required and obtained the strenuous support of the Governor of Palestine. At the call of their great deliverer, the Jews, from all the provinces of the empire, assembled on the holy mountain of their fathers; and their insolent triumph alarmed and exasperated the Christian inhabitants of Jerusalem. The desire of rebuilding the temple has in every age been the ruling passion of the children of Israel. In this propitious moment the men forgot their avarice, and the women their delicacy; spades and pickaxes of silver were provided by the vanity of the rich, and the rubbish was transported in mantles of silk and purple. Every purse was opened in liberal contributions, every hand claimed a share in the pious labor, and the commands of a great monarch were executed by the enthusiasm of a whole people.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 23.

864. — — — Rewarded. [Mahomet, arriving in Yathreb,] gave orders to build a mosque on the spot where he had set foot upon the ground, with a house for him and for his family. He worked at it with his own hands, assisted by the citizens of Yathreb. "Whoever works upon this edifice," said he to them, "builds for eternal life."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 103.

865. — — — St. Sophia. The principal church, which was dedicated by the founder of Constantinople to St. Sophia, or the eternal wisdom, had been twice destroyed by fire; after the exile of John Chrysostom, and during the Nika of the blue and green factions. No sooner did the tumult subside, than the Christian populace deplored their sacrilegious rashness; but they might have rejoiced in the calamity, had they foreseen the glory of the new temple, which at the end of forty days was strenuously undertaken by the piety of Justinian. The ruins were cleared away, a more spacious plan was described, and, as it required the consent of some proprietors of ground, they obtained the most exorbitant terms from the eager desires and timorous conscience of the monarch. Anthemius formed the design, and his genius directed the hands of ten thousand workmen, whose payment in pieces of fine silver was never delayed beyond the evening. The emperor himself, clad in a linen tunic, surveyed each day their rapid progress, and encouraged their diligence by his familiarity, his zeal, and his rewards. [See No. 859.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40.

866. ——. Vanity in. The new Cathedral of St. Sophia was consecrated by the patriarch, five years, eleven months, and ten days from the first foundation; and in the midst of the solemn festival Justinian exclaimed, with devout vanity, "Glory be to God, who hath thought me worthy to accomplish so great a work; I have vanquished thee, O Solomon!" But the pride of the Roman Solomon, before twenty years had elapsed, was humbled by an earthquake, which overthrew the eastern part of the dome.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40.

867. CHURCH, Episcopacy of the. Anglican. The founders of the Anglican Church had retained episcopacy as an ancient, a decent, and a convenient ecclesiastical polity, but had not declared that form of church government a divine institution. We have already seen how low an estimate Cranmer had formed of the office of bishop. In the reign of Elizabeth, Jewel, Cooper, Whitgift, and other eminent doctors defended prelacy as innocent, as useful, as what the State might lawfully establish, as what, when established by the State, was entitled to the respect of every citizen. But they never denied that a Christian community without a bishop might be a pure church. On the contrary, they regarded the Protestants of the Continent as of the same household of faith with themselves.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1.

868. CHURCH exaction. Dues. The payment of dues to the church was enjoined with a severity almost beyond belief. . . . A day was appointed for a man to pay his tithes; and if they were not paid he was to forfeit nine tenths of his tithable property. [A.D. 958-975.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 10, p. 146.

869. CHURCH, False Head of the. James II. What remained, however, after all this curtailment, might well have raised scruples in the mind of a man who sincerely believed the Church of England to be a heretical society, within the pale of which salvation was not to be found. The king made an oblation on the altar. He appeared to join in the petitions of the Litany which was chanted by the bishops. He received from those false prophets the unction typical of a divine influence, and knelt with the semblance of devotion while they called down upon him that Holy Spirit of which they were, in his estimation, the malignant and obdurate foes.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4.

870. CHURCH, Love of the. Tories. [Reign of Charles II.] There was one institution, and one only, which they prized even more than hereditary monarchy, and that institution was the Church of England. Their love of the church was not, indeed, the effect of study or meditation. Few among them could have given any reason, drawn from Scripture or ecclesiastical history, for adhering to her doctrines, her ritual, and her polity; nor were they, as a class, by any means strict observers of that code of morality which is common to all Christian sects. But the experience of many ages proves that men may be ready to fight to the death, and to persecute without pity, for a religion whose creed they do not understand, and whose precepts they habitually disobey.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3.

871. CHURCH, Meditations after. John Fitch. John Fitch had never seen nor heard of a steam-engine! As he was limping home from church one day in April, 1785 (his rheumatism, caught among the Indians, giving him many a twinge), a neighbor drove rapidly by in a chaise drawn by a powerful horse. He had frequently observed and reflected upon the tremendous power of steam, and now the thought flashed upon his mind, Could not the expansive power of steam be made to propel a carriage? For a week the idea haunted him day and night. He then concluded that such a force could be applied more conveniently to a vessel than to a carriage; and from that hour, to the end of his days, John Fitch thought of little else than how to carry out his daring conception.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 150.

872. CHURCH, Neglect of. Reproof. [Rev. William Grimshaw, an early English Methodist, of eccentric manner,] frequently would preach before the doors of such as neglected the parish worship. "If you will not come to hear me at the church," he would say on these occasions, "you shall hear me at home; if you perish, you shall perish with the sound of the Gospel in your ears."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 259.

873. CHURCH, Non-attendance at. Fine. [In 1559 an Act was passed which rendered] all persons who should absent themselves from church on Sundays and holidays liable to a fine of one shilling.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 8, p. 114.

874. CHURCH purified. Persecution. The general fate of sects is to obtain a high reputation for sanctity while they are oppressed, and to lose it as soon as they become powerful; and the reason is obvious. It is seldom that a man enrolls himself in a proscribed body from any but conscientious motives. Such a body, therefore, is composed, with scarcely an exception, of sincere persons. The most rigid discipline that can be enforced within a religious society is a very feeble instrument of purification when compared with a little sharp persecution without.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2.

875. CHURCH, Quarrel in the. Rev. Robert Newton. He was driven away at last by a quarrel with his barbarous parishioners, the cause of which did him credit. A fire broke out at Ol-ney, and burnt a good many of its straw-thatched cottages. Newton ascribed the extinction of the fire rather to prayer than water, but he took the lead in practical measures of relief, and tried to remove the earthly cause of such visitations by putting an end to bonfires and illuminations on the 5th of November. Threatened with the loss of their Guy Fawkes, the barbarians rose upon him, and he had a narrow escape from their violence.—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 3.

876. CHURCH, Rebuilding. Providence. [The inhabitants of Mecca] deliberated on the reconstruction of the Kaaba, or the temple, which was crumbling with age, and of which the pilgrims deplored the ruin. Piety impelled them, but reverence restrained them. A Roman vessel having suffered shipwreck, precisely at this juncture, upon the shoals of the Red Sea not far from Mecca, cast upon the coast some wood, iron, and a carpenter, who escaped the wreck. A divine augury was, of course, manifest in this celestial succor of materials, and an artisan to ply them. But at the moment of commencing to repair the tottering walls, there was no one who dared strike them the first blow. At last Walid, with less piety, or more hardihood than his compatriots, took up a crowbar, and cried in lifting it to give the wall a punch, "Do not be angry with us, O God of Abraham! what we are doing we do through piety." The wall tumbled, and Walid was not stricken with death. Nevertheless, the Khoreishites resolved to let pass the night before proceeding, to be well assured that no divine vengeance would punish the material sacrilege of Walid. He emerged from his house next morning safe and sound. The Khoreishites, on his first appearance, took confidence and continued the demolition.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 65.

877. CHURCH or Self. Reign of James II. The new High Commission had, during the first months of its existence, merely inhibited clergymen from exercising spiritual functions. The rights of property had remained untouched. But, early in the year 1687, it was determined to strike at freehold interests, and to impress on every Anglican priest and prelate the conviction that, if he refused to lend his aid for the purpose of destroying the church of which he was a minister, he would in an hour be reduced to beggary. . . . War was therefore at once declared against the two most venerable corporations of the realm—the universities of Oxford and Cambridge.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8.

878. CHURCH, Sin in the. George Müller. When he was fourteen his mother died . . . he not only became idle and dissipated, but was frequently guilty of falsehood and dishonesty. In this state of heart, without faith, destitute of true repentance, and possessing no knowledge whatever, either of his own lost condition as a sinner nor of God's way of salvation through Christ, he was confirmed; and in the year 1820 took the Lord's Supper for the first time at the Cathedral Church of Halberstadt.—LIFE OF GEORGE MÜLLER, p. 1.

879. CHURCH and State, Divided. [In 1140] the trumpet of Roman liberty was first sounded by Arnold of Brescia, whose promotion in the church was confined to the lowest rank, and who wore the monastic habit rather as a garb of poverty than as a uniform of obedience. His adversaries could not deny the wit and eloquence, which they severely felt; they confess with reluctance the specious purity of his morals; and his errors were recommended to the public by a mixture of important and beneficial truths. . . . He presumed to quote the declaration of Christ, that His kingdom is not of this world; he boldly maintained that the sword and the sceptre were intrusted to the civil magistrate; that temporal honors and possessions were lawfully vested in secular persons; that the abbots, the bishops, and the pope himself, must renounce either their state or their salvation; and that after the loss of their revenues, the voluntary tithes and oblations of the faithful would suffice, not indeed for luxury and avarice, but for a frugal life in the exercise of spiritual labors. During a short time the preacher was revered as a patriot; and the discontent, or revolt, of Brescia against her bishop was the first-fruits of his dangerous lessons. But the favor of the people is less permanent than the resentment of the priest; and after the heresy of Arnold had been condemned by Innocent II. in the general council of the Lateran, the magistrates themselves were urged by prejudice and fear to execute the sentence of the church. Italy could no longer afford a refuge; and the disciple of Abelard escaped beyond the Alps, till he found a safe and hospitable refuge in Zurich, now the first of the Swiss cantons. [He accomplished a revolution, and] enjoyed, or deplored, the effects of his mission; his reign continued above ten years, while two popes—Innocent II. and Anastasius IV.—either trembled in the Vatican, or wandered as exiles in the adjacent cities. . . . After his retreat from Rome Arnold had been protected by the viscounts of Campania, from whom he was extorted by the power of Cæsar; the prefect of the city pronounced his sentence; the martyr of freedom was burnt alive in the presence of a careless and ungrateful people; and his ashes were cast into the Tiber, lest the heretics should collect and worship them.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 69.

880. CHURCH, State. English. The church, in so far as it was a civil establishment, was the creature of Parliament; a statute enacted the articles of its creed, as well as its book of prayer; it was not even intrusted with a co-ordinate power to reform its own abuses; any attempt to have done so would have been treated as a usurpation; amendment could proceed only from Parliament.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 3.

881. CHURCH and State. Settlement of New Haven. By the influence of Davenport [the pastor of the colonists] it was solemnly resolved, that the Scriptures are the perfect rule of the commonwealth; the purity and peace of the ordinance to themselves and their posterity were the great end of civil order; and that church-members only should be free burgesses. . . . Annual elections were ordered, and God's word established as the only rule in public affairs.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 9.

882. — —. Conflicting. Becket's promotion to the archbishopric of Canterbury, which made him for life the second person in the kingdom, produced a total change in his conduct and demeanor. He resigned immediately the office of chancellor, and affected in his own person the most mortified appearance of rigorous sanctity. He soon manifested the motive of this surprising change. A clergyman had debauched the daughter of a gentleman, and murdered the father to prevent the effects of his resentment. The king insisted that this atrocious villain should be tried by the civil magistrate; Becket stood by for the privileges of the church, and refused to deliver him up. He appealed to the see of Rome. This was the time for Henry to make his decisive attack against the immunities claimed by the church, when, to defend these, it must vindicate the foulest of crimes. He summoned a general council of the nobility and prelates at Clarendon, where the following regulations were enacted: That churchmen when accused of crimes should be tried in the civil courts; that the king should ultimately judge in ecclesiastical and spiritual appeals; that the prelates should furnish the public supplies as barons; that forfeited goods should not be protected in churches.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 8.

883. CHURCH, Suffering for the, Bishop Mark. The Pagan magistrates, inflamed by zeal and revenge, abused the rigorous privilege of the Roman law, which substitutes, in the place of his inadequate property, the person of the insolvent debtor. Under the preceding reign Mark, Bishop of Arethusa, had labored in the conversion of his people with arms more effectual than those of persuasion. The magistrates required the full value of a temple which had been destroyed by his intolerant zeal; but as they were satisfied of his poverty, they desired only to bend his inflexible spirit to the promise of the slightest compensation. They apprehended the aged prelate, they inhumanly scourged him, they tore his beard; and his naked body, anointed with honey, was suspended, in a net, between heaven and earth, and exposed to the stings of insects and the rays of a Syrian sun. From this lofty station Mark still persisted to glory in his crime and to insult the impotent rage of his persecutors. He was at length rescued from their hands, and dismissed to enjoy the honor of his divine triumph. The Arians celebrated the virtue of their pious confessor; the Catholics ambitiously claimed his alliance; and the Pagans, who might be susceptible of shame or remorse, were deterred from the repetition of such unavailing cruelty.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 23.

884. CHURCH support. Voluntary. Tithe, at first a free gift, became established as a right by law. . . . What we now call the voluntary principle entered very largely into the means of the Saxon clergy, in addition to their tithes and their glebe. [A.D. 958-975].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 10, p. 140.

885. CHURCHES blended. Roman Catholic and Protestant. [After the accession of Elizabeth the Catholic service was modified and more acceptable to Protestants.] A priest would celebrate mass at his parsonage for the more rigid Catholics, and administer the new communion in church to the more rigid Protestants. Sometimes both parties knelt together at the same altar-rails, the one to receive hosts consecrated by the priest at home after the old usage, the other wafers consecrated in church after the new.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 702.

886. CHURCHES without Instruction. Reign of Elizabeth. Only in the few places where the more zealous of the reformers had settled was there any religious instruction. "In many places," it was reported after ten years of the queen's rule, "the people cannot yet say their commandments, and in some not the articles of their belief." Naturally enough, the bulk of Englishmen were found to be "utterly devoid of religion," and came to church "as to a May game."—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 702.

887. CIRCUMSTANCES, Difference in. Alexander. [When Alexander the Great was marching against the Persians, he] received a letter from Darius, in which the prince proposed, on condition of a pacification and future friendship, to pay him 10,000 talents in ransom of the prisoners; to cede to him all the countries on this side the Euphrates, and to give him his daughter in marriage. Upon his communicating these proposals to his friends, Parmenio [one of his generals] said: "If I were Alexander, I would accept them." "So would I," said Alexander, "if I were Parmenio." The answer he gave Darius was, that if he would come to him, he should find the best of treatment; if not, he must go and seek him.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

888. CITIES, Importance of. Henry I., the Fowler. To this prince Germany owes the foundation of her cities; for before this period, excepting the castles on the mountains, the seats of the barbarous nobility who lived by plunder, and the convents, filled with an useless herd of ecclesiastics, the bulk of the people lived dispersed in lonely farms and villages. The towns built by Henry were surrounded with walls, and regularly fortified; they were capable of containing a considerable number of inhabitants; and, in order that they might be speedily peopled, it was enjoined by the sovereign that every ninth man should remove himself, with his whole effects, from the country, and settle in the nearest town.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 4.

889. CITIES, Poverty in. Rome. Juvenal laments, as it should seem from his own experience, the hardships of the poorer citizens, to whom he addresses the salutary advice of emigrating, without delay, from the smoke of Rome, since they might purchase, in the little towns of Italy, a cheerful, commodious dwelling, at the same price which they annually paid for a dark and miserable lodging. House-rent was therefore immoderately dear; the rich acquired, at an enormous expense, the ground, which they covered with palaces and gardens; but the body of the Roman people was crowded into a narrow space, and the different floors and apartments of the same house were divided, as it is still the custom of Paris and other cities, among several families of plebeians.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31.

890. CITIES, Ungovernable. London. In 1580 a proclamation was issued against the erection of new buildings in London. The number of beggars, it alleged, was increased; there was greater danger of fire and the plague . . . the trouble of governing so great a multitude was become too great. . . . By the increase of buildings, it is said, "great infection of sickness, and dearth of victuals and fuel, hath grown and ensued, and many idle, vagrant, and wicked persons have harbored there."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 17.

891. CITIZEN, Duty of the. Patriotism. [Boethius, the Roman Senator, was made a consul.] Prosperous in his fame and fortunes, in his public honors and private alliances, in the cultivation of science and the consciousness of virtue, Boethius might have been styled happy, if that precarious epithet could safely be applied before the last term of the life of man. A philosopher liberal in his wealth and parsimonious of his time might be insensible to the common allurements of ambition, the thirst of gold and employment. And some credit may be due to the asseveration of Boethius, that he had reluctantly obeyed the divine Plato, who enjoins every virtuous citizen to rescue the State from the usurpation of vice and ignorance.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39.

892. CITIZENS, Naturalized. Roman. The republic gloried in her generous policy, and was frequently rewarded by the merit and services of her adopted sons. Had she always confined the distinction of Romans to the ancient families within the walls of the city, that immortal name would have been deprived of some of its noblest ornaments. Virgil was a native of Mantua; Horace was inclined to doubt whether he should call himself an Apulian or a Lucanian; it was in Padua that an historian was found worthy to record the majestic series of Roman victories. The patriot family of the Catos emerged from Tusculum; and the little town of Arpinum claimed the double honor of producing Marius and Cicero, the former of whom deserved, after Romulus and Camillus, to be styled the Third Founder of Rome; and the latter, after saving his country from the designs of Catiline, enabled her to contend with Athens for the palm of eloquence.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2.

893. CITIZENSHIP, Honor of. Bolivar. [In 1813 he succeeded in driving the Spaniards from the soil of Venezuela after a terrible struggle with brutal enemies. He then resigned his commission after the example of Washington. The Spaniards renewed the war, and General Bolivar, amid great disasters, led his patriot army to the conflict.] The career of Bolivar, henceforth, was one of almost unbroken victory; and, after four years of terrible warfare, the Spanish Government was compelled to treat for peace, and to concede the independence of the United Republics. Again Bolivar resigned his commission as general and dictator. In his address to Congress, he said: "I am the child of camps. Battles have borne me to the chief magistracy, and the fortune of war has sustained me in it; but a power like that which has been confided to me is dangerous in a republican government. I prefer the title of Soldier to that of Liberator; and, in descending from the Presidential chair, I aspire only to merit the title of good citizen."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 490.

894. CITIZENSHIP, Intelligent. Spartans. The youth of Sparta, from their attendance at the public tables, were from their infancy familiarly acquainted with all the important business of the commonwealth. They knew thoroughly its constitution, the powers of the several functionaries of the state, and the defined duties and rights which belonged to the kings, the magistrates, and the citizens. Hence arose (more than perhaps from any other cause) that permanence of constitution which has been so justly the admiration both of ancient and modern politicians; for where all orders of men know their precise rights and duties, and there are laws sufficient to secure to them the one and protect them in the exercise of the other, there will rarely be a factious struggle for power or pre-eminence; as all inordinate ambition will be most effectually repressed by a general spirit of vigilance and caution, as well as the difficulty and danger attendant on innovations.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 9.

895. CITY, Blessings of the. Three. [At the beginning of the sixth century the] nobles of Rome were flattered by sonorous epithets and formal professions of respect, which had been more justly applied to the merit and authority of their ancestors. The people enjoyed, without fear or danger, the three blessings of a capital—order, plenty, and public amusements.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39.

896. CITY, Contaminating. Rome. After a month's residence in the cloister of "S. Maria del Popolo," on the "Piazza del Popolo," Luther set out on his return home. He had not tarried longer than was necessary; for, said he, "Whoever goes to Rome for the first time is looking for a rogue; whoever goes again will find him; and whoever goes the third time will return with him."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 4, p. 39.

897. CITY, Establishment of a. Ancients. At the foundation of a city the priests and all employed leaped over a fire; then they made a circular excavation, into which they threw the first-fruits of the season, and some handfuls of earth brought from the native city by the founders. The entrails of victims were next consulted; and if favorable, they proceeded to trace the limits of the town with a line of chalk. This track they then marked by a furrow, with a plough drawn by a white bull and heifer. . . . The ceremony was concluded by a great sacrifice to the tutelary gods of the city, who were solemnly invoked.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 1.

898. CITY, Populous. Rome. If we adopt the same average, which, under similar circumstances, has been found applicable to Paris, and indifferently allow about twenty-five persons for each house, of every degree, we may fairly estimate the inhabitants of Rome at twelve hundred thousand—a number which cannot be thought excessive for the capital of a mighty empire, though it exceeds the populousness of the greatest cities of modern Europe.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31.

899. CITY, Sins of the. Abraham Lincoln. [His anecdote of Mr. Campbell, once Secretary of State for Illinois.] A cadaverous-looking man, with a white neck-cloth, . . . informed that Mr. Campbell had the letting of the Hall of Representatives, he wished, if possible, to secure it for a course of lectures. . . . "What is to be the subject?" . . . "The Second Coming of our Lord."

"It is of no use," said Campbell; "if you will take my advice, you will not waste your time in this city. It is my private opinion, that if the Lord has been in Springfield once, He will never come the second time."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 749.

900. CITY, Vices of the. London. Every race of every nation abides there, and have there brought their vices. It is full of gamblers and panders, of braggadocios and flatterers, of buffoons and fortune-tellers, of extortioners and magicians. [A.D. 1194.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 22.

901. CIVILIZATION, Dangers of. Romans. When we recollect the complete armor of the Roman soldiers, their discipline, exercises, evolutions, fortified camps, and military engines, it appears a just matter of surprise, how the naked and unassisted valor of the barbarians could dare to encounter, in the field, the strength of the legions and the various troops of the auxiliaries, which seconded their operations. The contest was too unequal, till the introduction of luxury had enervated the vigor, and a spirit of disobedience and sedition had relaxed the discipline of the Roman armies.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 275.

902. CIVILIZATION, Demands of. Sir Francis Drake. It thus appears that this brave man spent his life in warring upon the Spaniards. What ought we to think of him? Was he a buccaneer, or a patriot sailor waging legitimate warfare? I answer the question thus: The worst man of whom history gives any account, and the most formidable enemy modern civilization has had to encounter, was Philip II., King of Spain. He was a moody, ignorant, cruel, sensual, cowardly hypocrite. So long as that atrocious tyrant wielded the resources of the Spanish monarchy—then the most powerful on earth—the first interest of human nature was the reduction of his power. To do this was the great object and the almost ceaseless effort of Queen Elizabeth and the Protestant powers in alliance with her. In lending a hand to this work Francis Drake was fighting on the side of civilization, and preparing the way for such an America as we see around us now; for, in limiting the power of Philip, he was rescuing the fairest portions of America from the blight of Spanish superstition, Spanish cruelty, and Spanish narrowness. That he fought his share of this fight in a wild, rough, buccaneering manner, was the fault of his age more than his own.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 361.

903. CIVILIZATION, Effete. Greeks. The situation of the Greeks [who had been conquered by the Romans] was very different from that of the barbarians [conquered by them]. The former had been long since civilized and corrupted. They had too much taste to relinquish their language, and too much vanity to adopt any foreign institutions. Still preserving the prejudices after they had lost the virtues of their ancestors, they affected to despise the unpolished manners of the Roman conquerors, while they were compelled to respect their superior wisdom and power.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2, p. 45.

904. CIVILIZATION, Failure of. American Indians. [In 1817 the Indian nations of what was formerly known as the North-Western Territory ceded to the United States certain tracts of land, lying chiefly in Ohio, for money and certain annuities.] A reservation of certain tracts, amounting in the aggregate to about three hundred thousand acres, was made by the red man with the approval of the Government. For it was believed that the Indians, living in small districts surrounded with American farms and villages, would abandon barbarism for the habits of civilized life. But the sequel proved that the men of the woods had no aptitude for such a change.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 52, p. 417.

905. CIVILIZATION, Fleeing from. Samuel Houston. His elder brothers . . . compelled him to go into a merchant's store and stand behind the counter. This kind of life he had little relish for, and he suddenly disappeared. A great search was made for him, but he was nowhere to be found for several weeks. At last intelligence reached the family that Sam had crossed the Tennessee River and gone to live among the Indians, where, from all accounts, he seemed to be getting on much more to his liking. They found him, and began to question him on his motives for this novel proceeding. Sam was now, although so very young, nearly six feet high, and, standing straight as an Indian, coolly replied that "he preferred measuring deer tracks to tape—that he liked the wild liberty of the red men better than the tyranny of his own brothers, and if he could not study Latin in the academy, he could, at least, read a translation from the Greek in the woods, and read it in peace. So they could go home as soon as they liked."—LESTER'S HOUSTON, p. 16.

906. CIVILIZATION, Growth of. Ancient. Advancement from barbarism to civilization is a very slow and gradual process, because every step in that process is the result of necessity after the experience of an error, or the strong feeling of a want. These experiences, frequently repeated, show at length the necessity of certain rules and customs to be followed by the general consent of all; and these rules become in time positive enactments or laws, enforced by certain penalties, which are various in their kind and in their degree, according to the state of society at the time of their formation.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 3.

907. CIVILIZATION, Late. Russians. Till the middle of the fifteenth century the Russians were an unconnected multitude of wandering tribes, professing different religions, and most of them yet idolaters. A sovereign, or duke, of Russia paid a tribute to the Tartars of furs and cattle to restrain their depredations.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 35, p. 473.

908. CIVILIZATION misrepresented. To American Indians. [Verazzano, the Italian, explored the American coast.] The savages were more humane than their guests. A young sailor, who had nearly been drowned, was revived by the courtesy of the natives; the voyagers robbed a mother of her child, and attempted to kidnap a young woman. . . . The natives of the more northern region were hostile and jealous . . . perhaps this coast had been visited for slaves; its inhabitants had become wise enough to dread the vices of Europeans.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 1.

909. CIVILIZATION, Origin of modern. Romans—Germans. M. Guizot . . . says that among the elements of modern civilization, the spirit of legality or regular association was derived from the Roman world, from the municipalities and the Roman laws. From the Germans came the spirit of personal liberty.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 3, p. 46.

910. CIVILIZATION, Progress of. Greeks. The aboriginal Greeks, under the various denominations of Pelasgi, Aones, Iliantes, Leleges, etc., were a race of savages who dwelt in caverns, and are said to have been so barbarous as to live without any subordination to a chief or leader, to have fed on human flesh, and to have been ignorant of the use of fire.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 6, p. 52.

911. ———. Britons. The Britons proper from the interior showed few signs of progress. They did not break the ground for corn; they had no manufactures; they lived on meat and milk, and were dressed in leather. They dyed their skins blue that they might look more terrible. They wore their hair long, and had long mustaches. In their habits they had not risen out of the lowest order of savagery. They had wives in common, and brothers and sisters, parents and children, lived together with promiscuous unrestraint.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 16.

912. CIVILIZATION, Revival of. A.D. 1485–1514. The world was passing through changes more momentous than any it had witnessed since the victory of Christianity and the fall of the Roman Empire. Its physical bounds were suddenly enlarged. The discoveries of Copernicus revealed to man the secret of the universe. Portuguese mariners doubled the Cape of Good Hope and anchored their merchant fleets in the harbors of India. Columbus crossed the untraversed ocean to add a New World to the Old. Sebastian Cabot, starting from the port of Bristol, threaded his way among the icebergs of Labrador. This sudden contact with new lands, new faiths, new races of men, quickened the slumbering intelligence of Europe into a strange curiosity. The first book of voyages that told of the western world, the travels of Amerigo Vespucci, were soon "in everybody's hands." The "Utopia" of More, in its wide range of speculation on every subject of human thought and action, tells us how roughly and utterly the narrowness and limitation of human life had been broken up. At the very hour when the intellectual energy of the middle ages had sunk into exhaustion the capture of Constantinople by the Turks and the flight of its Greek scholars to the shores of Italy opened anew the science and literature of an older world. The exiled Greek scholars were welcomed in Italy; and Florence, so long the home of freedom and of art, became the home of an intellectual revival.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 503.

913. CLAMOR, Dangerous. Popular. The Emperor Valens, who, at length, had removed his court and army from Antioch, was received by the people of Constantinople as the author of the public calamity. Before he had reposed himself ten days in the capital, he was urged by the licentious clamors of the Hippodrome to march against the barbarians, whom he had invited into his dominions; and the citizens, who are always brave at a distance from any real danger, declared, with confidence, that, if they were supplied with arms, they alone would undertake to deliver the province from the ravages of an insulting foe. The vain reproaches of an ignorant multitude hastened the downfall of the Roman Empire; they provoked the desperate rashness of Valens, who did not find, either in his reputation or in his mind, any motives to support with firmness the public contempt. He was soon persuaded, by the successful achievements of his lieutenants, to despise the power of the Goths. . . . The event of the battle of Adrianople [was] . . . fatal to Valens and to the empire.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26.

914. CLAIRVOYANCE, Agitation by. Swedenborg. Swedenborg went to bed, and I went to sit in another room, with the master of the house, with whom I was conversing. We both heard a remarkable noise, and could not apprehend what it could be, and therefore drew near to a door, where there was a little window that looked into the chamber where Swedenborg lay. We saw him with his arms raised toward heaven, and his body appeared to tremble. He spoke much for the space of half an hour, but we could understand nothing of what he said, except that, when he let his hands fall down, we heard him say with a loud voice, "My God!" But we could not hear what he said more. He remained afterward very quietly in his bed. I entered into his chamber with the master of the house, and asked him if he was ill. "No," said he; "but I have had a long discourse with some of the heavenly friends, and am at this time in a great perspiration." And as his effects were embarked on board the vessel, he asked the master of the house to let him have a shirt; he then went again to bed, and slept till morning.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, p. 181.

915. CLAIRVOYANCE, Information by. Swedenborg. Says [Immanuel] Kant: "When Swedenborg arrived at Gottenburg from England, Mr. William Castel invited him to his house, together with a party of fifteen persons. About six o'clock Swedenborg went out, and after a short interval returned to the company quite pale and alarmed. He stated that a dangerous fire had just broken out in Stockholm, at Sundermalm (distant three hundred miles from Gottenburg), and that it was spreading very fast. He was restless, and went out often. He said that the house of one of his friends, whom he named, was already in ashes, and that his own was in danger. At eight o'clock, after he had been out again, he joyfully exclaimed, "Thank God! the fire is extinguished the third door from my house." This news occasioned great commotion among the company. It was announced to the governor the same evening. The next morning Swedenborg was sent for by the governor, who questioned him concerning the disaster. . . . On Monday evening a messenger arrived at Gottenburg, who was despatched during the time of the fire. In the letters brought by him the fire was described precisely in the manner stated by Swedenborg. On Tuesday morning a royal courier arrived at the governor's with the melancholy intelligence of the fire, of the loss it had occasioned, and of the houses damaged and ruined, not in the least differing from that which Swe-denborg had given the moment it had ceased; the fire had been extinguished at eight o'clock.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, p. 137.

916. CLEANLINESS, Physical. Koran. Cleanliness is the key of prayer; the frequent lustration of the hands, the face, and the body, which was practised of old by the Arabs, is solemnly enjoined by the Koran; and a permission is formally granted to supply with sand the scarcity of water.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50.

917. CLEANLINESS, Reaction against. James Watt's Son. [The second Mrs. Watt] was a thrifty Scotch housewife, and such was her passion for cleanliness, that she taught her pet dogs to wipe their feet on the door-mats. Her propensity was carried to a pitch which often fretted her son by the restraints it imposed. [He said to a lady] . . . I love dirt.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 41.

918. CLEMENCY, Appeal to. Of Mahomet. [After the conquest of Mecca] several of the most obnoxious victims were indebted for their lives to his clemency or contempt. The chiefs of the Koreish were prostrate at his feet. "What mercy can you expect from the man whom you have wronged?" "We confide in the generosity of our kinsman." "And you shall not confide in vain: begone! you are safe, you are free." The people of Mecca deserved their pardon by the profession of Islam.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50.

919. CLEMENCY, Vile. James II. None of the traitors had less right to expect favor than Wade, Goodenough, and Ferguson. These three chiefs of the rebellion [in Scotland] had fled together from the field of Sedgemoor. . . . Wade and Goodenough were soon discovered and brought up to London. Deeply as they had been implicated in the Rye House Plot, conspicuous as they had been among the chiefs of the Western insurrection, they were suffered to live, because they had it in their power to give information which enabled the king to slaughter and plunder [through Jeffreys' court] some persons whom he hated, but to whom he had never been able to bring home any crime.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5.

920. CLERGY, Arrogance of. Political. Lotharius, now emperor, and Pepin, his brother's son, took up arms against the two other sons of Louis le Débonnaire—Louis of Bavaria and Charles the Bald. A battle ensued at Fontenay, in the territory of Auxerre, where, it is said, there perished 100,000 men. Lotharius and his nephew were vanquished. Charlemagne had compelled the nations whom he subdued to embrace Christianity; Lotharius, to acquire popularity and strengthen his arms, declared an entire liberty of conscience throughout the empire, and many thousands reverted to their ancient idolatry. In punishment of this impiety, Lotharius was now solemnly deposed by a council of bishops, who took upon them to show their authority no less over the victorious than over the vanquished princes. They put this question to Charles the Bald and to Louis of Bavaria—"Do you promise to govern better than Lotharius has done?" "We do," said the obsequious monarchs. "Then," returned the bishops, "we, by divine authority, permit and ordain you to reign in his stead"—a proceeding in which it is difficult to say whether the arrogance of the clergy most excites our indignation, or the pusillanimity of the monarchs our contempt.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 4.

921. CLERGY, Deference to. Ferdinand II. The voice of a monk was to Ferdinand II. the voice of God. "Nothing on earth," writes his own confessor, "was more sacred in his eyes than a priest. If it could happen, he used to say, that an angel and a Regular were to meet him at the same time and place, the Regular should receive his first, and the angel his second, obeisance."—THIRTY YEARS' WAR, § 221.

922. CLERGY degraded. Reign of James II. [The king commanded his illegal manifesto, which aimed at the overthrow of the Protestant Church, to be publicly read by the clergy.] In the city and liberties of London were about a hundred parish churches. In only four of these was the order in council obeyed. At St. Gregory's the declaration was read by a divine of the name of Martin. As soon as he uttered the first words, the whole congregation rose and withdrew. At St. Matthew's, in Friday Street, a wretch named Timothy Hall, who had disgraced his gown by acting as broker for the Duchess of Portsmouth in the sale of pardons, and who now had hopes of obtaining the vacant bishopric of Oxford, was in like manner left alone in his church. At Sergeant's Inn, in Chancery Lane, the clerk pretended that he had forgotten to bring a copy; and the chief justice of the King's Bench, who had attended in order to see that the royal mandate was obeyed, was forced to content himself with this excuse. Samuel Wesley, the father of John and Charles Wesley, a curate in London, took for his text that day the noble answer of the three Jews to the Chaldean tryant, "Be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up!" Even in the chapel of St. James' Palace the officiating minister had the courage to disobey the order. The Westminster boys long remembered what took place that day in the Abbey. Sprat, Bishop of Rochester, officiated there as dean. As soon as he began to read the declaration, murmurs and the noise of people crowding out of the choir drowned his voice. He trembled so violently that men saw the paper shake in his hand. Long before he had finished, the place was deserted by all but those whose situation made it necessary for them to remain.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8.

923. — — —. Middle Ages. During these perpetual contests for ecclesiastical power and pre-eminence, the Christian religion itself was debased both by the practice and the principles of its teachers. The sole object of the clergy was to accumulate wealth and temporal distinctions. While they indulged in every species of voluptuousness and debauchery, they were so deplorably ignorant, that it is confidently asserted there were many bishops who could not repeat the Apostles' Creed, nor read the Sacred Scriptures. This, indeed, was a necessary consequence of the iniquitous distribution of ecclesiastical preferments. These were either sold to the highest bidder, or were bestowed as bribes by the sovereigns and superior pontiffs, to attach the most artful and often the most worthless to their interests.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 4.

924. ——. Reign of Charles II. In the mansions of men of liberal sentiments and cultivated understandings, the chaplain was doubtless treated with urbanity and kindness. His conversation, his literary assistance, his spiritual advice, were considered as an ample return for his food, his lodging, and his stipend. But this was not the general feeling of the country gentlemen. The coarse and ignorant squire, who thought that it belonged to his dignity to have grace said every day at his table by an ecclesiastic in full canonicals, found means to reconcile dignity with economy. A young Levite—such was the phrase then in use—might be had for his board, a small garret, and £10 a year, and might not only perform his own professional functions, might not only be the most patient of butts and of listeners, might not only be always ready in fine weather for bowls, and in rainy weather for shovel-board, but might also save the expense of a gardener or of a groom. Sometimes the reverend man nailed up the apricots, and sometimes he curried the coach-horses. He cast up the farrier's bills. He walked ten miles with a message or a parcel. If he was permitted to dine with the family, he was expected to content himself with the plainest fare. He might fill himself with the corned beef and the carrots; but as soon as the tarts and cheese-cakes made their appearance, he quitted his seat, and stood aloof till he was summoned to return thanks for the repast, from a great part of which he had been excluded.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3.

925. CLERGY dissipated. English. [In the middle of the eighteenth century a] Prussian clergyman, walking into Oxford at midnight, was introduced by a courteous pedestrian to an alehouse. "How great," he says, "was my astonishment when, on being shown into a room, I saw several gentlemen in academic dress sitting round a large table, each with his pot of beer before him." He thought it extraordinary that at this unseasonable hour he should suddenly find himself in a company of Oxonian clergy. As the morning drew near, after a carousal which stupefied the German, the gentleman who introduced him suddenly exclaimed, "I must read prayers this morning at All Souls." The clergy would spend the morning in scampering after the hounds, dedicate the evening to the bottle, and reel from inebriety to the pulpit.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6, p. 110.

926. CLERGY, Economical. Samuel Johnson. Speaking of the late Duke of Northumberland living very magnificently when Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, somebody remarked, it would be difficult to find a suitable successor to him; then, exclaimed Johnson, "he is only fit to succeed himself." He advised me, if possible, to have a good orchard. He knew, he said, a clergyman of small income who brought up a family very respectably, which he chiefly fed with apple-dumplings.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 178.

927. CLERGY, Heroic. George Walker. [When the army of James II. marched against the Protestants in Londonderry, the commander of the forces, Colonel Lundy, advised a surrender, there being but a small store of provisions and an inadequate preparation for defence.

George Walker, a minister, roused the courage of the people for defence. Two regiments sailed away to England, leaving the inhabitants to protect themselves. The faith and zeal of the pious Walker inspired the fortitude of the defenders, and procured a complete deliverance for the besieged.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 6, p. 85.

928. CLERGY, Immoral. England A.D. 1509. At the commencement of the reign of Henry VII., the long immunity of the clergy from any interference of the legislature with their course of life, however criminal, was in a slight degree interrupted by a statute, which recognizes the existence in the commonwealth of "priests, clerks, and religious men openly noised of incontinent living." . . . The statute . . . recites that "persons lettered" have been more bold to commit murder, robbery, and other mischievous deeds, because they have been continually admitted to the benefit of the clergy upon trust of the privilege of the church. [All those were held to be clerks who could read.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15, p. 243.

929. CLERGY impoverished. The. Reign of Charles I. [During the reign of Charles I., when the degradation of the clergy was ridiculed,] the curates that did the work were so scandalously paid, that in London they were to be found dining at "three-penny ordinary," and in the country were glad to obtain from the church-warden "a barley bag-pudding" for their Sunday dinner. The country curate is described as being "under a great prebend, and a double beneficed rich man," with a salary inferior to his cook or coachman. The London curates are represented as living "upon citizens' trenchers, and were it not that they were pitiful and charitable to them, there was no possibility of subsistence."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 30, p. 486.

930. CLERGY, Interference of. War. [The Crusaders, after a struggle of two years, captured the city of Damietta.] After it was taken it was lost by the folly of the pope's legate, who pretended that, in right of his master, he had a title to regulate the disposition of the army as well as the church. By his orders they were encamped between two branches of the Nile, at the very time when it began its periodical inundation. The Sultan of Egypt assisted its operation by a little art, and, by means of canals and sluices, contrived entirely to deluge the Christians on one side, while he burnt their ships on the other. In this extremity they entreated an accommodation, and agreed to restore Damietta and return into Phœnicia, leaving their king, John de Brienne, as an hostage.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, vol. 9.

931. CLERGY, Labor of the. Need of. [Burnet exhorted the clergy of his own time] to "labor more," instead of cherishing extravagant notions of the authority of the Church. If to an exemplary course of life in their own persons "clergymen would add a little more labor—not only performing public offices, . . . but . . . making their calling the business of their whole life, their own minds would be in better temper, and their people would show more esteem" and regard for them.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 4, p. 59.

932. CLERGY, Lost. "Damned." Chrysostom declares his free opinion that the number of bishops who might be saved bore a very small proportion to those who would be damned.—NOTE IN GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 32.

933. CLERGY, Marriage of. Reign of Charles II. With his cure he was expected to take a wife; the wife had ordinarily been in the patron's service; and it was well if she was not suspected of standing too high in the patron's favor. . . . An Oxonian . . . complained bitterly, not only that the country attorney and the country apothecary looked down with disdain on the country clergyman, but that one of the lessons most earnestly inculcated on every girl of honorable family was to give no encouragement to a lover in orders, and that if any lady forgot this precept, she was almost as much disgraced as by an illicit amour. Clarendon, who assuredly bore no ill-will to the Church, mentions it as a sign of the confusion of ranks which the Great Rebellion had produced, that some damsels of noble families had bestowed themselves on divines. A waiting woman was generally considered as the most suitable helpmeet for a parson. Queen Elizabeth, as head of the Church . . . issued special orders that no clergyman should presume to marry a servant-girl without the consent of her master or mistress.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3.

934. CLERGY, Militant. Pope Julius II. Julius II., the successor of Alexander VI., was a pontiff of great political abilities, of a bold and ambitious character, and consummately skilled in the art of war. It was he who employed Michael Angelo to cast his statue in brass, and when the sculptor would have put a book in his hand, "No," said he, "give me a sword, I understand that better than a breviary."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 14.

935. ———. Prior John. About this time [May, 1514] Prior John, great captain of the French navy, with his galleys and foists, charged with great basilisks and other great artillery, came on the border of Sussex, and came aland on the night at a poor village in Sussex Brighthelmstone; and ere the watch could him descry he set fire on the town, and took such poor goods as he found. Then the watch fired the beacons, and people began to gather; which seeing, Prior John sounded his trumpet to call his men aboard, and by that time it was day. Then six archers which kept the watch followed Prior John to the sea and shot so fast that they beat the galley men from the shore, and Prior John himself waded to the foist. [The bold prior himself was shot with an arrow in the face; and he offered an image of himself, with the identical arrow sticking in the waxen cheek, in gratitude to our Lady at Boulogne for saving his life by miracle.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 17, p. 274.]

936. CLERGY, Neglect of the. Social Evils. In the beginning of the eighteenth century, and long after, we see no struggle against great social evils on the part of the clergy. Every attempt at social reform was left to the Legislature, which was utterly indifferent to those manifestations of wretchedness and crime that ought to have been dealt with by the strong hand.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 4, p. 60.

937. CLERGY, Patriotic. Siege of Paris. The Normans applied the battering rams to the walls, and effected a breach, but were bravely beat off by the besieged. The venerable Bishop Gosselin, an honor to his character and profession, repaired every day to the ramparts, set up there the standard of the cross, and, after bestowing his benedictions on the people, gallantly stood at their head, armed with the battle-axe and cuirass; but the worthy prelate died of fatigue in the midst of the siege. [About A.D. 845.]—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 6.

938. CLERGY, Political. English. [In 1710, during the fiercest party strife, the return of a Tory preponderance in Parliament was attributed by Dr. Burnet to the efforts of the clergy.] Besides a course for some months, of inflaming sermons, they went about from house to house, pressing their people to show, on this great occasion, their zeal for the Church, and now or never to save it.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 24, p. 364.

939. CLERGY, Poverty of. Reign of Charles II. In general, the divine who quitted his chaplainship for a benefice and a wife found that he had only exchanged one class of vexations for another. Not one living in fifty enabled the incumbent to bring up a family comfortably. As children multiplied and grew, the household of the priest became more and more beggarly. Holes appeared more and more plainly in the thatch of his parsonage and in his single cassock. Often it was only by toiling on his glebe, by feeding swine, and by loading dung-carts, that he could obtain daily bread; nor did his utmost exertions always prevent the bailiffs from taking his concordance and his inkstand in execution. It was a white day on which he was admitted into the kitchen of a great house, and regaled by the servants with cold meat and ale. His children were brought up like the children of the neighboring peasantry. His boys followed the plough, and his girls went out to service. Study he found impossible, for the advowson of his living would hardly have sold for a sum sufficient to purchase a good theological library; and he might be considered as unusually lucky if he had ten or twelve dog-eared volumes among the pots and pans on his shelves. Even a keen and strong intellect might be expected to rust in so unfavorable a situation.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3.

940. ———. Fifteenth Century. The highest payment for a parish priest was 9 marks—£6. The artificer, at fourpence a day, earned about as much as the parish priest, to suffice for his board, apparel, and other necessities. [A.D. 1450-1485.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 8, p. 125.

941. CLERGY, Profligate. Eighteenth Century. The indecorum, if not the profligacy, of a large number of the English clergy, for a period of half a century, is exhibited by too many contemporary witnesses to be considered as the exaggeration of novelists, satirical poets, travelers, and dissenters. Ridicule, pity, indignation, produced little or no change for more than a generation. . . . What shall we say to the testimony of Dr. Knox, head-master of Tunbridge school? "The public have long remarked with indignation, that some of the most distinguished coxcombs, drunkards, debauchees, and gamesters who figure at the watering-places and all public places of resort are young men of the sacerdotal order." What to the "shepherd" of Crabbe?

"A jovial youth, who thinks Sunday task
As much as God or man can fairly ask. . . ."
[Advertisements like the following were published:] "Wanted a curacy in a good sporting country, where the duty is light and the neighborhood convivial." . . . [Rev. Dr. Warner, a popular preacher,] desires Lord Selwyn to send him "the magazine, with the delicate amours of the noble lord, which must be very diverting." He describes a dinner with two friends: "We have just parted in a tolerable state of insensibility to the ills of life." "I have been preaching this morning, and am going to dine—where?—in the afternoon. We shall bolt the door and (but, hush! softly! let me whisper it, for it is a violent secret, and I shall be blown to the devil if I blab, as in this house we are Noah and his precise family)—play cards."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6, p. 109.

942. CLERGY rejected. Ireland. Queen Elizabeth . . . established the Protestant Episcopal Church [in Ireland]. The Anglican prelates and priests, divided from the Irish by the insuperable barrier of language, were quartered upon the land, shepherds without sheep, pastors without people; strangers to the inhabitants, wanting not them but theirs. The churches went to ruin; the benefices went to men who were held as foreigners and heretics, and who had no care for the Irish but to compel them to pay tithes. The inferior clergy were . . . as immoral as they were illiterate.—BANCROFT'S U.S., vol. 5, ch. 4.

943. CLERGY, Secular. Bramins. This division of the Indian castes is characteristic of a very singular state of society. The four principal castes, or tribes, are the bramins, the soldiers, the husbandmen, and the mechanics. The bramins, as we have already observed, are the priests, who, like the Roman Catholic clergy, are some of them devoted to a life of regular discipline, as the different orders of monks; and others, like the secular clergy, mix in the world, and enjoy all the freedom of social life.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 23.

944. CLERGY, Selfish. The Pope's. In 1343 the commons petitioned for the redress of the grievance of papal appointments to vacant livings in despite of the rights of patrons or the Crown; and Edward formerly complained to the pope of his appointing "foreigners, most of them suspicious persons, who do not reside on their benefices, who do not know the faces of the flocks intrusted to them, who do not understand their language, but, neglecting the cure of souls, seek as hirelings only their worldly hire." In yet sharper words the king rebuked the papal greed. "The successor of the apostles was set over the Lord's sheep to feed and not to shear them." The Parliament declared "that they neither could nor would tolerate such things any longer;" and the general irritation moved slowly toward those statutes of provisors and premunire which heralded the policy of Henry VIII.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 321.

945. CLERGY, Sleepy. Contagious. Bishop Burnet says . . . the main body of our clergy has always appeared dead and lifeless to me, and instead of animating one another, they seem rather to lay one asleep.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 4, p. 59.

946. CLERGY, Taxation of. France. Boniface VIII., elected pope in the year 1294, was one of the most assuming prelates that ever filled the pontifical chair; yet he found in Philip [IV.] the Fair of France a man determined to humble his pride and arrogance. Philip resolved to make the clergy of his kingdom bear their proportion in furnishing the public supplies as well as the other orders of the state. The pope resented this as an extreme indignity offered to the Church, and issued his pontifical bull commanding all the bishops of France to repair immediately to Rome. Philip ordered the bull to be thrown into the fire, and strictly prohibited any of his bishops from stirring out of the kingdom. He repaired, however, himself to Rome, and threw the pope into prison; but being soon after obliged to quit Italy, Boniface regained his liberty.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 11.

947. CLIMATE, Changes of. Italy. In the time of Homer the vine grew wild in the island of Sicily, and most probably in the adjacent continent. . . . A thousand years afterward Italy could boast, that of the fourscore most generous and celebrated wines, more than two thirds were produced from her soil. The blessing was soon communicated to the Narbonne province of Gaul; but so intense was the cold to the north of the Cevennes, that, in the time of Strabo, it was thought impossible to ripen the grapes in those parts of Gaul. This difficulty, however, was gradually vanquished.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2.

948. CLIMATE changes. Europe. Some ingenious writers have suspected that Europe was much colder formerly than it is at present; and the most ancient descriptions of the climate of Germany tend exceedingly to confirm their theory. . . . I shall select two remarkable circumstances. . . . 1. The great rivers which covered the Roman provinces, the Rhine and the Danube, were frequently frozen over, and capable of supporting the most enormous weights. The barbarians, who often chose that severe season for their inroads, transported, without apprehension or danger, their numerous armies, their cavalry, and their heavy wagons, over a vast and solid bridge of ice. Modern ages have not presented an instance of a like phenomenon. 2. The reindeer, that useful animal, from whom the savage of the North derives the best comforts of his dreary life, is of a constitution that supports, and even requires, the most intense cold. He is found on the rock of Spitzberg, within ten degrees of the Pole; he seems to delight in the snows of Lapland and Siberia; but at present he cannot subsist, much less multiply, in any country to the south of the Baltic. In the time of Cæsar the reindeer, as well as the elk and the wild bull, was a native of the Hercynian forest, which then overshadowed a great part of Germany and Poland. The modern improvements sufficiently explain the causes of the diminution of the cold. These immense woods have been gradually cleared, which intercepted the rays of the sun. The morasses have been drained, and in proportion as the soil has been cultivated, the air has become more temperate.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9.

949. CLIMATE vs. Character. Samuel Johnson. We had another evening by ourselves at the Mitre. It happening to be a very rainy night, I made some commonplace observations on the relaxation of nerves and depression of spirits which such weather occasioned; adding, however, that it was good for the vegetable creation. Johnson, who denied that the temperature of the air had any influence on the human frame, answered, with a smile of ridicule, "Why, yes, sir, it is good for vegetables, and for the animals who eat those vegetables, and for the animals who eat those animals." This observation of his aptly enough introduced a good supper.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 117.

950. CLIMATE, Character by. Northern. [During the rise of the Roman Empire,] in all levies, a just preference was given to the climates of the North over those of the South.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1.

951. ———. Revolutions. A plain in the Chinese Tartary, only eighty leagues from the great wall, was found by the missionaries to be three thousand geometrical paces above the level of the sea. Montesquieu, who has used and abused the relations of travellers, deduces the revolutions of Asia from this important circumstance, that heat and cold, weakness and strength, touch each other without any temperate zone.—NOTE IN GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26.

952. ———. Laplanders. The consanguinity of the Hungarians and Laplanders would display the powerful energy of climate on the children of a common parent; the lively contrast between the bold adventurers who are intoxicated with the wines of the Danube, and the wretched fugitives who are immersed beneath the snows of the polar circle. Arms and freedom have been the ruling, though too often the unsuccessful, passion of the Hungarians, who are endowed by nature with a vigorous constitution of soul and body. Extreme cold has diminished the stature and congealed the faculties of the Laplanders; and the Arctic tribes, alone among the sons of men, are ignorant of war and unconscious of human blood; a happy ignorance, if reason and virtue were the guardians of their peace!—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 55.

953. CLIMATE, Demoralized by. Vandals. [In Africa the Roman general] Belisarius appeared; and he advanced without opposition as far as Grasse, a palace of the Vandal kings, at the distance of fifty miles from Carthage. The weary Romans indulged themselves in the refreshment of shady groves, cool fountains, and delicious fruits; and the preference which Procopius allows to these gardens over any that he had seen, either in the East or West, may be ascribed either to the taste or the fatigue of the historian. In three generations prosperity and a warm climate had dissolved the hardy virtue of the Vandals, who insensibly became the most luxurious of mankind. In their villas and gardens, which might deserve the Persian name of Paradise, they enjoyed a cool and elegant repose; and, after the daily use of the bath, the barbarians were seated at a table profusely spread with the delicacies of the land and sea. Their silken robes, loosely flowing, after the fashion of the Medes, were embroidered with gold; love and hunting were the labors of their life, and their vacant hours were amused by pantomimes, chariot-races, and the music and dances of the theatre.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41.

954. CLIMATE, Fear of. The Portuguese. In their first voyage after the discovery of Madeira, they passed Cape Boyador, and in the space of a few years, advancing above four hundred leagues to the south, they had discovered the river Senegal, and all the coast between Cape Blanco and Cape Verd; they were now near ten degrees within the torrid zone, and were surprised to find the climate still temperate and agreeable; yet, on passing the river Senegal, and observing the human species to assume a different form, the skin as black as ebony, the woolly hair, and that peculiarity of feature which distinguishes the Negroes, they naturally attributed this to the influence of heat, and began to dread the consequences of a nearer approach to the line. They returned to Portugal . . . the common voice of their countrymen dissuaded them from any further attempts.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 18.

955. CLIMATE, Injurious. Samuel Johnson. It was a very wet day, and I again complained of the disagreeable effects of such weather. JOHNSON: "Sir, this is all imagination, which physicians encourage; for man lives in air, as a fish lives in water; so that if the atmosphere press heavy from above, there is an equal resistance from below. To be sure, bad weather is hard upon people who are obliged to be abroad; and men cannot labor so well in the open air in bad weather as in good; but, sir, a smith or a tailor, whose work is within doors, will surely do as much in rainy weather as in fair. Some very delicate frames, indeed, may be affected by wet weather; but not common constitutions."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 125.

956. CLIMATE, Protection of. Ethiopians. His generals, in the early part of his [Augustus] reign, attempted the reduction of Ethiopia and Arabia Felix. They marched near a thousand miles to the south of the tropic; but the heat of the climate soon repelled the invaders, and protected the unwarlike natives of those sequestered regions.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1.

957. CLIMATE, Sickness from. Pilgrims. The spring of 1621 brought a ray of hope to the distressed Pilgrims of New Plymouth. Never was the returning sun more welcome. The fatal winter had swept off one half of the number. The son of the benevolent Carver was among the first victims of the terrible climate. The governor himself sickened and died, and the broken-hearted wife found rest in the same grave with her husband. But now, with the approach of warm weather, the destroying pestilence was stayed, and the spirits of the survivors revived with the season. Out of the snows of winter, the desolations of disease, and the terrors of death, the faith of the Puritan had come forth triumphant.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 13.

958. CLOTHING, Angelic. Swedenborg. Since angels are men, and live together in society like men on earth, therefore they have garments, houses, and other things similar to those which exist on earth, but of course infinitely more beautiful and perfect. The garments of the angels correspond to their intelligence. The garments of some glitter as with flame, and those of others are resplendent as with light; others are of various colors, and some white and opaque. The angels of the inmost heaven are naked, because they are in innocence, and nakedness corresponds to innocence. It is because garments represent states of wisdom that they are so much spoken of in the Word, in relation to the church and good men.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, p. 109.

959. CLOTHING, Costly. Persian Kings. The revenues of whole provinces, according to Herodotus, were bestowed on the attire of their favorite concubines; and the provinces themselves took from that circumstance their popular appellations. Plato, in his Alcibiades, mentions a Greek ambassador who travelled a whole day through a country called the Queen's Girdle, and another in crossing a province which went by the name of the Queen's Head-Dress. The regal throne was of pure gold, overshadowed by a palm tree and vine of the same metal, with clusters of fruit composed of precious stones.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 9.

960. CLOTHING exchanged. Roman Emperor Elagabalus. A long train of concubines, and a rapid succession of wives, among whom was a vestal virgin, ravished by force from her sacred asylum, were insufficient to satisfy the impotence of his passions. The master of the Roman world affected to copy the dress and manners of the female sex, preferred the distaff to the sceptre, and dishonored the principal dignities of the empire by distributing them among his numerous lovers, one of whom was publicly invested with the title and authority of the emperor's, or, as he more properly styled himself, of the empress's husband.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6.

961. CLOTHING, Prohibited. Protection. The clamor was so great against India silks and printed cottons, that after the 29th of September, 1701, the wearing all wrought silks, of the manufacture of Persia, China, or East India, and all calicoes, printed, dyed, or stained therein, was absolutely prohibited. If we may believe the advocates of prohibition, this statute had the effect of re-peopling Spitalfields, "that looked like a deserted place."—KNIGHT'S ENGLAND, vol. 5, ch. 2, p. 20.

962. CLUBS, Ancient. Egypt. Antony and Cleopatra established a society called the "Inimitable Livers," of which they were members; they also instituted another, by no means inferior in splendor or luxury, called "The Companions in Death." Their friends were admitted into this, and the time passed in mutual treats and diversions.—PLUTARCH'S ANTONY.

963. COERCION, Patriotic. Tories. A. D. 1774. Two thousand men marched in companies to the common in Worcester [Mass.], where they forced Timothy Paine to walk through their ranks with his hat off as far as the centre of their hollow square, and read a written resignation of his seat at the [governor's] council-board.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 8.

964. COIN clipped. England. [In July, 1694, we read] many executed in London for clipping money, now done to that intolerable extent, that there was hardly any money that was worth above half the nominal value.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 12, p. 182.

965. COINCIDENCE, Alarming. Cromwell. The equinoctial gale, which had commenced on the preceding day, now swelled into a storm which swept over England with the effect of an earthquake. The carriages which conveyed to London the friends of the protector, apprised of his extreme danger, were unable to stem the violence of the wind, and took refuge in the inns on the road. The lofty houses of London undulated like vessels tossed upon the ocean. Roofs were carried off; trees that had stood for centuries in Hyde Park were torn up by the roots and prostrated on the ground, like bundles of straw. Cromwell expired at two o'clock in the afternoon, in the midst of this convulsion of nature. He departed as he was born, in a tempest. Popular superstition recognized a miracle in this coincidence, which seemed like the expiring efforts of the elements to tear from life and empire the single man who was capable of enduring the might of England's destiny, and whose decease created a void which none but himself could fill.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 77.

966. COINCIDENCE, Comforting. Seven Bishops. [They were imprisoned by James II., because they would not join him in the overthrow of their cherished Protestant faith.] On the evening of the Black Friday, as it was called, on which they were committed, they reached their prison just at the hour of divine service. They instantly hastened to the chapel. It chanced that in the second lesson were these words: "In all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in distresses, in stripes, in imprisonments." All zealous churchmen were delighted by this coincidence, and remembered how much comfort a similar coincidence had given Charles I. at the time of his death.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8.

967. COINCIDENCE repeated. Theseus. Theseus, then, appeared to answer to Romulus in many particulars. Both were of uncertain parentage, born out of wedlock, and both had the repute of being sprung from the gods. Both stood in the first rank of warriors, for both had great powers of mind, with great strength of body. One was the founder of Rome, and one peopled Athens, the most illustrious cities in the world. Both carried off women by violence. Both were involved in domestic miseries and exposed to family resentment, and both, toward the end of their lives, are said to have offended their respective citizens, if we may believe what seems to be delivered with the least mixture of poetical fiction.—PLUTARCH'S ROMULUS.

968. COINCIDENCE, Strange. Adams—Jefferson. A few days before [John Adams'] . . . death, a gentleman called upon him and asked him to give a toast, which should be presented at the Fourth of July banquet as coming from him. The old man said: "I will give you, INDEPENDENCE FOREVER!" "Will you not add something to it?" asked his visitor. "Not a word," was the reply. The toast was presented at the banquet, where it was received with deafening cheers; and almost at that moment the soul of this great patriot passed away. Among the last words that could be gathered from his dying lips were these: "Thomas Jefferson still survives!" But Thomas Jefferson did not survive. On the same Fourth of July, a few hours before, Jefferson also departed this life. Few events have ever occurred in the United States more thrilling to the people than the death, on the same anniversary of the nation's birth, of these two aged, venerable, and venerated public servants.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 178.

969. ——. Hugh Miller. Day had not wholly disappeared . . . when I saw at the open door, within less than a yard of my breast, a dis severed hand and arm stretched out toward me. The hand and arm were evidently those of a female; they had a livid and sodden appearance; and directly fronting me, where the body ought to have been, there was only blank transparent space. . . . I . . . ran shrieking to my mother. . . . My mother going to the door saw nothing. . . . Its coincidence with the probable time of my father's death [he went down in a storm at sea] seems at least curious.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 87.

970. COLOR, Caste of. Green—Blue. The Roman race, in its first institution, was a simple contest of two chariots, whose drivers were distinguished by white and red liveries; two additional colors, a light green and a cerulean blue, were afterward introduced; and, as the races were repeated twenty-five times, one hundred chariots contributed in the same day to the pomp of the circus. The four factions soon acquired a legal establishment and a mysterious origin. [The struggle of the green and blue was supposed to represent the conflict of the earth and sea.] The sportive distinction of two colors produced two strong and irreconcilable factions, which shook the foundations of a feeble government. The popular dissensions, founded on the most serious interest or holy pretence, have scarcely equalled the obstinacy of this wanton discord, which invaded the peace of families, divided friends and brothers, and tempted the female sex, though seldom seen in the circus, to espouse the inclinations of their lovers, or to contradict the wishes of their husbands. Every law, either human or divine, was trampled under foot, and as long as the party was successful, its deluded followers appeared careless of private distress or public calamity. The license, without the freedom, of democracy was revived at Antioch and Constantinople, and the support of a faction became necessary to every candidate for civil or ecclesiastical honors. A secret attachment to the family or sect of Anastasius was imputed to the greens; the blues were zealously devoted to the cause of orthodoxy and Justinian, and their grateful patron protected, above five years, the disorders of a faction whose seasonable tumults overawed the palace, the senate, and the capitals of the East. Insolent with royal favor, the blues affected to strike terror by a peculiar and barbaric dress, the long hair of the Huns, their close sleeves and ample garments, a lofty step, and a sonorous voice. In the day they concealed their two-edged poniards, but in the night they boldly assembled in arms, and in numerous bands, prepared for every act of violence and rapine. Their adversaries of the green faction, or even inoffensive citizens, were stripped and often murdered by these nocturnal robbers, and it became dangerous to wear any gold buttons or girdles or to appear at a late hour in the streets of a peaceful capital. A daring spirit, rising with impunity, proceeded to violate the safeguard of private houses; and fire was employed to facilitate the attack, or to conceal the crimes of these factious rioters. No place was safe or sacred from their depredation; to gratify either avarice or revenge, they profusely spilled the blood of the innocent; churches and altars were polluted by atrocious murders; and it was the boast of the assassins, that their dexterity could always inflict a mortal wound with a single stroke of their dagger. The dissolute youth of Constantinople adopted the blue livery of disorder; the laws were silent, and the bonds of society were relaxed.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40, p. 58.

971. COLOR, Prejudice of. Portuguese. [The discoverers of the African coast were dissuaded from extending their discoveries.] It was even hinted, as a probable consequence, that the mariners, after passing a certain latitude, would be changed into blacks, and thus retain forever a disgraceful mark of their temerity.—CLARKE'S PROGRESS OF MARITIME DISCOVERY.

972. COLOR—LINE in Commerce. Columbus. [He was about to start on his third voyage.] Jayme Ferrer, an eminent and learned lapidary, assured Columbus that, according to his experience, the rarest objects of commerce, such as gold, precious stones, drugs, and spices, were chiefly to be found in the regions about the equinoctial line, where the inhabitants were black, or darkly colored; and that until the admiral should arrive among people of such complexions he did not think he would find those articles in great abundance.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 10, ch. 1.

973. COLLEGE vs. Capital. Yale. It remains to be told how Connecticut came to be blessed with two capitals. As soon as the college was determined upon in 1700, the question arose, and with which such questions usually are, In what town shall it be situated? The institution was begun at Saybrook, and was not finally established at New Haven until 1718, which was sixteen years after the first student entered. This removal, as the reader may imagine, was keenly resented, not only by Saybrook, but by other towns which had hoped to be chosen as the site of the college, particularly Hartford. To reconcile Hartford to the disappointment, the Legislature agreed to build a State House there, as they said, "to compensate for the college at New Haven." They tried to appease Saybrook by voting £25 sterling for the use of its schools. But Saybrook was irreconcilable. When the sheriff, by order of the trustees, attempted to remove the library to New Haven, a riot ensued, in the course of which two hundred and fifty volumes were conveyed away to parts unknown, and never recovered.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 593.

974. COMBAT, Pleasure in. Romans. The shows of the amphitheatre rose naturally out of that taste for martial exercises which we find in the first ages of every warlike people. About the 490th year of Rome, Marcus and Decimus Brutus presented a combat of gladiators for the first time at Rome. About a century after that period the athletæ were introduced for a public show; and there were combats of slaves with bears and lions. Sylla, during his prætorship, exhibited a combat where 100 men fought with 100 lions; and Julius Cæsar, during his ædileship, presented a show where there fought 800 couples of gladiators.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 4.

975. COMMAND divided. Invasion of Scotland. Some of the Scottish emigrants, heated with republican enthusiasm, and utterly destitute of the skill necessary to the conduct of great affairs, employed all their industry and ingenuity, not in collecting means for the attack which they were about to make on a formidable enemy, but in devising restraints on their leader's power and securities against his ambition. The self-complacent stupidity with which they insisted on organizing an army as if they had not been organizing a commonwealth would be incredible if it had not been frankly and even boastfully recorded by one of themselves. . . . Argyle was to hold the nominal command in Scotland; but he was placed under the control of a committee which reserved to itself all the most important parts of the military administration. This committee was empowered to determine where the expedition should land, to appoint officers, to superintend the levying of troops, to dole out provisions and ammunition. All that was left to the general was to direct the evolutions of the army in the field; and he was forced to promise that, even in the field, except in the case of a surprise, he would do nothing without the assent of a council of war. [The enterprise was a total failure.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5.

976. COMMERCE, Benefits of. Reflex. The most obvious is the general diffusion of industry. Among a commercial people the faculties of both mind and body are of necessity almost constantly employed. Invention is ever on the stretch to discover new sources of gain. And the enterprising spirit of the more opulent furnishes constant occupation to the mechanic, the manufacturer, and the laborer. Inseparably connected . . . is a spirit of frugality. Riches have their full value when purchased by the labor of either mind or body, and what cost dear will not be frivolously expended. . . . We observe the association of the same qualities among the Dutch and the Chinese.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 8.

977. ———. Government. Another necessary consequence of the prevalence of commerce is a regularity and strictness of the national police, a severity of the laws with respect to mutual contracts and obligations, and a consequent security in the transactions of individuals with each other. . . . Science is likewise greatly indebted to commerce. Thus astronomy, navigation, general mathematics, mechanics, and, indeed, all sciences subservient to practical utility are advanced by it.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 8.

978. ———. Holland. A.D. 1581. Their commerce gathered into their harbors the fruits of the wide world. Producing almost no grain of any kind, Holland had the best supplied granary of Europe; without fields of flax it swarmed with weavers of linen; destitute of flocks, it became the centre of all woollen manufactures; and provinces that had not a forest built more ships than all Europe besides.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 15.

979. ———. English. A scheme was proposed to the States of Holland upon the death of the stadtholder, William II., for a union and coalition between the two republics. It was not relished by the Dutch, who were better pleased to maintain their own independence; and the Parliament of England, piqued at their refusal, immediately declared war against them. The Navigation Act was passed, which prohibited foreigners from importing into England in their ships any commodity which was not the growth or manufacture of their own country—an act which struck heavily against the Dutch, because their country produces few commodities; and their commerce consists chiefly in being the factors of other nations. This statute was in another way beneficial to the English, by obliging them to cultivate maritime commerce, from which they have derived the greatest part of their national wealth. In this war, which was most ably maintained on both sides—under Blake, the English admiral, and Van Tromp and de Ruyter, admirals of the Hollanders—the English, on the whole, had a clear superiority; the Dutch were cut off entirely from the commerce of the Channel; their fisheries were totally suspended, and above 1600 of their ships fell into the hands of the English.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 30.

980. COMMERCE, Burdened. American Colonies. On the restoration of monarchy a severer policy was at once adopted. All vessels not bearing the English flag were forbidden to enter the harbors of New England. A law of exportation was enacted by which all articles produced in the colonies and demanded in England should be shipped to England only. Such articles of production as the English merchants did not desire might be sold in any of the ports of Europe. The law of importation was equally odious; such articles as were produced in England should not be manufactured in America, but should be bought from England only. Free-trade between the colonies was forbidden, and a duty of five per cent, levied for the benefit of the English king, was put on both exports and imports. Human ingenuity could hardly have invented a set of measures better calculated to produce an American Revolution.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 14.

981. COMMERCE, Enterprise of. Discovery. Sebastian Cabot, young, and fired with ambition to follow the career of Columbus, was probably the prime mover of the enterprise; but the patent granted by the king conferred the requisite authority upon "John Kabotto" and his sons, Lewis, Sebastian, and Sancius. The king took care not to risk any capital in the proposed voyage; for the patent authorized the adventurers "to sail to all parts, countries and seas of the East, of the West, and of the North, under our banners and ensigns, with five ships, etc., upon their own proper costs and charges." The wealthy Bristol merchant, in all probability, furnished the capital of the enterprise which gave to England all her rights in North America; and that merchant was not an Englishman.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 330.

982. COMMERCE, Importance of. A.D. 1685. In some parts of Kent and Sussex none but the strongest horses could in winter get through the bog, in which at every step they sank deep. The markets were often inaccessible during several months. It is said that the fruits of the earth were sometimes suffered to rot in one place, while in another place distant only a few miles the supply fell far short of the demand.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3.

983. COMMERCE neglected. Egypt. With regard to any intercourse with other nations by commerce, the Egyptians had so little genius of that sort, that while the Red Sea was left open to all the maritime nations who chose to frequent it, they would not suffer any of those foreign vessels to enter an Egyptian port. They had no ships of their own, for their country produced no timber fit for the construction even of the small boats employed in navigating the Nile, which obliged them to use baked earth for that purpose, and sometimes reeds covered with varnish. They held the sea in detestation, from a religious prejudice, and they avoided all intercourse with mariners.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4.

984. COMMERCE, Patriotism of. American Revolution. [During the excitement aroused by the Stamp Act,] the importers of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia entered into a solemn compact to purchase no more goods of Great Britain until the Stamp Act should be repealed. And the people applauded the action of the merchants, and cheerfully denied themselves all imported luxuries.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 37.

985. COMMERCE, Pioneers of. Phœnicians. To the Phœnicians all antiquity has joined in attributing the invention of navigation; or, at least, it seems an agreed point that they were the earliest among the nations of antiquity who made voyages for the sake of commerce. The Canaanites (for it is by that name that the Phœnicians are known in Scripture) were a powerful people in the days of Abraham.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 5, p. 49.

986. COMMERCE, Piracy of. By Great Britain. A.D. 1755. France and England were still at peace; and their commerce was mutually protected by the sanction of treaties. Of a sudden hostile orders were issued to all British vessels of war to take all French vessels, private as well as public; and without warning ships from the French colonies . . . were carried into English ports.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 9.

987. COMMERCE and Politics. Controlling Government. The progress of European civilization had endowed commerce with legislative power. Its councils prevailed in England, where it dictated the national policy, prescribed alliances, and menaced wars. In America the political influence of commerce sprung, not from progress, but from sympathy with the movement of Europe; and it was less gloriously content with introducing new maxims of legislation and new systems of finance.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 23.

988. COMMERCE, Precedence of. Savages. Water, ever a favorite highway, is especially the highway of uncivilized man; to those who have no axes the thick jungle is impervious; emigration by water suits savage life; canoes are older than wagons, and ships than chariots; a gulf, a strait, the sea intervening between islands, divide less than the matted forest.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

989. COMMERCE prohibited. Spartans. Commerce was strictly prohibited; and although the territory of Lacedæmon contained a considerable extent of sea-coast, and afforded many excellent harbors, the Spartans allowed no foreigners to approach their shores, and had not a single trading vessel of their own.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 9, p. 92.

990. COMMERCE, Revenge of. British. [After the Americans threw British tea into Boston harbor] Parliament made haste to find revenge. On the last day of March, 1774, the Boston Port Bill was passed. It was enacted that no kind of merchandise should any longer be landed or shipped at the wharves of Boston. The custom-house was removed to Salem, but the people of that town refused the benefits which were proffered by the hand of tyranny. The inhabitants of Marblehead tendered the free use of their warehouses to the merchants of Boston.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 37.

991. COMMERCE and Science. Discovery of America. John Cabot, a Venetian merchant residing in Bristol . . . and his son Sebastian first approached the continent which no European had dared to visit, or had known to exist. . . . Thus the discovery of our continent was an exploit of private mercantile adventure; and the possession of the new-found land was a right vested by an exclusive patent in the family of a Bristol merchant. . . . He gave England a continent, and no one knows his burial-place.—BANCROFT'S HIST. U. S., vol. 1, ch. 1.

992. COMMERCE, Spirit of. Selfish. One most natural effect of the commercial spirit is a selfish and interested turn of mind; a habit of measuring everything by the standard of profit and loss, and a predominant idea that wealth is the main constituent both of public and private happiness. The contrast of character, in this respect, between the Romans and Carthaginians, has been finely remarked by Polybius. "In all things," says that judicious writer, "which regard the acquisition of wealth, the manners and customs of the Romans are infinitely preferable to those of the Carthaginians. This latter people esteemed nothing to be dishonorable that was connected with gain. Among them money is openly employed to purchase the dignities and offices of the State; but all such proceedings are capital crimes at Rome." I am afraid that a contrast, so honorable to the Romans, could only have been made with justice in the early periods of the republic; since we know that without an increase of commerce, to which might be attributed the consequent increase of corruption and venality, those vices had attained to as great a height toward the end of the republic at Rome as ever they had done at Carthage. But wealth acquired by plunder, rapine and speculation is yet more corruptive of the manners of a people than riches acquired by merchandise.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 8.

993. ———. Unwarlike. Another effect of the prevalence of the commercial spirit is to depress the military character of a people, and to render them indisposed to warlike enterprises. The advancement of trade cannot take place in any high degree unless a nation is at peace with its neighbors, and enjoys domestic security. The prospect of that precarious gain which arises from warfare will not weigh against the certain advantages which commerce derives from a state of peace. The art of war will not, therefore, flourish as a profession among a commercial people, and the practice of it will generally be intrusted to mercenary troops. Military rank will be in low esteem, because, when purchased, it ceases in a great degree to be honorable. Thus the Carthaginians, though certainly not inferior by nature to the Romans in courage and military prowess, were become so from habit and education. The armies of the empire were not composed of its native subjects; they were mercenaries, and, therefore, had no natural affection for that soil which they were called to defend, or that people who were nothing more than their paymasters. Hence the signal inferiority of their armies to the Romans, unless when commanded by Carthaginian generals of high natural military genius.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 8.

994. COMMERCE, Success by. Dutch. Amsterdam profited by this decline of commerce on the Baltic, and upon the demolition of Antwerp became, as we have already said, the greatest commercial city of the north. Inhabiting a country gained almost entirely from the sea, and extremely unfruitful, the Dutch, urged by necessity, by the means of trade alone, and domestic manufactures, attained to a very high degree of wealth and splendor. The country of Holland does not produce what is sufficient to maintain the hundredth part of its inhabitants. The Dutch have no timber nor maritime stores, no coals, no metal, yet their commerce furnished them with everything. Their granaries were full of corn, even when the harvest failed in the most fertile countries; their naval stores were most abundant, and the populousness of this country, which, in reality, is but a bank of barren sand, exceeded prodigiously that of the most fruitful and most cultivated of the European kingdoms.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 18.

995. COMMUNION with God. Cromwell. Here again is a letter to one of his daughters, when the writer was on board the John, on his expedition to Ireland: "MY DEAR DAUGHTER: Your letter was very welcome to me. I like to see anything from your hand; because, indeed, I stick not to say I do entirely love you. And, therefore, I hope a word of advice will not be unwelcome nor unacceptable to thee. I desire you both to make it, above all things, your business to seek the Lord; to be frequently calling upon Him that He would manifest Himself to you in His Son; and be listening what returns He makes to you, for He will be speaking in your ear and your heart if you attend thereunto."—HOOD'S CROMWELL, p. 163.

996. COMMUNION by Likeness. John Milton. The style of "Paradise Lost" is then only the natural expression of a soul thus exquisitely nourished upon the best thoughts and finest words of all ages. It is the language of one who lives in the companionship of the great and the wise of past time. It is inevitable that when such a one speaks his tones, his accent, the melodies of his rhythm, the inner harmonies of his linked thoughts, the grace of his allusive touch, should escape the common ear. To follow Milton, one should at least have tasted the same training through which he put himself. Te quoque dignum finge deo. The many cannot see it, and complain that the poet is too learned. They would have Milton talk like Bunyan or William Cobbett, whom they understand.—MILTON, BY M. PATTISON, ch. 13.

997. COMMUNION, Unity by. Fox—Cromwell. To the witness of the young Quaker against priestcraft and war, he replied: "It is very good; it is truth; if thou and I were but an hour of a day together, we should be nearer one to the other."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 11.

998. COMMUNISM, American. Colonists. The man who was chiefly instrumental in organizing the London Company was Bartholomew Gosnold. . . . By the terms of the charter, the affairs of the company were to be administered by a superior council residing in London and an inferior council residing in the colony [now embraced in Virginia, Carolinas, and westward]. . . . In the first organization of the companies not a single principle of self-government was admitted. The most foolish clause in the patent was that which required the proposed colony or colonies to hold all property in common for five years.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 7.

999. COMMUNISM, Equality by. Lycurgus. A bold political enterprise of Lycurgus was a new division of the lands. For he found a prodigious inequality, the city overcharged with many indigent persons who had no land, and the wealth centred in the hands of a few. Determined, therefore, to root out the evils of insolence, envy, avarice, and luxury, and those distempers of a state still more inveterate and fatal—I mean poverty and riches—he persuaded them to cancel all former divisions of land, and to make new ones, in such a manner that they might be perfectly equal in their possessions and way of living. A story goes of our legislator, that some time after returning from a journey through the fields just reaped, and seeing the shocks standing parallel and equal, he smiled and said to some that were by, "How like is Laconia to an estate newly divided among many brothers!" After this he attempted to divide also the movables, in order to take away all appearance of inequality; but he soon perceived that they could not bear to have their goods directly taken from them, and therefore took another method, counter-working their avarice by a stratagem.—PLUTARCH'S "LYCURGUS."

1000. ———. Spartans. Agis IV. had succeeded to one branch of the throne of Sparta a short time before Aratus was chosen prætor of the Achaian States. This prince, a better man than a wise politician, had cherished the chimerical project of restoring the ancient laws of Lycurgus, as conceiving this the only means of rescuing his country from the disorders induced by the universal corruption of its manners. But there is a period when political infirmity has attained such a pitch that recovery is impossible; and Sparta had arrived at that period. The design of Agis, of course, embraced the radical reform of a new division of all the land of the republic—a project sufficient to rouse the indignation and secure the mortal enmity of the whole of the higher class of citizens, and of almost every man of weight and consideration in his country. The plan was therefore to be conducted with the greatest caution and secrecy till sufficiently ripened for execution; but Agis was betrayed by his own confidants. Leonidas, his colleague in the sovereignty, had imbibed a relish for luxury from his Asiatic education at the court of Seleucus, and was thus easily persuaded to take the part of the richest citizens in opposing this violent revolution, which threatened to reduce all ranks of men to a level of equality. . . . After compelling Agis to take shelter in the Temple of Minerva, they seized the opportunity of his going to the bath, and dragged him to the common prison, where a tribunal of the Ephori, summoned by his colleague Leonidas, sat ready to judge him as a State criminal. He was asked, by whose evil counsel he had been prompted to disturb the laws and government of his country? "I needed none to prompt me," said the king, "to act as I thought right. My design was to restore your ancient laws, and to govern according to the plan of the excellent Lycurgus; and though I see my death is inevitable, I do not repent of my design." The judges hereupon pronounced sentence of death, and the virtuous Agis was carried forth from their presence and immediately strangled.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 5.

1001. COMMUNISM, Vicious. Reign of Kobad. The people were deluded and inflamed by the fanaticism of Mazdak, who asserted the community of women and the equality of mankind, while he appropriated the richest lands and most beautiful females to the use of his sectaries. Mazdak [note] announced himself as a reformer of Zoroastrianism, and carried the doctrine of the two principles to a much greater height. He preached the absolute indifference of human action, perfect equality of rank, community of property and of women, marriages between the nearest kindred; he interdicted the use of animal food, proscribed the killing animals for food, enforced a vegetable diet . . . and Mazdak was enrolled with Thoth, Saturn, Zoroaster, Pythagoras, Epicurus, John, and Christ, as the teachers of true Gnostic wisdom.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 42.

1002. COMMUNISTS, Conspicuous. Levellers. [The Levellers] became conspicuous in Cromwell's army who declared, "that all degrees of man should be levelled, and an equality should be established, both in titles and estates, throughout the kingdom."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 6.

1003. COMMUNISTS, Dangerous. The "Levellers" of 1649 were, in a small way, the precursors of the "Socialists" of 1849, [Thirty men, headed by one formerly in the army, who called himself a Prophet, appeared in Surrey, in a sandy district. They took possession of the ground, and began to dig and dibble beans in that planting time. They said they should shortly be four thousand in number; that they should pull down park-pales and lay all open. The Prophet was taken before an officer of the government, when he declared that a vision had appeared to him and said:] "Arise, and dig and plough the earth, and receive the fruits thereof;" that their intent was to restore the creation to its former condition, but that they meant to meddle with what was common and untitled; but that the time was at hand when all men shall willingly come in and give up their lands and estates, and submit to this community of goods. . . . Cromwell said to the Council of State, "You must make an end of this party, or it will make an end of you."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, chs. 6 and 7.

1004. COMPARISONS, Invidious. Feast Day. Another officer, who thought he had done the State some service, setting himself up against Themistocles, and venturing to compare his own exploits with his, he answered him with this fable: "There once happened a dispute between the feast day and the day after the feast. Says the day after the feast, I am full of bustle and trouble, whereas, with you, folks enjoy, at their ease, everything ready provided. You say right, says the feast day, but if I had not been before you, you would not have been at all. So, had it not been for me, then where would you have been now?"—PLUTARCH'S "THEMISTOCLES."

1005. COMPASSION, Discreditable. James II. Though vindictive, he was not indiscriminately vindictive. Not a single instance can be mentioned in which he showed a generous compassion to those who had opposed him honestly and on public grounds; but he frequently spared and promoted those whom some vile motive had induced to injure him; for that meanness which marked them out as fit implements of tyranny was so precious in his estimation, that he regarded it with some indulgence, even when it was exhibited at his own expense.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4.

1006. COMPASSION, Female. Indian. Pontiac reserved for himself the most difficult task of all—the capture of Detroit. But in the hour of impending doom, woman's love interposed to save the garrison from butchery. An Indian girl of the Ojibway nation came to the fort with a pair of moccasins for Major Gladwyn, the commandant, and in parting with him manifested unusual agitation and distress. She was seen to linger at the street corner, and the sentinel summoned her to return . . . after much persuasion . . . she revealed the plot. [The Indian's treachery did not succeed.]—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 35.

1007. COMPETITORS, Ignoble. Roman Emperor Gratian. Among the various arts which had exercised the youth of Gratian, he had applied himself, with singular inclination and success, to manage the horse, to draw the bow, and to dart the javelin; and these qualifications, which might be useful to a soldier, were prostituted to the viler purposes of hunting. Large parks were enclosed for the Imperial pleasures, and plentifully stocked with every species of wild beasts; and Gratian neglected the duties, and even the dignity, of his rank, to consume whole days in the vain display of his dexterity and boldness in the chase. The pride and wish of the Roman emperor to excel in an art in which he might be surpassed by the meanest of his slaves reminded the numerous spectators of the examples of Nero and Commodus.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 27.

1008. COMPLAINTS, Disregarded. Billeting Act of Parliament. A.D. 1766. Samuel Adams . . . called across the continent to the patriot most like himself, Christopher Gadsden of South Carolina. "Tell me, sir," said he of the Billeting Act, "whether this is not taxing the colonies as effectually as the Stamp Act? And if so, either we have complained without reason, or we have still reason to complain."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 27.

1009. COMPLIMENT, False. Robert Burns. [Burns sympathized with the French Republicans during the war between England and France.] The poet, when in his cups, had in the hearing of a certain captain proposed as a toast, "May our success in the present war be equal to the justice of our cause." The soldier called him to account—a duel seemed imminent, and Burns had next day to write an apologetic letter, in order to avoid the risk of ruin.—SHAIRP'S BURNS, ch. 7.

1010. COMPLIMENT, Graceful. William of Orange. [After the illegal acts of James II. and his flight, William came to London.] The lawyers paid their homage, headed by Maynard, who, at ninety years of age, was as alert and clear-headed as when he stood up in Westminster Hall to accuse Strafford. "Mr. Sergeant," said the prince, "you must have survived all the lawyers of your standing." "Yes, sir," said the old man, "and but for your highness I should have survived the laws too."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10.

1011. COMPLIMENT misappropriated. Cato. Cato the philosopher, then a young man, but already celebrated for his virtue and greatness of mind, went to see Antioch when Pompey was not there. According to custom, he travelled on foot, but his friends accompanied him on horseback. When he approached the city he saw a great number of people before the gates, all in white, and on the way a troop of young men ranged on one side, and of boys on the other. This gave the philosopher pain, for he thought it a compliment intended him, which he did not want. However, he ordered his friends to alight and walk with him. As soon as they were near enough to be spoken with, the master of the ceremonies, with a crown on his head and a staff of office in his hand, came up and asked them where they had left Demetrius, and when he might be expected. Cato's companions laughed, but Cato said only, "Alas! poor city," and so passed on.—PLUTARCH.

1012. COMPOSITION, Hasty. Samuel Johnson. He had, from the irritability of his constitution, at all times an impatience and hurry when he either read or wrote. A certain apprehension, arising from novelty, made him write his first exercise at college twice over; but he never took that trouble with any other composition; and his most excellent works were struck off at a heat, with rapid exertion.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 14.

1013. COMPOSITION, Labor of. Wordsworth. [A.D. 1803.] I do not know from what cause it is, but during the last three years I have never had a pen in my hand for five minutes before my whole frame becomes a bundle of uneasiness; a perspiration starts out all over me, and my chest is oppressed in a manner which I cannot describe.—MYER'S WORDSWORTH, ch. 1.

1014. COMPOSITION, Method in. John Milton. Bed, with its warmth and recumbent posture, he found favorable to composition. At other times he would compose or prune his verses as he walked in the garden, and then, coming in, dictate. His verse was not at the command of his will. Sometimes he would lay awake the whole night, trying but unable to make a single line. At other times lines flowed without premeditation, "with a certain impetus and æstro." His vein, he said, flowed only from the vernal to the autumnal equinox. Phillips here transposes the seasons, though he has preserved the authentic fact of intermittent inspiration. It was the spring which restored to Milton, as it has to other poets, the buoyancy necessary to composition. What he composed at night he dictated in the day, sitting obliquely in an elbow-chair, with his leg thrown over the arm. He would dictate forty lines, as it were in a breath, and then reduce them to half the number.—MILTON, BY M. PATTISON, ch. 12.

1015. COMPOSITION, Swift. Waverley Novels. "The last two volumes," says Scott, in a letter to Mr. Morritt, "were written in three weeks." . . . If that is not extempore writing, it is difficult to say what extempore writing is. But in truth there is no evidence that any one of the novels was labored, or even so much as carefully composed. Scott's method of composition was always the same; and, when writing an imaginative work, the rate of progress seems to have been pretty even, depending much more on the absence of disturbing engagements than on any mental irregularity. The morning was always his brightest time; but morning or evening, in country or in town, well or ill, writing with his own pen or dictating to an amanuensis in the intervals of screaming-fits due to the torture of cramp in the stomach, Scott spun away at his imaginative web almost as evenly as a silkworm spins at its golden cocoon. Nor can I detect the slightest trace of any difference in quality between the stories, such as can be reasonably ascribed to comparative care or haste.—HUTTON'S SCOTT, ch. 10.

1016. COMPOSITION and Toil. Robert Burns. The farmhouse of Mossgiel . . . consisted of only two rooms, a but and a ben, as they were called in Scotland. Over these, reached by a trap stair, is a small garret, in which Robert and his brother used to sleep. Thither, when he had returned from his day's work, the poet used to retire, and seat himself at a small deal-table, lighted by a narrow sky-light in the roof, to transcribe the verses which he had composed in the fields. His favorite time for composition was at the plough.—SHAIRP'S BURNS, ch. 1.

1017. COMPROMISE, Failure of. Missouri. In January of 1854 Senator Stephen A. Douglas brought before the Senate . . . a proposition to organize the territories of Kansas and Nebraska . . . providing that the people of the two territories, in forming their constitutions, should decide for themselves whether the new States should be free or slave-holding. This was a virtual repeal of the Missouri Compromise, for both the new territories lay north of the parallel of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes. Thus by a single stroke the old settlement of the Slavery question was to be undone. From January till May Mr. Douglas's report, known as the Kansas and Nebraska bill, was debated in Congress. All the bitter sectional antagonisms of the past were aroused in full force. [It was passed and signed in May by the President.]—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 60.

1018. COMPROMISE, Qualifications for. Thomas Cranmer. The man who took the chief part in settling the conditions of the alliance which produced the Anglican Church was Thomas Cranmer. He was the representative of both parties, which, at that time, needed each other's assistance. He was at once a divine and a statesman. . . . His temper and his understanding eminently fitted him to act as a mediator. Sainly in his professions, unscrupulous in his dealings, zealous for nothing, bold in speculation, a coward and a time-server in action, a placable enemy and a lukewarm friend, he was in every way qualified to arrange the terms of the coalition between the religious and worldly enemies of popery.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1.

1019. COMPROMISE rejected. Aristides the Just. Mardonius, notwithstanding his immense force, seemed to have greater hopes of Persian gold than Persian valor. He attempted to corrupt the Athenians by offering them the command of all Greece, if they would desert the confederacy of the united States. Aristides was then archon; he answered, that while the sun held its course in the firmament the Persians had nothing to expect from the Athenians but mortal and eternal enmity. So much did he here speak the sense of his countrymen, that a single citizen having moved in the public assembly that the Persian deputies should be allowed to explain their proposals, was instantly stoned to death.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 1.

1020. COMPROMISE, Settlement by. Slavery. [In 1820] Senator Thomas, of Illinois, made a motion [in Congress] that henceforth and forever slavery should be excluded from all that part of the Louisiana cession—Missouri excepted—lying north of the parallel of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes. Such was the celebrated Missouri Compromise, one of the most important acts of American legislation—a measure chiefly supported by the genius and carried through Congress by the persistent efforts of Henry Clay. . . . By this compromise the slavery agitation was allayed till 1849.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 52.

1021. COMPROMISE on Slavery. Federal Government. The compromises on the Slavery question, inserted in the Constitution, were among the essential conditions upon which the Federal Government was organized. If the African slave trade had not been permitted to continue for twenty years—if it had not been conceded that three fifths of the slaves should be counted in the apportionment of representatives in Congress—if it had not been agreed that fugitives from their service should be returned to their owners, the Thirteen States would not have been able, in 1787, "to form a more perfect union."—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS IN CONGRESS, p. 1.

1022. COMPROMISE, Temporizing. Omnibus Bill. Henry Clay appeared as peacemaker. . . . On the 9th of May he brought forward as a compromise covering all the points in dispute [regarding slavery] the Omnibus Bill, of which the provisions were as follows: 1st, the admission of California as a free State; 2d, the formation of new States, not exceeding four in number, out of the territory of Texas, said States to permit or exclude slavery as the people should determine; 3d, the organization of territorial governments for New Mexico and Utah, without conditions on the question of slavery; 4th, the establishment of the present boundary between Texas and New Mexico, and the payment to the former, for surrendering the latter, the sum of $10,000,000 from the national treasury; 5th, the enactment of a more rigorous law for the recovery of fugitive slaves; 6th, the abolition of the slave trade in the District of Columbia. . . . The passage of the Omnibus Bill brought political quiet, but the moral convictions of very few men were altered by its provisions. Public opinion remained as before: in the North, a general, indefinite, but growing hostility to slavery; in the South, a fixed and resolute purpose to defend and extend that institution.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 59.

1023. CONCEALMENT guarded. Mahomet. His death was resolved, and they agreed that a sword from each tribe should be buried in his heart, to divide the guilt of his blood, and baffle the vengeance of the Hashemites. An angel or a spy revealed their conspiracy, and flight was the only resource of Mahomet. At the dead of night, accompanied by his friend Abubeker, he silently escaped from his house; the assassins watched at the door, but they were deceived by the figure of Ali, who reposed on the bed, and was covered with the green vestment of the apostle. . . . Three days Mahomet and his companions were concealed in the cave of Thor, at the distance of a league from Mecca; and in the close of each evening they received from the son and daughter of Abubeker a secret supply of intelligence and food. The diligence of the Koreish explored every haunt in the neighborhood of the city; they arrived at the entrance of the cavern, but the providential deceit of a spider's web and a pigeon's nest is supposed to convince them that the place was solitary and inviolate. "We are only two," said the trembling Abubeker. "There is a third," replied the prophet; "it is God Himself."—GIBBON'S MAHOMET, p. 35.

1024. CONCEALMENT, Unpleasant. Bohemond. The great army of the crusaders was annihilated or dispersed; the principality of Antioch was left without a head, by the surprise and captivity of Bohemond. . . . In his distress Bohemond embraced a magnanimous resolution . . . of arming the West against the Byzantine Empire. . . . His embarkation was clandestine; and, if we may credit a tale of the Princess Anne, he passed the hostile sea closely secreted in a coffin.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 59.

1025. CONCEIT, Changeless. Cicero. "What does Cæsar say of my poems?" he wrote again. "He tells me in one of his letters that he has never read better Greek. At one place he writes παύλοτερον [somewhat careless]. This is his word. Tell me the truth, Was it the matter which did not please him, or the style?" "Do not be afraid," he added, with candid simplicity; "I shall not think a hair the worse of myself."—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 18.

1026. CONCEIT, Foolish. Xerxes. [His bridge of boats across the straits of the Dardanelles being destroyed by the sea,] he commanded two pairs of chains to be thrown into the sea as if to shackle and confine it, and his men to give it three hundred strokes of a whip, and thus addressed it: "Thou troublesome and unhappy element, thus does thy master chastise thee for having affronted him without reason." [He also took the managers' heads off.]—ROLLIN, vol. 1, ch. 6.

1027. CONCEIT, Literary. Thomas Paine. Thomas Paine . . . asserted that if he had the power, he would destroy all the books in existence, which only propagated error, and he would reconstruct a new system of ideas and principles, with his own "Rights of Man" as its foundation.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 11.

1028. CONCEIT, Silly. Xerxes. Having cut a canal through the mountain for his ships, he said: "Athos, thou proud and aspiring mountain, that liftest up thy head unto the heavens, I advise thee not to be so audacious as to put rocks and stones which cannot be cut in the way of my workmen. If thou givest them that opposition, I will cut thee entirely down and throw thee headlong into the sea."—ROLLIN, ch. 6, p. 250.

1029. CONCESSION, Dangerous. To Tribunes. The consuls assembled the people, and attempted to justify the Senate; but being constantly interrupted by the tribunes, they could not make themselves be heard. They urged, that the tribunes having only the liberty of opposing, ought to be silent till a resolution was formed. The tribunes, on the other hand, contended that they had the same privileges in an assembly of the people that the consuls had in a meeting of the Senate. The dispute was running high, when one of the consuls rashly said, that if the tribunes had convoked the assembly, they, instead of interrupting them, would not even have taken the trouble of coming there; but that the consuls having called this assembly, they ought not to be interrupted. This imprudent speech was an acknowledgment of a power in the tribunes to convoke the public assemblies—a power which they themselves had never dreamt of. It may be believed that they were not remiss in laying hold of the concession. They took the whole people to witness what had been said by the consuls, and an assembly of the people was summoned by the tribunes to meet the next day.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 4.

1030. CONCILIATION by Favors. Popularity. [When Anne of Austria came to the regency of France,] in her anxiety to conciliate all parties, she commenced by granting them almost whatever they demanded. The "Importans," charmed by her condescension, imagined that they were henceforth to carry all before them; and the witty De Retz declared that for two or three months the whole French language was comprised in five little words—"the queen is so good!" These, however, were transient illusions.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 20, § 1.

1031. CONCILIATION, Policy of. Cæsar. He wished to hand over his conquests to his successors not only subdued, but reconciled to subjection. He invited the chiefs of all the tribes to come to him. He spoke to them of the future which lay open to them as members of a splendid Imperial State. He gave them magnificent presents. He laid no impositions either on the leaders or their people, and they went to their homes personally devoted to their conqueror, contented with their condition, and resolved to maintain the peace which was now established—a unique experience in political history. The Norman conquests of England alone in the least resemble it.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 19.

1032. CONCILIATION vs. Threatening. Cæsar. [Cæsar had crossed the Rubicon, and was marching toward Rome.] Pompey was now sensible of his weakness. The voice of the public openly expressed an impatient desire for the arrival of Cæsar, who, on his part, was rapidly advancing to the gates of Rome, when Pompey quitted the city, followed by the consuls and the greater part of the senators. Unable to collect a sufficient force in Italy, he passed over into Epirus . . . thence he trusted that he would be supplied both with troops and treasure. Before sailing from Brundisium, he had declared that he would treat all those as enemies who did not follow him. Cæsar, with more wisdom, declared that he would esteem all those his friends who did not arm against him.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 2.

1033. CONDENSATION, Literary. Cæsar. Cæsar turned his arms against Pharnaces, the son of Mithridates, who had seized the kingdom of Pontus, and meditated, after his father's example, to strip the Romans of their Asiatic possessions. This war he very speedily terminated, intimating its issue to his friends at Rome in three words, Veni, vidi, vici, "I came, I saw, I conquered."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 2.

1034. — — —. Virgil. He bestowed the greatest labor in polishing his writings, his habit being to pour forth a vast quantity of verses in the morning, which he reduced to a small number by continual elaboration, after the manner—as he said—of a bear licking her cubs into shape.—LIDDELL'S ROME, ch. 71, § 16.

1035. CONDOLENCE unappreciated. In Pekin. [At a banquet given by the prince regent, he noticed General Grant's son.] He then asked if he was married and had children. Being told he had one, a daughter, he replied, "What a pity!" In China female children do not count in the sum of human happiness, and when the prince expressed his regret at the existence of the general's granddaughter, he was saying the most polite thing he knew.—GENERAL GRANT'S TRAVELS, p. 411.

1036. CONDUCT, Absurd. Samuel Johnson. A physician being mentioned who had lost his practice because his whimsically changing his religion had made people distrustful of him, I maintained that this was unreasonable, as religion is unconnected with medical skill. JOHNSON: "Sir, it is not unreasonable; for when people see a man absurd in what they understand, they may conclude the same of him in what they do not understand. If a physician were to take to eating of horseflesh, nobody would employ him; though one may eat horseflesh, and be a very skilful physician. If a man were educated in an absurd religion, his continuing to confess it would not hurt him, though his changing to it would."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 284.

1037. CONDUCT, Contradictory. Steele. He had two wives, whom he loved dearly and treated badly. He hired grand houses, and bought fine horses for which he could never pay. He was often religious, but more often drunk.

As a man of letters, other men of letters who followed him, such as Thackeray, could not be very proud of him. But everybody loved him; and he seems to have been the inventor of that flying literature which, with many changes in form and manner, has done so much for the amusement and edification of readers ever since his time.—TROLLOPE'S THACKERAY, ch. 7.

1038. CONDUCT, Dissolute. A Sign. A sure sign of corruption is to be found in the dissolute manners which were discovered among the women. There were in Rome and many Italian towns secret societies, in which young men and women were dedicated to Bacchus; and under the cloak of religious ceremony every kind of license and debauchery was practised.—LIDDELL'S ROME, ch. 42, § 7.

1039. CONDUCT, Scandalous. In high Life. When one of the waiters at Arthur's Club was committed on a charge of felony [George Selwyn said, with as much truth as wit], What a horrid idea he will give of us to the people in Newgate!—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6.

1040. CONFESSIONAL, Secrets of the. Gunpowder Plot. Henry Garnet, one of the Jesuits who where concerned in the Gunpowder Plot, obtained his knowledge of it at the confessional, and on trial maintained "that he had acted upon a conscientious persuasion that he was bound to disclose nothing that he had heard in sacramental confession." He was executed.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 21.

1041. CONFIDENCE, Compliment of. Cæsar. [His troops were intimidated by exaggerated reports of the number and fierceness of the Germans.] Confident in himself, Cæsar had the power, so indispensable for a soldier, of inspiring confidence in others as soon as they came to know what he was. He called his officers together. He summoned the centurions, and rebuked them sharply for questioning his purposes. . . . Romans never mutinied, save through the rapacity or incompetence of their general. His life was a witness that he was not rapacious, and his victory over the Helvetii that as yet he had made no mistake. He should order the advance on the next evening, and it would then be seen whether sense of duty or cowardice was the stronger. If others declined, Cæsar said that he should go forward alone with the legion which he knew would follow him, the 10th, which was already his favorite. The speech was received with enthusiasm. The 10th thanked Cæsar for his compliment to them. The rest, officers and men, declared their willingness to follow wherever he might lead them.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 14.

1042. CONFIDENCE erroneous. Bonaparte's. [At the battle of Waterloo,] when Napoleon saw the English in position . . . he exclaimed, "At last I have them; nine chances to ten are in my favor!"—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 2.

1043. CONFIDENCE, Excess of. Major André. [The British spy approached Tarrytown,] when Paulding got up and presented a firelock at his breast. . . . Full of the idea that he could meet none but the friends of the English, he answered, "Gentlemen, I hope you belong to our party?" "Which party?" asked Paulding. "The lower party," said André. Paulding answered that he did. Then said André: "I am a British officer out on particular business, and I hope you will not detain me a minute." Upon this Paulding ordered him to dismount. Seeing his mistake, André showed his pass from Arnold, saying, "By your detaining me you will detain the general's business." . . . [Papers and plans were found in his stockings.] "This is a spy," said Paulding. André offered 100 guineas—any sum of money if they would let him go. "No," cried Paulding, "not for 10,000 guineas." . . . Congress voted . . . annuities.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 10, ch. 18.

1044. CONFIDENCE, Perilous. Harald II. He might have gathered a much more numerous army than that of William; but his recent victory had made him over-confident, and he was irritated by the reports of the country being ravaged by the invaders. As soon, therefore, as he had collected a small army in London, he marched off toward the coast, pressing forward as rapidly as his men could traverse Surrey and Sussex, in the hope of taking the Normans unawares, as he had recently, by a similar forced march, succeeded in surprising the Norwegians. But he had now to deal with a foe equally brave with Harald Hardrada, and far more skilful and wary.—DEC. BATTLES, § 295.

1045. CONFIDENCE, Power of. Robber. Margaret, Queen of England, when a fugitive in Lorraine, was plundered of her gold and jewels in a wild forest by a band of robbers. She made her escape, leading her boy, then about eleven years old. In the depths of the wood they were again encountered by a single robber. Margaret, with the decision of her character, threw herself upon the protection of the outlaw. "This is the son of your king—to your care I commit him. I am your queen." The robber became her friend, and guarded her to a place of security.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 10.

1046. CONFIDENCE, Premature. Abraham Lincoln. [To Governor Morgan of New York: "I do not agree with those who, after the emancipation proclamation,] say slavery is dead. We are like whalers who have been on a long chase; we have at last got the harpoon into the monster, but we must now look how we steer, or, with one 'flop' of his tail, he will yet send us all into eternity."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 752.

1047. CONFIDENCE, Superstitious. Otho. [When Otho the Great finally subdued the Hungarians, his] camp was blessed with the relics of saints and martyrs; and the Christian hero girded on his side the sword of Constantine, grasped the invincible spear of Charlemagne, and waved the banner of St. Maurice, the prefect of the Theban legion. But his firmest confidence was placed in the holy lance, whose point was fashioned of the nails of the cross, and which his father had extorted from the King of Burgundy by the threats of war and the gift of a province.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 55.

1048. CONFIDENCE tested. Alexander. [Alexander the Great was taken sick while in Cilicia in consequence of having bathed in the Cydnus, whose waters were very cold.] His physicians durst not give him any medicines, because they thought themselves not so certain of the cure as of the danger they must incur in the application; for they feared the Macedonians, if they did not succeed, would suspect them of some bad practice. Philip, the Acarnanian, saw how desperate the king's case was, as well as the rest; but, beside the confidence he had in his friendship, he thought it the highest ingratitude, when his master was in so much danger, not to risk something with him, in exhausting all his art for his relief. He therefore attempted the cure, and found no difficulty in persuading the king to wait with patience until his medicine was prepared, or to take it when ready; so desirous was he of a speedy recovery, in order to prosecute the war. In the mean time Parmenio sent him a letter from the camp, advising him to beware of Philip, whom, he said, Darius had prevailed upon, by presents of infinite value, and the promise of his daughter in marriage, to take him off by poison. As soon as Alexander had read the letter, he put it under his pillow, without showing it to any of his friends. The time appointed being come, Philip, with the king's friends, entered the chamber, having the cup which contained the medicine in his hand. The king received it freely, without the least marks of suspicion, and at the same time put the letter in his hands. It was a striking situation, and more interesting than any scene in a tragedy—the one reading while the other was drinking. They looked upon each other, but with a very different air. The king, with an open and unembarrassed countenance, expressed his regard for Philip and the confidence he had in his honor; Philip's looks showed his indignation at the calumny. One, while he lifted up his eyes and hands to heaven, protesting his fidelity; another, while he threw himself down by the bedside, entreating his master to be of good courage and trust to his care. The medicine, indeed, was so strong, and overpowered his spirits in such a manner, that at first he was speechless, and discovered scarce any sign of sense or life. But afterward he was soon relieved by this faithful physician, and recovered so well that he was able to show himself to the Macedonians, whose distress did not abate until he came personally before them.—PLUTARCH'S "ALEXANDER."

1049. CONFISCATION, Avaricious. Maximin. [The Emperor was a tyrant. His avarice was] stimulated by the insatiate desires of the soldiers, at length attacked the public property. Every city of the empire was possessed of an independent revenue, destined to purchase corn for the multitude, and to supply the expenses of the games and entertainments. By a single act of authority the whole mass of wealth was at once confiscated for the use of the Imperial treasury. The temples were stripped of their most valuable offerings of gold and silver, and the statues of gods, heroes, and emperors were melted down and coined into money. These impious orders could not be executed without tumults and massacres, as in many places the people chose rather to die in the defence of their altars than to behold, in the midst of peace, their cities exposed to the rapine and cruelty of war.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 7.

1050. CONFISCATION, Religious. Alfonse d'Albuquerque. [Having subdued for his king two of the great peninsulas of Southern Asia, and meditating the diverting of the river Nile from its course so as to leave Egypt a desert,] he died in the odor of sanctity, committing his soul to God and his son to the king. The last days of his life were spent in hearing read his favorite passages of the New Testament, during which he held in his hands and clasped to his heart a small crucifix. His last words showed, not merely that his conscience acquitted him for what he had done against the people of India, but that he regarded himself as an eminent soldier of the cross, as well as a faithful servant of his king. Nay, more; his conduct toward the Indians had never occurred to him as a case of conscience at all, so completely was it taken for granted that no people except Christians had any rights. The earth was the Lord's and the fullness thereof; and did it not therefore belong to the pope, and to Christian kings, who were the Lord's vicar, and vicegerents?—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 315.

1051. CONFLAGRATION, Defensive. Columbia. As soon as it became certain that Columbia must fall into the hands of the Federals, General Hardee, the commandant of Charleston, determined to abandon that city also; . . . guards were detailed to destroy all the warehouses, stores of cotton, and depots of supplies at Charleston. The torch was applied, the flames raged, and consternation spread throughout the city. The great depot of the Northwestern Railway, where a large quantity of powder was stored, caught fire, blew up with terrific violence, and buried two hundred people in its ruins. Not until four squares in the best part of the city were laid in ashes was the conflagration checked.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 66.

1052. CONFLAGRATION, Destructive. Boston. A few days after the Presidential election [of 1872] the city of Boston was visited by a conflagration only second in its ravages to that of Chicago, in the previous year. On the evening of the 9th of November a fire broke out on the corner of Kingston and Sumner streets, spread to the north-east, and continued, with almost unabated fury, until the morning of the 11th. The best portion of the city, embracing some of the finest blocks in the United States, was laid in ashes. The burnt district covered an area of sixty-five acres. Eight hundred buildings, property to the value of $80,000,000, and fifteen lives were lost by the conflagration.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 68.

1053. ——. Chicago. The year 1871 is noted in American history for the burning of Chicago. On the evening of the 8th of October a fire broke out in De Koven Street, and was driven by a high wind into the lumber-yards and wooden houses of the neighborhood. The flames leaped the south branch of the Chicago River, and spread with great rapidity through the business part of the city. All day long the deluge of fire rolled on, across the main channel of the river, and swept into a blackened ruin the whole district between the north branch and the lake as far northward as Lincoln Park. The area burnt over was two thousand one hundred acres, or three and one third square miles. Nearly two hundred lives were lost in the conflagration, and the property destroyed amounted to about $200,000,000. No such terrible devastation had been witnessed since the burning of Moscow in 1812. In the extent of the district burned over, the Chicago fire stands first; in the amount of property destroyed, second; and in the suffering occasioned, third among the great conflagrations of the world.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 68.

1054. ——. London. [In 1666 it burned for nearly two miles in length and one in breadth, the flames continuing three days and three nights. The houses were mostly covered with thatched straw roofs; the lead from the burning churches ran down the streets in streams. The fire was checked in its progress by blowing up houses. Not more than eight lives were lost. Two hundred thousand people of all ranks and degrees were made homeless. Thirteen thousand and two hundred dwellings were burned, also eighty-nine churches, besides many public structures, hospitals, schools, libraries, and a vast number of stately edifices. Total estimated loss, £7,335,000.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 17.]

1055. ——. Moscow. A.D. 1812. The astounding intelligence was brought to Napoleon that the city was utterly deserted. A few miserable creatures, who had been released from the prisons to engage in the congenial employment of setting fire to the city as soon as the French should have taken possession, were found in the streets. . . . Rumors of the intended conflagration reached his ears. . . . More than a hundred thousand of the wretched inhabitants, driven by the soldiery from the city, parents and children, perished of cold and starvation in the woods.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 13.

1056. ——. Moscow. The crown magazines, with vast stores of wine and spirits, were in a blaze. Not a fire-engine nor a bucket could be procured. They had all been carried off. Day after day the astonished soldiers saw the canopy of smoke and flame spreading over the city of a thousand domes and minarets. . . . The conflagration went on till, of 40,000 houses in stone, only 200 escaped; of 8000 in wood, 500 only were standing; of 1600 churches, 800 were consumed. . . . A furious wind carried showers of sparks far and near. . . . Only one tenth of the city was left unconsumed.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 30, p. 558.

1057. ——. New York. On the 16th of December, 1835, a fire broke out in the lower part of New York City and laid thirty acres of buildings in ashes. Five hundred and twenty-nine houses and property valued at $18,000,000 were consumed.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 54.

1058. ——. Rome. Whether Nero was guilty of this unparalleled outrage on the lives and fortunes of his subjects or not, certain it is that on July 19th, A.D. 64, in the tenth year of his reign, a fire broke out in shops full of inflammable materials which lined the valley between the Palatine and Cælian hills. For six days and seven nights it rolled in streams of resistless flame over the greater part of the city, licking up the palaces and temples of the gods which covered the low hills, and raging through whole streets of the wretched wooden tenements in which dwelt myriads of the poorer inhabitants who crowded the lower regions of Rome. When its course had been checked by the voluntary destruction of a vast mass of buildings which lay in its path, it broke out a second time, and raged for three days longer in the less crowded quarters of the city, where its spread was even more fatal to public buildings and the ancient shrines of the gods. Never since the Gauls burnt Rome had so deadly a calamity fallen on the afflicted city. Of its fourteen districts, four alone escaped untouched; three were completely laid in ashes; in the seven others were to be seen the wrecks of many buildings, scathed and gutted by the flames. The disaster to the city was historically irreparable. . . . The sense of permanent loss was overwhelmed at first by the immediate confusion and agony of the scene. Amid the sheets of flame that roared on every side under the dense canopy of smoke, the shrieks of terrified women and the wail of infants and children were heard above the crash of falling houses. The incendiary fires seemed to be bursting forth in so many directions that men stood staring in dumb stupefaction at the destruction of their property, or rushed hither and thither in helpless amazement. The lanes and alleys were blocked up with the concourse of struggling fugitives. Many were suffocated by smoke or trampled down in the press. Many others were burnt to death in their own burning houses, some of whom purposely flung themselves into the flames in the depth of their despair. . . . When they had escaped with bare life, a vast multitude of homeless, shivering, hungry human beings, many of them bereaved of their nearest and dearest relations, . . . found themselves huddled together, . . . one vast brotherhood of hopeless wretchedness.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, p. 81.

1059. CONFLAGRATION in War. Carthage. In a strong assault on one of the gates, he broke it down, and entering with a large force penetrated to the citadel, which sustained a siege of several days, while the Romans were in possession of the town. At length it was surrendered. Scipio, unwilling to destroy this proud and splendid capital, sent to Rome for further orders. But these contained no mercy for Carthage. The city was set fire to in many different quarters. Pillage, carnage, and desolation ensued. The conflagration lasted for seventeen days. At the recital of a scene of this kind, it is impossible to restrain our indignation, and not to execrate that barbarous policy which prescribes a conduct so contrary to every worthy feeling of the human mind. Thus ended the ill-fated Carthage, in the 607th year from the building of Rome, and the 146th before the Christian era.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 9.

1060. CONFLICT, Bootless. British at Bunker Hill. The number of the killed and wounded in [the British army under Gage] . . . was . . . at least 1004, . . . a third of those engaged. . . . The oldest soldiers never saw the like. The battle of Quebec, which won half a continent, did not cost the lives of so many officers as the battle of Bunker Hill, which gained nothing but a place of encampment.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 40.

1061. CONFLICT, Land of. Kentucky. Kentucky has been denominated "the Dark and Bloody Ground" of the savage aborigines. It never was the habitation of any nation or tribe of Indians; but from the period of the earliest aboriginal traditions to the appearance of the white man on its soil, Kentucky was the field of deadly conflict between the northern and southern warriors of the forest. . . . When penetrated by the bold adventurous white men of Carolina and Virginia, who constituted the third party for dominion, its title of the "Dark and Bloody Ground" was continued. . . . After the declaration of American Independence, Great Britain formed alliance with the Indian savages . . . the territory of Kentucky became still more emphatically the "Dark and Bloody Ground." [Likewise during the Rebellion.]—POLLARD'S FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 7, p. 186.

1062. CONFLICT, Rule of. William of Orange. [James II.,] the king, was eager to fight, and it was obviously his interest to do so. Every hour took away something from his own strength, and added something to the strength of his enemies. It was most important, too, that his troops should be blooded. A great battle, however it might terminate, could not but injure the prince's popularity. All this William perfectly understood, and determined to avoid an action as long as possible. It is said that, when Schomberg was told that the enemy were advancing and were determined to fight, he answered with the composure of a tactician confident in his skill, "That will be just as we may choose."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9.

1063. CONFLICT, Self-sustaining. Spoils. [The Confederates invaded Pennsylvania.] General Lee cannot expect to keep his communications open to the rear; and, as the staff-officers say, "In every battle we fight, we must capture as much ammunition as we use."—POLLARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, p. 338.

1064. CONFLICT, Unnatural. William I., the Norman. He was a prince to whom nature had denied the requisites of making himself beloved, and who, therefore, made it his first object to render himself feared. Even the Normans, instigated probably by the French, endeavored to withdraw themselves from his yoke. To establish order in that country, he carried over an army of Englishmen; thus, by a capricious vicissitude of fortune, we see the Normans brought over for the conquest of the English, and the English sent back to conquer the Normans. With these troops he reduced the rebels to submission, and returned to England to be again embroiled in conspiracies and rebellion. The last and severest of his troubles arose from his own children. His eldest son, Robert, had been promised by his father the sovereignty of Maine, a province of France, which had submitted to William; he claimed the performance in his father's lifetime, who contemptuously told him he thought it was time enough to throw off his clothes when he went to bed. Robert, who was of a most violent temper, instantly withdrew to Normandy, when in a short time he engaged all the young nobility to espouse his quarrel. Brittany, Anjou, and Maine likewise took part against William, who brought over another army of the English to subdue the rebellion. The father and son met in fight, and being clad in armor did not know each other, till Robert, having wounded his father and thrown him from his horse, his voice (calling out for assistance) discovered him to his antagonist. Stung with consciousness of the crime, Robert fell at his feet, and in the most submissive manner entreated his forgiveness. The indignation of William was not to be appeased; he gave his son his malediction instead of his pardon.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 8.

1065. CONFLICT, Unprepared for. Greeks. [Demosthenes urged immediate and open war against the ambitious Philip.] Some of the best patriots of Athens, the virtuous Phocion, for example, proposed an opposite counsel. They saw that the martial spirit of the republic was extinct, the finances of the State were at the lowest ebb, and the manners of the people irretrievably corrupted. There was assuredly too much solidity in the argument of Phocion which he opposed to the "Philippica" of Demosthenes: "I will recommend to you, O Athenians, to go to war, when I find you capable of supporting a war; when I see the youth of the Republic animated with courage, yet submissive and obedient; the rich cheerfully contributing to the necessities of the State; and the orators no longer cheating and pillaging the public."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3.

1066. CONGREGATIONS, Large. Gwenap in Wales. [Thirty-two thousand persons present to hear John Wesley preach at Gwenap, in its magnificent natural amphitheatre.]—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 2, ch. 6.

1067. CONQUERED vs. Concord. London. A.D. 1801. [At last England and France made a treaty of peace.] The house of M. Otto, the French minister [at London], was brilliantly illuminated. . . . The word concord blazed in letters of light. The sailors, not very familiar with the spelling-book, exclaimed, "Conquered! not so by a great deal. That will not do." Excitement and dissatisfaction rapidly spread. Violence was threatened! . . . attempts at explanation were utterly useless. The offensive word was removed, and amity substituted. The sailors, fully satisfied with the amende honorable, gave three cheers.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 22.

1068. CONQUERED, The Conqueror. Francisco Pizarro. [A single battle made him master of Peru.] He betrayed and murdered the captive Inca. He quarrelled with Almagro over the division of the spoils, and finished by putting him to death. He accumulated a greater amount of treasure than was ever possessed, before or since, by an individual. Spoiled by prosperity without parallel, he was cruel to the Peruvians, capricious and tyrannical to the Spaniards, and, at length, a rebel against his king. A conspiracy, headed by the son of the murdered Almagro, was formed against him. On a Sunday afternoon, in 1541, at the hour when the tyrant was accustomed to sleep, a band of the confederates burst into his palace, killed or dispersed his servants, and attacked him. Armed only with a sword and buckler, he defended himself with the most desperate courage. Four of his assailants he slew; five more he wounded; and still he fought on. At last one of the band engaged him and drew his attention from the rest; and while Pizarro dealt a furious blow at his chief assailant, the others succeeded in giving him a mortal wound. He fell at the feet of an image of Christ, which, it is said, he kissed at the moment of his death. So perished, in his sixty-eighth year, the man who was, perhaps, the most resolute of all the sons of men. In mere strength of purpose it is questionable if his equal ever lived; but, though this is one of the most valuable of qualities, and accomplishes very great things, a man must have much more in order to turn to good account the prizes won. Pizarro was little more than a magnificently-gifted brute.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 327.

1069. CONQUERORS by Resolution. Of California. [In 1846] Colonel John C. Fremont . . . determined to strike a blow for his country; he urged the people of California, many of whom were Americans, to declare their independence. The hardy frontiersmen of the Sacramento valley flocked to his standard; and a campaign was at once begun to overthrow the Mexican authority. . . . An American fleet had captured the town of Monterey . . . and San Diego. . . . Before the end of summer the whole of the vast province was subdued . . . the authority of the United States was completely established. A country large enough for an empire had been conquered by a handful of resolute men.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 57.

1070. CONQUEST by Destruction. Alfonse d'Albuquerque. Having thus reduced the shores and cities of two of the great peninsulas of Southern Asia, he next undertook the conquest of all the vast regions watered by the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf. He bombarded the cities commanding those waters, with varying success. Meditating the conquest of Egypt, he conceived a scheme for diverting the river Nile from its course, so as to leave Egypt a desert, and destroy its whole population.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 315.

1071. CONQUESTS, Ends of. Pyrrhus. [The Tarentines, in war with the Romans,] sought aid from Pyrrhus, the King of Epirus, and invited him, by a flattering deputation, to be the deliverer of Italy from its threatened yoke of servitude. Pyrrhus was one of the ablest generals of his age; but he possessed a restless spirit, and a precipitancy in forming projects of military enterprise, without a due attention to means, or a deliberate estimate of consequences. Cineas, his chief minister, to whom he imparted his design of invading Italy, and mentioned, with great confidence, a perfect assurance of its success, calmly asked him what he proposed after that design was accomplished. "We shall next," said Pyrrhus, "make ourselves masters of Sicily, which, considering the distracted state of that island, will be a very easy enterprise." "And what next do you intend?" said Cineas. "We shall then," replied Pyrrhus, "pass over into Africa. Do you imagine Carthage is capable of holding out against our arms?" "And supposing Carthage taken," said Cineas, "what follows?" "Then," said Pyrrhus, "we return with all our force, and pour down upon Macedonia and Greece." "And when all is conquered," replied Cineas, "what is then to be done?" "Why, then, to be sure," said Pyrrhus, "we have nothing to do but to enjoy our bottle, and take our amusement." "And what," said Cineas, "prevents you from enjoying your bottle now, and taking your amusement?" This dialogue, which is given by Plutarch, with great naïveté, presents us with a just delineation of the real views and sentiments of the greater part of those mighty conquerors who have disturbed the peace of the universe.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 7.

1072. CONQUEST, Fruitless. Ancient Persians. In those early periods [were] a people remarkable for their temperance and the virtuous simplicity of their manners. Herodotus records an excellent speech of one Sandanis, a Lydian, who, when his sovereign Croesus projected the invasion of Persia, thus strongly pointed out to him the folly of his enterprise: "What will you gain," said he, "by waging war with such men as the Persians? Their clothing is skins, their food wild fruits, and their drink water. If you are conquered, you lose a cultivated country; if you conquer them, what can you take from them?—a barren region. For my part, I thank the gods that the Persians have not yet formed the design of invading the Lydians."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 11.

1073. CONQUEST impossible. Darius. Ambitious of extensive conquest, he now meditated a war against the Scythians, on the absurd pretext that they had ravaged a part of Asia about one hundred and thirty years before. At the head of an army of 700,000 men, he set out from Susa, his capital, to wage war against a nation whom it was impossible to conquer. . . . The sole business of the Scythians was to retreat, driving their cattle before them, and filling up the wells in their route. The Persians, after long and excessive marches, never got more than a distant sight of the enemy, while they were perishing by thousands in a rugged and barren country. At length Darius thought it his wisest measure to retreat, having lost the greatest part of his army, and leaving behind him the sick and aged at the mercy of the barbarians.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 11.

1074. CONQUEST necessary. Cortez. Besides repressing the mutiny with a strong hand, he resolved to make all turning back impossible. He caused all his vessels, except the smallest, to be scuttled and sunk; from that hour there was no safety except in the total conquest of the country. Leaving at Vera Cruz a small garrison, he began his immortal march August 16, 1519 [for the city of Mexico], with the following forces: 400 foot soldiers, 1500 horsemen, 1300 Indian warriors, 1000 Indians to draw the cannons and carry the baggage, and seven pieces of artillery. CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 321.

1075. CONQUEST, Period of. Reign of Edward III. The greatest victories recorded in the history of the Middle Ages were gained at this time, against great odds, by the English armies. Victories indeed they were of which a nation may justly be proud. . . . Chandos encountered an equal foe in Du Guesclin; but France had no infantry that dared to face the English bows and bills. A French king was brought prisoner to London. An English king was crowned at Paris. The banner of St. George was carried far beyond the Pyrenees and the Alps. On the south of the Ebro the English won a great battle, which for a time decided the fate of Leon and Castile.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1.

1076. CONQUEST, Presumptuous. Three Men. These three men, the youngest of whom was fifty, conceived the project of conquering the powerful and wealthy tribes that were supposed to inhabit the western coasts of South America. They were to do this by their own resources.

asking nothing from the Governor of Panama except his sanction of the enterprise. It was as though three men in New York should now undertake the conquest of the Japanese Empire. Pizarro was to command the first body of adventures; Almagro was to raise, as soon as he could, a second company, and join Pizarro on the coast; the priest [Fernando de Luques] was to remain at Panama to watch over the interests of the partnership. [Their success is well known.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 324.

1077. CONQUEST surrendered. Jerusalem. The Holy Land was thus recovered by the Christians; and Godfrey of Bouillon obtained the title of King of Jerusalem; but it was only a title, for a papal legate arrived in the mean time, claimed the city as the property of God, and took possession of it as such. Godfrey reserved the port of Joppa, and some privileges in Jerusalem.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 9.

1078. CONQUESTS of Peace. Louisiana. [In consequence of the ambitious designs of England and the necessities of France, then unable to hold the territory against the British navy,] the President [Mr. Jefferson] made the largest conquest ever peacefully achieved, at a cost so small that the sum expended for the entire territory does not equal the revenue which has since been collected on its soil in a single month, in time of great public peril. The country thus acquired forms to-day the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota west of the Mississippi, Colorado north of the Arkansas, besides the Indian Territory and the Territories of Dakota, Wyoming, and Montana. Texas was also included in the transfer.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 8.

1079. CONSCIENCE, Abdication of. Pope Clement V. Philip [IV.] held a secret interview with him, and offered to raise him to the papal throne on six conditions, which were at once accepted. . . . The sixth and last condition the king reserved to be hereafter specified in proper time and place, exacting an oath from Bertrand to fulfil it on the first demand.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 4, § 18, p. 186.

1080. CONSCIENCE an Accuser. Murderer. Benjamin Abbott was preaching in New Jersey with great zeal against sin in its worst forms. In the midst of his discourse he exclaimed: "For aught I know, there may be a murderer in this congregation!" Immediately a lusty man attempted to go out; but when he got to the door he bawled out, and stretched out both his arms, and ran backward, and cried out very bitterly, and said he was the murderer, for he had killed a man about fifteen years before.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 1, ch. 8.

1081. ———. Death-bed. [Rev. Simon Carlisle was expelled from the ministry for theft, an officer having found a missing pistol in his saddle-bags. He could not clear himself; his usefulness ended, his disgrace was overwhelming. The young man who owned the pistol was on his death-bed a few years after. An hour before death came] he cried out frantically, "I cannot die—I cannot until I reveal one thing. Mr. Carlisle never stole that pistol; I myself put it in his saddle-bags." He then became calm, and so passed into eternity.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 3, ch. 3.

1082. CONSCIENCE authorized. By Jesuits. [On the trial of the conspirators in the infamous Gunpowder Plot it was shown that] Rookwood . . . had scruples about joining in so extensive a scheme of slaughter, saying it was a matter of conscience to take away so much blood; but Catesby silenced him by saying "it had been resolved on good authority that in conscience it might be done." Digby, who was only twenty-four years of age, was evidently a weak tool of the Jesuits. . . . He cordially joined in the project from religious zeal, as soon as he satisfied himself that the action had been approved by his spiritual advisers.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 21.

1083. CONSCIENCE awakened. Cartwright. [Peter Cartwright, the celebrated frontier preacher, was awakened, in his sixteenth year, after spending much of the night in dancing, at a wedding. He went home, not to sleep, but spent the remainder of the night on his knees with his praying mother, and some time afterward was converted at a camp-meeting.]—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 4, ch. 9.

1084. ———. John Bunyan. He supposed he was given over to unbelief and wickedness, and yet he relates, with touching simplicity: "As to the act of sinning, I was never more tender than now. I durst not take up a pin or a stick, though but so big as a straw, for my conscience now was sore, and would smart at every touch. I could not tell how to speak my words for fear I should misplace them." But the care with which he watched his conduct availed him nothing. He was on a morass "that shook if he did but stir," and he was "there left both of God, and Christ, and the Spirit, and of all good things." Behind him lay the faults of his childhood and youth, every one of which he believed to be recorded against him. Within were his disobedient inclinations, which he conceived to be the presence of the devil in his heart.—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 3.

1085. ———. Bunyan. One Sunday morning when Bunyan was at church with his wife, a sermon was delivered on this subject [Sabbath amusements]. It seemed to be especially addressed to himself, and it much affected him. He shook off the impression, and after dinner he went as usual to the green. He was on the point of striking at a ball when the thought rushed across his mind, Wilt thou leave thy sins and go to heaven, or have thy sins and go to hell? He looked up. The reflection of his own emotion was before him in visible form. He imagined that he saw Christ Himself looking down at him from the sky. But he concluded that it was too late for him to repent. He was past pardon. He was sure to be damned, and he might as well be damned for many sins as for few. Sin, at all events, was pleasant, the only pleasant thing that he knew; therefore he would take his fill of it. The sin was the game, and nothing but the game. He continued to play, but the Puritan sensitiveness had taken hold of him. An artificial offence had become a real offence when his conscience was wounded by it. He was reckless and desperate.—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 2.

1086. ———. By Mother's Prayer. [Rev. Henry Boehm was the travelling companion of Bishop Asbury, and for more than eighty years a Christian minister. He was arrested, on returning home one evening, by hearing the familiar voice of his mother engaged in prayer. He says:] "I listened. Among other things, she prayed for her children, and mentioned Henry, her youngest son. The mention of my name broke my heart, and melted me into contrition. Tears rolled down my cheeks, and I felt the importance of complying with the command of God, 'My Son, give me thine heart.'" [He lived one hundred years.]—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 3, p. 428.

1087. ——. Earthquake. In the early part of 1750 repeated earthquakes alarmed the metropolis . . . while Charles Wesley was rising in the pulpit of the Foundry [Church] to preach, at five o'clock in the morning, the earth moved through all London and Westminster with a strong, jarring motion, and a rumbling noise like distant thunder. The walls of the Foundry trembled; a great agitation among the people followed; but Wesley cried aloud to them, "Therefore will we not fear though the earth be moved, and the hills be carried into the midst of the sea, for the Lord of Hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge." Multitudes flocked to the early Methodist service in deep alarm. Throughout the whole night many of the alarmed people knocked at the Foundry door, entreating admittance, though "our poor people," writes Wesley, "were calm and quiet as at any other time." During one of these terrible nights Tower Hill, Moorfields, and Hyde Park were filled with lamenting men, women, and children. Whitefield stood among them at Hyde Park preaching at midnight. A deep moral impression followed these events.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 308.

1088. ——. Rev. William Gassaway. [He was ignorant in his early life concerning the way of salvation. When he became awakened] he detested himself as a sinner. Passing a stream he allowed his horse to drink, saying, "You may, you are not a sinner; but I am. I will not drink."—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 3, p. 394.

1089. ——. John Wesley. A young lawyer of brilliant talents and aristocratic relations was in the habit of meeting with his gay associates at a coffee-house in London. He was the wit of the company, and at one of their meetings, when Wesley was to preach in the neighborhood, his companions sent him to hear the itinerant apostle, in order to give them a mimicked specimen of his preaching. Just as he entered the place of worship Wesley announced as his text, "Prepare to meet thy God!" It struck the young man's conscience; he listened with emotion to the sermon, and thenceforward the career of his life was changed. On returning as a necessary courtesy to his company in the coffee-house, they asked him if he had "taken off the old Methodist." "No, gentlemen," was his reply, "but he has taken me off;" and he retired from their circle to return no more.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 387.

1090. CONSCIENCE vs. Conscience. Intolerance. [During the contentions of sects in the reign of James II., Dryden says:] All men are engaged either on this side or that; and though conscience is the common word given by both, yet if a writer fall among enemies, and cannot give the marks of their conscience, he is knocked down before the reasons of his own are heard.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 26.

1091. CONSCIENCE conquers Conquerors. William II. The death-bed of William was a death-bed of repentance. He spoke, it is related, of the rivers of blood he had shed. He lamented his barbarities in England.—KNIGHT'S ENGLAND, vol. 1, ch. 16, p. 218.

1092. CONSCIENCE, Defence of. Martin Luther. Luther spoke in both German and Latin. After he had finished, the princes held a short consultation. Then the imperial representative reproached him for having spoken disrespectfully, and for not having answered the proposed questions. He repelled Luther's demand for counter-evidence, and maintained that his heresies had been condemned by the Church and by its general councils. What was now demanded of him was a plain and straightforward answer, whether he would or would not recant. Thereupon Luther replied: "Since your Imperial Majesty have desired a direct answer, I shall give such an one as shall have neither horns nor teeth—viz., except I be convinced with clear and undoubted evidence of Holy Scripture—for I believe neither in the Pope nor in councils alone, since it is evident they have often erred and contradicted themselves; and as my conscience is bound by God's Word, I cannot and will not recant, because it is neither safe nor advisable to act contrary to conscience. Here I stand; I cannot do otherwise; God help me! Amen!" . . . Luther was now happy at heart. As soon as he returned to his lodging-place, he lifted up both hands and cried out, "I have done it! I have done it!" And continuing, he remarked: "If I had a thousand heads, I would lose them all rather than to recant."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 9, p. 89.

1093. CONSCIENCE, Education of. Rev. John Newton. Providence was now kind to him; he became captain of a slave-ship, and made several voyages on the business of trade. That it was a wicked trade he seems to have had no idea; he says he never knew sweeter or more frequent hours of divine communion than on his last two voyages to Guinea. Afterward it occurred to him that though his employment was genteel and profitable, it made him a sort of jailer, unpleasantly conversant with both chains and shackles; and he besought Providence to fix him in a more humane calling. In answer to his prayer came a fit of apoplexy, which made it dangerous for him to go to sea again.—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 3.

1094. CONSCIENCE, Erratic. Duke of York (James II.). Debauching a woman on promise of marriage, he next allowed her to be traduced as having yielded to frequent prostitution, and then married her; he was conscientious, but his moral sense was as slow as his understanding.—BANCROFT'S U. S., ch. 17.

1095. CONSCIENCE explained. Reign of James II. [In Scotland the anti-Catholic feeling was strong.] The three privy counsellors who had lately returned from London took the lead in opposition to the royal will. Hamilton declared plainly that he could not do what was asked. He was a faithful and loyal subject; but there was a limit imposed by conscience. "Conscience," said the chancellor—"conscience is a vague word, which signifies anything or nothing." Lockhart, who sat in Parliament as representative of the great county of Lanark, struck in: "If conscience be a word without meaning, we will change it for another phrase which, I hope, means something. For conscience let us put the fundamental laws of Scotland."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6.

1096. CONSCIENCE, A guilty. Caracalla. [Caracalla, the son of Servius, was, with his brother Geta, chosen by the army to be joint emperors of Rome. Discord followed, and Geta was assassinated in the presence of and by the direction of his brother.] The crime went not unpunished. Neither business nor pleasure nor flattery could defend Caracalla from the stings of a guilty conscience; and he confessed, in the anguish of a tortured mind, that his disordered fancy often beheld the angry forms of his father and his brother rising into life, to threaten and upbraid him. The consciousness of his crime should have induced him to convince mankind, by the virtues of his reign, that the bloody deed had been the involuntary effect of fatal necessity. But the repentance of Caracalla only prompted him to remove from the world whatever could remind him of his guilt, or recall the memory of his murdered brother. On his return from the Senate to the palace, he found his mother in the company of several noble matrons, weeping over the untimely fate of her younger son. The jealous emperor threatened them with instant death; the sentence was executed against Fadilla, the last remaining daughter of the Emperor Marcus; and even the afflicted Julia was obliged to silence her lamentations, to suppress her sighs, and to receive the assassin with smiles of joy and approbation. It was computed that, under the vague appellation of the friends of Geta, above twenty thousand persons of both sexes suffered death. [See No. 239.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6.

1097. CONSCIENCE honored. King William Rufus. Two monks having come one day . . . to buy an abbot's place, and having outreached each other in the sums they offered, the king said to a third monk who stood by, "What wilt thou give for the place?" "Not a penny," answered the monk, "for it is against my conscience." "Then," replied the king, "thou of the three best deservest it," and instantly gave it to him.

1098. CONSCIENCE, Imperfect. Alfonse d'Albuquerque. [See Conquest by Destruction, No. 1070.] The historians of this conquest mention, as a proof of the magnanimity and disinterestedness of Albuquerque, that he only took from Malacca, for his personal use, the iron lions which marked the tomb of the royal family; although he carried away a large ship loaded deep with gold and silver, for the use of the king and the needs of the public service. Not a man in that age of the world appears to have questioned the right of a strong Christian to seize the gold of a weak heathen; nor did any one see anything wrong in the robbery of a heathen king's family tomb. I am happy to inform the reader that the ship containing both the treasure and the iron lions went to the bottom of the sea a few days after leaving Malacca.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 315.

1099. CONSCIENCE, Indiscreet. Marcellus. [On the day of a public festival Marcellus, a centurion, threw away his belt, his arms, and the ensigns of his] office, and exclaimed, with a loud voice, that he would obey none but Jesus Christ the eternal King, and that he renounced forever the use of carnal weapons, and the service of an idolatrous master. The soldiers, as soon as they recovered from their astonishment, secured the person of Marcellus. He was examined in the city of Tingi by the president of that part of Mauritania; and as he was convicted by his own confession, he was condemned and beheaded for the crime of desertion.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16.

1100. CONSCIENCE an Interpreter. Sacri-lege. Pyrrhus listened to evil counsellors, and plundered the rich treasury of the temple of Proserpine. The ships which were conveying the plunder were wrecked, and Pyrrhus, conscience-stricken, restored all that was saved. But the memory of the deed haunted him; he has recorded his belief that this sacrilegious act was the cause of all his future misfortunes.—LIDDELL'S ROME, ch. 26, p. 246.

1101. CONSCIENCE, Liberty of. Roger Williams. He was the first person in modern Christendom to assert in its plenitude the doctrine of the liberty of conscience, the equality of opinions before the law. . . . A moral principle has a much wider and nearer influence on human happiness; nor can any discovery of truth be of any more direct benefit to society than that which establishes a perpetual religious peace, and spreads tranquillity through every community and every bosom. If Copernicus is held in perpetual reverence because on his death-bed he published to the world that the sun is the centre of our system—if the name of Kepler is preserved in the annals of human excellence for his sagacity in detecting the laws of the planetary motion—if the genius of Newton has been almost adored for dissecting a ray of light, and weighing heavenly bodies as in a balance, let there be for the name of Roger Williams at least some humble place among those who have advanced moral science, and made themselves the benefactors of mankind.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 9.

1102. ———. Cromwell. [Cromwell strongly advocated liberty of conscience when it was a startling notion to most public men. He was among the first of public men to advocate it. He urged that] the civil magistrate had nothing to do to determine of anything in matters of religion, by constraint or restraint. But every man might not only hold, but preach and do in matters of religion what he pleased.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 3.

1103. ———. Cromwell's Time. The Presbyterian mind of that day, which demanded not only the right to the expression of their own convictions, but also the repression of all who followed not with them. Did not Milton say of them that "Presbyter was priest spelt large?" Indeed, in that day there was a universal disposition to persecute and repress; it was not that persecution, in itself, was judged a crime, only when it assailed the order of particular opinion. Toleration was regarded by Episcopalian and Presbyterian as an abominable Erastianism, or latitudinarian and Laodicean half-heartedness; and Oliver alone stood forth vindicating liberty of conscience to all.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 15, p. 195.

1104. ——. Cromwell. It is thus we find him speaking on the 22d of January, 1655, when he summoned the House to meet him in the Painted Chamber: "Is there not yet upon the spirits of men a strange itching? Nothing will satisfy them unless they can press their finger upon their brethren's consciences, to pinch them there. To do this was no part of the contest we had with the common adversary. And wherein consisted this more than in obtaining that liberty from the tyranny of the bishops to all species of Protestants to worship God according to their own light and consciences? For want of which many of our brethren forsook their native countries to seek their bread from strangers, and to live in howling wildernesses; and for which also many that remained here were imprisoned, and otherwise abused and made the scorn of the nation. Those that were sound in the faith, how proper was it for them to labor for liberty, for a just liberty, that men might not be trampled upon for their consciences! Had not they themselves labored but lately under the weight of persecution? And was it fit for them to sit heavy upon others? Is it ingenuous to ask liberty, and not give it?"—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 15, p. 197.

1105. CONSCIENCE perverted. The Jesuits. In the books of casuistry which had been written by his brethren, and printed with the approbation of his superiors, were to be found doctrines consolatory to transgressors of every class. There the bankrupt was taught how he might, without sin, secrete his goods from his creditors. The servant was taught how he might, without sin, run off with his master's plate. The pander was assured that a Christian man might innocently earn his living by carrying letters and messages between married women and their gallants. The high-spirited and punctilious gentlemen of France were gratified by a decision in favor of duelling. The Italians, accustomed to darker and baser modes of vengeance, were glad to learn that they might, without any crime, shoot at their enemies from behind hedges. To deceit was given a license sufficient to destroy the whole value of human contracts and of human testimony. In truth, if society continued to hold together, if life and property enjoyed any security, it was because common-sense and common humanity restrained men from doing what the Society of Jesus assured them they might with a safe conscience do.—MACAULAY'S Eng., ch. 6.

1106. ——. Hernando Cortez. His will contained one passage so curious, that I will conclude by copying it. After recommending his heirs to treat the Indians with humanity, he proceeds thus: "It has been long a question whether we can, in good conscience, hold the Indians in slavery. This question not having yet been decided, I order my son, Martin, and his heirs to spare no pains to arrive at a knowledge of the truth on this point, for it is a matter which interests deeply their conscience and mine." Who would have thought to find such a passage in the will of a Cortez! Nothing is more certain than this, that Cortez, in all that he did in Mexico, fully believed that he was an instrument in the hand of a benevolent God; for he found Mexico pagan, and left it Catholic. Massacre, rapine, devastation, the betrayal and murder of a king, the fall of an empire—these were as nothing in view of a result like this! So thought all good Spaniards of that age.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 322.

1107. ——. Jacques Clement. A young and ignorant Dominican monk, named Jacques Clement, was artfully prevailed upon to regard the murder of the king [Henry III.] under such circumstances as not only a lawful, but a highly meritorious, enterprise. He . . . prepared himself for the deed by fasting, the sacraments, and prayer. . . . Having procured a pass . . . and a forged letter of recommendation to the king . . . was conducted by an officer to the king's quarters. On entering Henry's presence he stated that he was charged with a communication of grave importance, which could only be made to his Majesty in private. The king, without suspicion, directed the attendants to retire; and while he was engaged in reading the paper presented to him, the monk suddenly drew a knife from his sleeve and plunged it into his abdomen. The king drew the weapon from the wound and struck Clement on the face, crying out, "Oh, the wicked monk, he has slain me!" upon which the guards rushed in and despatched the wretched assassin on the spot with their halberds.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 17, § 14.

1108. CONSCIENCE, Phantom of. Constans II. The Emperor Constans II. could fly from his people, but he could not fly from himself. The remorse of his conscience created a phantom who pursued him by land and sea, by day and by night; and the visionary Theodosius, presenting to his lips a cup of blood, said, or seemed to say, "Drink, brother, drink;" a sure emblem of the aggravation of his guilt, since he had received from the hands of the deacon the mystic cup of the blood of Christ. Odious to himself and to mankind, Constans perished by domestic, perhaps by episcopal, treason, in the capital of Sicily. [He had caused the murder of his brother Theodosius.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 48.

1109. CONSCIENCE, Power of. Benjamin Abbott. [Before conversion he was a rude, ignorant, boisterous man, given to drinking, fighting, and gambling. When forty years old he was awakened by a sermon; his conscience was aroused; driving homeward, he believed that the tempter was immediately behind him; his anxiety was terrible, his hair "rising on his head." His mind had evidently become morbid under its moral sufferings. His dreams that night were appalling; the next day, seeking relief in the labors of the field, his "troubled heart beat so loud that he could hear the strokes." He threw down the scythe, and "stood weeping for his sins." Truly a sublime manifestation of the power of conscience in a rude soul! He became a second John Bunyan, and won many hundreds to Christ.]—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 1, p. 199.

1110. CONSCIENCE quickened. By Crime. When the crime was over [the Roman emperor assassinated his mother], Nero first perceived its magnitude, and was seized with the agony of a too brief terror and remorse. There is in great crimes an awful power of illumination. They light up the conscience with a glare which shows all things in their true hideousness. He spent the night in oppressive silence. For the first time in his life his sleep was disturbed by dreams. He often started up in terror, and dreaded the return of dawn. The gross flattery and hypocritical congratulations of his friends soon dissipated all personal alarm. But scenes cannot change their aspect as easily as the countenances of men, and there was to him a deadly look in the sea and shore [where he had previously sought to drown his mother]. From the lofty summit of Misenum ghostly wailings and the blast of a solitary trumpet seemed to reach him from his mother's grave.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 3, p. 27.

1111. ——. Reign of James II. [Lord Churchill, the Duke of Marlborough, was a Protestant general, and every worldly interest prompted him to please the king who had espoused the Roman Catholic cause.] Churchill might indeed . . . raise himself still higher in the royal favor by conforming to the Church of Rome; and it might seem that one who was not less distinguished for avarice and baseness than for capacity and valor was not likely to be shocked at hearing a mass. But so inconsistent is human nature, that there are tender spots even in seared consciences. And thus this man, who owed his rise in life to his sister's shame [as mistress to the Duke of York], who had been kept by the most profuse, imperious and shameless of harlots [the Duchess of Cleveland], and whose public life, to those who can look through a blaze of genius and glory, will appear a prodigy of turpitude, believed implicitly in the religion he had learned when a boy, and shuddered at the thought of abjuring it. . . . The one crime from which his heart recoiled was apostasy.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7.

1112. CONSCIENCE A Reminder. King Philip. Philip kept a man in his service to tell him every day before he gave audience, "Philip, remember thou art mortal."—ROLLIN, vol. 1, ch. 14.

1113. CONSCIENCE, Sale of. Reign of James II. [James asked the Scottish Parliament to remove the political disabilities of his Roman Catholic brethren.] The king exhorted the estates to give relief to his Roman Catholic subjects, and offered, in return, a free trade with England and an amnesty for political offences. . . . Objection was taken by some zealous Protestants to the mention made of the Roman Catholic religion. There was no such religion. There was an idolatrous apostasy, which the laws punished with the halter, and to which it did not become Christian men to give flattering titles. To call such a superstition Catholic was to give up the whole question which was at issue between Rome and the reformed churches. The offer of a free trade with England was treated as an insult. "Our fathers," said one orator, "sold their king for southern gold, and we still lie under the reproach of that foul bargain. Let it not be said of us that we have sold our God!"—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 111.

1114. CONSCIENCE, Scruples of. Puritans. Some precisians had scruples about teaching the Latin grammar because the names of Mars, Bacchus, and Apollo occurred in it. The fine arts were all but proscribed. The solemn peal of the organ was superstitious. The light music of Ben Jonson's masks was dissolute. Half the fine paintings of England were idolatrous, and the other half indecent. [See Pleasures Condemned, No. 4207.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 76.

1115. CONSCIENCE, Terrors of. Roman Emperor Theodoric. After a life of virtue and glory, Theodoric was descending with shame and guilt into the grave; his mind was humbled by the contrast of the past, and justly alarmed by the invisible terrors of futurity. One evening, as it is related, when the head of a large fish was served on the royal table, he suddenly exclaimed that he beheld the angry countenance of Symmachus, his eyes glaring with fury and revenge, and his mouth armed with long, sharp teeth, which threatened to devour him. The monarch instantly retired to his chamber, and, as he lay, trembling with aguish cold, under a weight of bedclothes, he expressed, in broken murmurs to his physician Elpidius, his deep repentance for the murders of Boethius and Symmachus. His malady increased, and after a dysentery which continued three days, he expired in the palace of Ravenna, in the thirty-third, or, if we compute from the invasion of Italy, in the thirty-seventh year of his reign.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39.

1116. CONSCIENCE, Uneducated. English Slave Trade. English ships, fitted out in English cities, under the special favor of the royal family, of the ministry, and of Parliament, stole from Africa, in the years from 1700 to 1750, probably a million and a half of souls, of whom one eighth were buried in the Atlantic, victims of the passage; and yet in England no general indignation rebuked the enormity; for the public opinion of the age was obedient to materialism.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 24.

1117. CONSCIENCE, Victory of. Sir Thomas More. In the general opinion of Europe, the foremost Englishman of the time was Sir Thomas More. As the policy of the divorce ended in an open rupture with Rome, he had withdrawn silently from the ministry. Triumphant in all else, the monarchy was to find its power stop short at the conscience of man [who would not acknowledge that Henry VIII.'s marriage with Catherine was unscriptural, and thus forward the licentious remarriage of the king]. The great battle of spiritual freedom, the battle of the Protestant against Mary, of the Catholic against Elizabeth, of the Puritan against Charles, of the Independent against the Presbyterian, began at the moment when More refused to bend or to deny his convictions at a king's bidding. "I thank the Lord," More said, with a sudden start, as the boat dropped silently down the river from his garden steps in the early morning—"I thank the Lord that the field is won." At Lambeth Cranmer and his fellow-commissioners tendered to him the new oath of allegiance; but, as they expected, it was refused. They bade him walk in the garden that he might reconsider his reply.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 579.

1118. CONSCIENCE, Warning of. Charles I. He thought to lessen the horror and ingratitude of the act by appointing a commission of three members of his council, and delegating to them the power of signing the parliamentary death-warrant against Strafford. The commissioners ratified the sentence, and the king shut himself up to weep, and avoid the light of that morning which was to witness the fall of his faithful and innocent servant. He thought that by obliterating this day from his life he would also expunge it from the memory of heaven and man. He passed the whole night in darkness, in prayers for the dying, and in tears; but the sun rose to commemorate the injustice of the monarch, the treachery of the friend, and the greatness of soul of the victim. "I have sinned against my conscience," wrote the king several years after to the queen, when reproaching himself for that signature drawn from him by the love he bore his wife and children. "It warned me at the time; I was seized with remorse at the instant when I signed this base and criminal concession." . . . "Ah! Strafford is happier than I am," replied the prince, concealing his eyes with his hands. "Tell him that, did it not concern the safety of the kingdom, I would willingly give my life for his!"—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 13.

1119. CONSCIENCE, Worthless. James II. Arthur Herbert was brother of the chief justice, member for Dover, master of the robes, and rear-admiral of England. Arthur Herbert was much loved by the sailors, and was reputed one of the best of the aristocratic class of naval officers. It had been generally supposed that he would readily comply with royal wishes; for he was heedless of religion, he was fond of pleasure and expense, he had no private estates, his places brought him in £4000 a year, and he had long been reckoned among the most devoted personal adherents of James. When, however, the rear-admiral was closeted, and required to promise that he would vote for the repeal of the Test Act, his answer was, that his honor and conscience would not permit him to give any such pledge. "Nobody doubts your honor," said the king; "but a man who lives as you do ought not to talk about his conscience." To this reproach—a reproach which came with a bad grace from the lover of Catharine Sedley—Herbert manfully replied: "I have my faults, sir; but I could name people who talk much more about conscience than I am in the habit of doing, and yet lead lives as loose as mine." He was dismissed from all his places.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7.

1120. CONSCIENCE wronged. An evil Genius. [Brutus, the assassin of Cæsar,] sat in his tent at dead of night and thought a huge shadowy form stood by him; and when he calmly asked, "What and whence art thou?" it answered, or seemed to answer, "I am thine evil genius, Brutus; we shall meet again at Philippi."—LIDDELL'S ROME, ch. 69, § 22.

1121. CONSECRATION for Conflict. Knights. As the champion of God and the ladies (I blush to unite such discordant names), he devoted himself to speak the truth; to maintain the right; to protect the distressed; to practise courtesy, a virtue less familiar to the ancients; to pursue the infidels; to despise the allurements of ease and safety; and to vindicate in every perilous adventure the honor of his character. The abuse of the same spirit provoked the illiterate knight to disdain the arts of industry and peace; to esteem himself the sole judge and avenger of his own injuries; and proudly to neglect the laws of civil society and military discipline.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58, p. 563.

1122. CONSECRATION without Faith. John Wesley. [He was earnestly seeking the knowledge of his personal salvation, when he read Taylor's "Holy Living and Dying," which enforces utter purity of motive; he "instantly resolves to dedicate all his life to God; all his thoughts, words, and actions, being thoroughly convinced there is no medium." He "forsakes all" to become a missionary to savages and colonists in the new world. He goes to Georgia, where he fasts much, sleeps on the ground, and refuses all food but bread and water; he goes barefoot to encourage the poor children who had no shoes. Yet it all brought him no peace of mind. But after returning to England Luther's preface to the Epistle to the Romans is read in a Moravian meeting, and the truth breaks upon his mind.] "I felt," he writes, "my heart strangely warmed; I felt I did trust in Christ alone for salvation, and an assurance was given me that He had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death."—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, ch. 1.

1123. CONSENT enforced. Intimidation. The abandoned Caracalla more than once attempted the life of his father, who, at length, broken by disease, died at York [A.D. 211. The brothers] Caracalla and Geta agreed to divide the empire, the former retaining the Western part, and the latter Asia and the Eastern provinces. The mutual hatred of those two brothers was now fomented by their association in the government. Caracalla, at length worn out by the struggle, and unable to bear longer with his rival, caused him to be openly assassinated in the arms of his mother Julia, and had the address to persuade the people that he was compelled to this atrocious deed by motives of self-preservation. On this subject Ælius Spartianus has transmitted a fact, which strongly marks the degeneracy of the Roman character, and that abject servility with which the highest ranks of the state submitted to the yoke of tyranny. Caracalla, after the death of his brother Geta, thought it necessary to apologize to the Senate for a deed so dark and unnatural. He ordered a body of his guards to enter the Senate-house, and two armed soldiers to post themselves at the side of every senator. Then gravely walking up to the consul's chair, he pronounced a studied harangue, setting forth the imperious necessity of the action, and urging that his concern for the interests of the state had, in this single instance, overcome his fraternal affection and the humanity of his nature. It may be believed that the Conscript Fathers were in no disposition to dispute the force of his arguments. Caracalla was now proclaimed sole emperor, and one of the first acts of his administration was to put to death the celebrated lawyer Papinian, who had refused to justify his conduct to the people.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 2.

1124. CONSERVATISM cured. Peter the Great. There was a good deal of fun in the composition of this illustrious patriot, and he turned it to good use sometimes in throwing ridicule upon the an cient usages. One cold day in the winter of 1703, he invited all his court and nobility to attend the wedding of one of his buffoons; and he was very particular that the old fogies of the empire should be present. He gave notice that this wedding was to be celebrated according to the "usages of our ancestors," and that every one must come dressed in the manner of the sixteenth century. Accordingly, all the guests appeared in long flowing Asiatic robes of the ancient Russians, to the merriment of the whole court. It was an ancient custom that on a wedding-day no fire should be kindled in the house; and, therefore, the palace was as cold as mortal flesh could bear. "Our ancestors" drank only brandy, and so on this day not a drop of any milder liquor was allowed. All the barbarous and indecent customs formerly in vogue at weddings were revived for this occasion, and when any one objected or complained, the czar would reply, laughing: "Our ancestors did so! Are not the ancient customs always the best?" This ridiculous fête, it is said, had much to do in bringing the old usages into discredit, and reconciling timid people to the new ways introduced by the czar.—CYC. OF BIOG., p. 431.

1125. CONSERVATISM, Dangers of. Dr. Arnold. At London, where he wished religious, not sectarian, examination to be introduced into the University, he was regarded as a bigot, while at Oxford he was regarded as an extreme latitudinarian. "If I had two necks," said he, "I think I had a very good chance of being hanged by both sides."—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 80.

1126. CONSERVATISM described. Preservation. Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury, has been described by Bacon as a most fit man to keep things from growing worse, but no very fit man to reduce things to be much better.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 23, p. 359.

1127. CONSERVATISM, Excessive. Reign of Charles II. Danby formed the design of securing to the Cavalier party the exclusive possession of all political power, both executive and legislative. In the year 1675, accordingly, a bill was offered to the Lords, which provided that no person should hold any office, or should sit in either House of Parliament, without first declaring on oath that he considered resistance to the kingly power as in all cases criminal, and that he would never endeavor to alter the government either in Church or State. . . . Buckingham and Shaftesbury were beyond all precedent vehement and pertinacious, and at length proved successful. The bill was not indeed rejected, but was retarded, mutilated, and at length suffered to drop.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2.

1128. CONSERVATISM, Foolish. Anti-progressive. [In 1630 a company was formed who undertook to drain ninety-five thousand acres of wet land in England. The sportsmen opposed it.] The men who walked upon stilts were indignant at these innovations, which threatened to exterminate the wild ducks, which they cherished as more profitable than sheep or oxen; and they destroyed the drainage works in true conservative spirit.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 1.

1129. CONSERVATISM, Non-progressive. Duke of Newcastle. [In England, previous to this date, 1751, the year had been made to begin with the 25th of March. By the energy of Lord Chesterfield it was changed to the 1st of January.] The timid [Duke of] Newcastle told him that he hated new-fangled things—that he had better not meddle with things so long established.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 12, p. 183.

1130. CONSERVATISM, Opposition of. To Police. For several years a prodigious clamor was raised against this force, not only by thieves and street-walkers, but by respectable upholders of the ancient watch. The new police was to be "the most dangerous and effective engine of despotism." It would have the certain effect of depriving us of our immemorial liberties.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 13, p. 232.

1131. — — —. Mines. For three centuries the exportation of coals to foreign countries was almost prohibited by excessive duties, lest the mines should be exhausted and our own manufacturing superiority be endangered.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 29, p. 478.

1132. CONSERVATISM, Political. Lord Halifax. All the prejudices, all the exaggerations of both the great parties in the State, moved his scorn. He despised the mean arts and unreasonable clamors of demagogues. He despised still more the Tory doctrines of divine right and passive obedience. He sneered impartially at the bigotry of the Churchman and at the bigotry of the Puritan. . . . In temper he was what, in our time, is called a Conservative. In theory he was a Republican. . . . He was the chief of those politicians whom the two great parties contemptuously called Trimmers. Instead of quarrelling with his nickname, he assumed it as a title of honor, and vindicated, with great vivacity, the dignity of the appellation. Everything good, he said, trims between extremes. The temperate zone trims between the climate in which men are roasted and the climate in which they are frozen. . . . Virtue is nothing but a just temper between propensities, any one of which, if indulged to excess, becomes a vice.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3.

1133. CONSISTENCY, Disregard for. James II. [Catherine Sedley was the notorious mistress of James. His wife, Mary of Modena, was grieved.] She asked him how he reconciled his conduct to his religious professions. "You are ready," she said, "to put your kingdom to hazard for the sake of your soul, and yet you are throwing away your soul for the sake of that creature." Father Petre, on bended knees, seconded these remonstrances. It was his duty to do so; and his duty was not the less strenuously performed because it coincided with his interest. The king went on for a time sinning and repenting. In his hours of remorse his penances were severe. Mary treasured up to the end of her life, and at her death bequeathed to the convent of Chaillot, the scourge with which he had vigorously avenged his wrongs upon his own shoulders.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6.

1134. CONSOLATION of Philosophy. Roman Senator Boethius. [Imprisoned by Theodoric for maintaining the rights of senators.] While Boethius, oppressed with fetters, expected each moment the sentence or the stroke of death, he composed, in the tower of Pavia, the "Consolation of Philosophy," a golden volume, not unworthy of Plato or Tully. . . . The celestial guide whom he had so long invoked at Rome and Athens now condescended to illumine his dungeon. . . . She taught him to compare his long prosperity with his recent distress, and to conceive new hopes from the inconstancy of fortune. . . . His enemies had left him happiness, inasmuch as they had left him virtue.—GIBBON'S Rome, ch. 39.

1135. CONSPIRACY, Alarming. Reign of William I. Assassination was an event of daily occurrence. Many Normans suddenly disappeared, leaving no trace. The corpses of many were found bearing the marks of violence. Death by torture was denounced against the murderers, and strict search was made for them, but generally in vain, for the whole nation was in a conspiracy to screen them. It was at length thought necessary to lay a heavy fine on every hundred in which a person of French extraction should be found slain; and this regulation was followed up by another regulation, providing that every person who was found slain should be supposed to be a Frenchman, unless he was proved to be a Saxon.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 12.

1136. CONSPIRACY, Infamous. Royalists. A.D. 1776. A secret plot was fostered by Tryon . . . through the royalist mayor of New York and others, to prepare a body of conspirators, who should raise an insurrection in aid of Howe on his arrival, blow up the magazines, gain possession of the guns, and seize Washington and his principal officers. Some of the inferior agents were suspected of having intended to procure his death. . . . It was discovered before it was matured. . . . Two or three of his own guard were partners in the scheme of treachery; and one of them . . . was hanged. It was the first military execution of the Revolution.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 68.

1137. CONSPIRACY, Political. Reign of Charles II. The French Court, which knew Danby [the Chancellor of England] to be its mortal enemy, artfully contrived to ruin him by making him pass for a friend. Louis [XIV.], by the instrumentality of Ralph Montague, a faithless and shameless man, who had resided in France as minister from England, laid before the House of Commons proofs that the treasurer had been concerned in an application made by the Court to the Court of Versailles for a sum of money. The discovery had its natural effect. . . . In their view he was the broker who had sold England to France. It seemed clear that his greatness was at an end, and doubtful whether his head could be saved.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2.

1138. CONSPIRACY, Unpopular. Cæsar. [Cæsar was assassinated by the senators in the Senate house.] The conspirators had no sooner accomplished their purpose than they ran through the streets of the city, proclaiming aloud that the King of Rome was dead; but the effect did not answer their expectation. The people, almost to a man, seemed struck with horror at the deed. They loved Cæsar, master as he was of their lives and liberties.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 2.

1139. CONSPIRACY, Unproven. Sir Walter Raleigh. [There was an alleged conspiracy against James I.] Raleigh underwent a trial, which, though the issue declared him guilty, leaves the mind in a state of absolute scepticism with regard to the reality of this conspiracy, or of his concern in it. Raleigh's sentence was suspended for the course of fifteen years, during most of which time he was confined in the Tower, where he employed himself in the composition of his "History of the World," a work excellent in point of style, and in many branches valuable in point of matter. In the last year of his life he received the king's commission of admiral to undertake an expedition for the discovery of some rich mines in Guiana. This, which, if not law, humanity at least ought to have interpreted into a pardon of his offence, was, however, not so understood by the monarch, whose heart had no great portion of the generous feelings. Raleigh's expedition was unsuccessful; the court of Spain complained of an attack which he had made upon one of their settlements. James wished to be at peace with Spain, and Raleigh, at his return, was ordered to be beheaded on his former sentence.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 29.

1140. CONSPIRACY of Vice. Catiline's. B.C. 62. Sergius Catiline . . . was a youth of noble family, but with a character stained with every manner of crime. [He had been one of the ministers of cruelty for Sylla, the Dictator, and risen with honors.] Lost in character, drowned in debt, and thence unable to find any other resource for the support of his vices and debaucheries, he now formed the desperate scheme of extirpating the whole body of the Senate, of assassinating all the magistrates of the commonwealth, and satiating his avarice and ambition by the command of the republic and the plunder of the city. Catiline gained to his interest the profligate of all ranks and denominations; knights, patricians, and senators, who were desperate bankrupts, and some high-born women of intriguing and abandoned character, helped to increase his party. [The disclosure made by Fulvia, a woman of loose character, defeated the conspirators.]—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 1.

1141. CONSPIRATORS, Ingrate. Cæsar's. Sixty senators, in all, were parties to the immediate conspiracy. Of these nine tenths were members of the old faction whom Cæsar had pardoned, and who, of all his acts, resented most that he had been able to pardon them. They were the men who had stayed at home, like Cicero, from the fields of Thapsus and Munda, and had pretended penitence and submission that they might take an easier road to rid themselves of their enemy. Their motives were the ambition of their order and personal hatred of Cæsar; but they persuaded themselves that they were animated by patriotism; and as, in their hands, the Republic had been a mockery of liberty, so they aimed at restoring it by a mock tyrannicide.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 26.

1142. CONSTRUCTION vs. Destruction. Cromwell. April, 1653, he dissolved "the Rump." "We did not hear a dog bark at their going," he said afterward in one of his speeches, and it expresses the very truth of the event. Henceforth, until 1658—a brief parenthesis of time, indeed, in the history of the country—he governed the country absolutely. In a history so brief as this we shall not attempt to detail the circumstances of those troublesome years. Alas ! all his battles had been easy to win compared with the task of ruling the distracted realm.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 15, p. 186.

1143. CONTEMPT expressed. Timour. The first epistle of the Mogul emperor must have provoked, instead of reconciling, the Turkish sultan, whose family and nation he affected to despise. "Dost thou not know that the greatest part of Asia is subject to our arms and our laws ? . . . Be wise in time ; reflect ; repent ; and avert the thunder of our vengeance, which is yet suspended over thy head ! Thou art no more than a pismire ; why wilt thou seek to provoke the elephants ? Alas ! they will trample thee under their feet."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65.

1144. CONTEMPT for Pretension. Pirates. [During the time of Pompey, the pirates of the Mediterranean were very numerous and bold. They seized prisoners on the land and carried them away.] But the most contemptuous circumstances of all was, that when they had taken a prisoner, and he cried out that he was a Roman, and told them his name, they pretended to be struck with terror, smote their thighs, and fell upon their knees to ask him pardon. The poor man, seeing them thus humble themselves before him, thought them in earnest, and said he would forgive them ; for some were so officious as to put on his shoes, and others to help him on with his gown, that his quality might no more be mistaken. When they had carried on this farce, and enjoyed it for some time, they let a ladder down into the sea, and bade him go in peace ; and if he refused to do so, they pushed him off the deck, and drowned him.—PLUTARCH'S "POMPEY."

1145. — — —. Alaric. [Rome was besieged, and ambassadors sent to Alaric to treat for peace.] When they were introduced into his presence they declared, perhaps in a more lofty style than became their abject condition, that the Romans were resolved to maintain their dignity, either in peace or war ; and that if Alaric refused them a fair and honorable capitulation, he might sound his trumpets, and prepare to give battle to an innumerable people, exercised in arms, and animated by despair. "The thicker the hay, the easier it is mowed," was the concise reply of the barbarian ; and this rustic metaphor was accompanied by a loud and insulting laugh, expressive of his contempt for the menaces of an unwarlike populace, enervated by luxury before they were emaciated by famine. He then condescended to fix the ransom which he would accept as the price of his retreat from the walls of Rome : all the gold and silver in the city, whether it were the property of the State or of individuals ; all the rich and precious movables ; and all the slaves who could prove their title to the name of barbarians. The ministers of the Senate presumed to ask, in a modest and suppliant tone, "If such, O king, are your demands, what do you intend to leave us ?" "YOUR LIVES !" replied the haughty conqueror ; they trembled, and retired. Yet before they retired a short suspension of arms was granted, which allowed some time for a more temperate negotiation.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31.

1146. CONTEMPT, Protected by. Usurper Maximus. The unprotected Maximus, whom he [Count Gerontius] had invested with the purple, was indebted for his life to the contempt that was entertained of his power and abilities. The caprice of the barbarians, who ravaged Spain, once more seated this imperial phantom on the throne ; but they soon resigned him to the justice of Honorius ; and the tyrant Maximus, after he had been shown to the people of Ravenna and Rome, was publicly executed.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31, p. 303.

1147. CONTEMPT, Religious. Puritans. With the fear and hatred inspired by such a tyranny, contempt was largely mingled. The peculiarities of the Puritan, his look, his dress, his dialect, his strange scruples, had been, ever since the time of Elizabeth, favorite subjects with mockers. But these peculiarities appeared far more grotesque in a faction which ruled a great empire than in obscure and persecuted congregations. The cant which had moved laughter when it was heard on the stage from Tribulation Wholesome and Zeal-of-the-Land Busy, was still more laughable when it proceeded from the lips of generals and counsellors of State.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2.

1148. CONTENTMENT in Gardening. Diocletian. [When Diocletian resigned the imperial purple] he had preserved, or at least he soon recovered, a taste for the most innocent as well as natural pleasures, and his leisure hours were sufficiently employed in building, planting, and gardening. His answer to Maximian is deservedly celebrated. He was solicited by that restless old man to reassume the reins of government and the Imperial purple. He rejected the temptation with a smile of pity, calmly observing that if he could show Maximian the cabbages which he had planted with his own hands at Salona, he should no longer be urged to relinquish the enjoyment of happiness for the pursuit of power.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 13.

1149. CONTENTMENT under Hardships. John Wesley. [He] and I lay on the floor ; he had my great coat for his pillow, and I had Burkitt's notes on the New Testament for mine. One morning about three o'clock Mr. Wesley turned over, and finding me awake, clapped me on the side, saying, "Brother Nelson, let us be of good cheer ; I have one whole side yet, for the skin is off but one side."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, ch. 5.

1150. CONTENTMENT, Inferior. Samuel Johnson. JOHNSON (laughing) : "It must be born with a man to be contented to take up with little things. Women have a great advantage that they may take up with little things, without disgracing themselves ; a man cannot, except with fiddling. Had I learnt to fiddle, I should have done nothing else." BOSWELL : "Pray, sir, did you ever play on any musical instrument ?" JOHNSON : "No, sir ; I once bought me a flageolet, but I never made out a tune." BOSWELL : "A flageolet, sir ! so small an instrument ? I should have liked to hear you play on the violoncello. That should have been your instrument." JOHNSON : "Sir, I might as well have played on the violoncello as another, but I should have done nothing else. No, sir ; a man would never undertake great things could he be amused with small. I once tried knotting—Dempster's sister undertook to teach me—but

I could not learn it."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 365.

1151. CONTENTMENT with Poverty. Diogenes. [Alexander the Great and his courtiers visited Diogenes.] The philosopher was at the time lying down in the sun. Alexander was surprised at his poverty, and, after saluting him in the kindest manner, asked whether he wanted anything. Diogenes replied, "Yes; that you would stand a little out of my sunshine." This answer raised the indignation and contempt of all the courtiers; but the monarch, struck with the philosopher's greatness of soul, said: "Were I not Alexander, I would be Diogenes."—ROLLIN, vol. 1, ch. 15.

1152. CONTENTMENT, Price of. Napoleon I. [Entering incognito the cabin of an Italian peasant woman, he listened to her story of poverty, and saw evidences of personal worth.] "How much money," said he, "should you want to make you perfectly happy?" "Ah, sir!" she replied, "a great deal I should want." "But how much?" "Oh, sir, . . . I should want as much as $80; but what prospect is there of one having $80?" The emperor caused an attendant to pour into her lap about $600 in glittering gold. For a moment she was speechless in bewilderment, and then said: "Ah, sir! ah, madam! this is too much; and yet you do not look as if you could sport with the feelings of a poor woman." "No," Josephine replied; "the money is all yours; with it you can now rent a piece of ground, purchase a flock of goats, and I hope you will be able to bring up your children comfortably."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 29.

1153. CONTEST, Unequal. Greeks vs. Russians. Yet the threats or calamities of a Russian war were more frequently diverted by treaty than by arms. In these naval hostilities every disadvantage was on the side of the Greeks; their savage enemy afforded no mercy; his poverty promised no spoil; his impenetrable retreat deprived the conqueror of the hopes of revenge; and the pride or weakness of empire indulged an opinion, that no honor could be gained or lost in the intercourse with barbarians. At first their demands were high and inadmissible—three pounds of gold for each soldier or mariner of the fleet: the Russian youth adhered to the design of conquest and glory, but the counsels of moderation were recommended by the hoary sages. "Be content," they said, "with the liberal offers of Cæsar; is it not far better to obtain without a combat the possession of gold, silver, silks, and all the objects of our desires? Are we sure of victory? Can we conclude a treaty with the sea? We do not tread on the land; we float on the abyss of water, and a common death hangs over our heads."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 56.

1154. CONTINGENCIES, Combination of. Capture of New Orleans. The attempt of the enemy had been audacious, but was aided by various contingencies. . . . the river had been obstructed by means of a raft consisting of a line of eleven dismantled schooners, extending from bank to bank, strongly moored, and connected together with six heavy chains. Unfortunately a violent storm had rent a large chasm in the raft, which could not be closed in time. It appears, too, that on the night of the attack [by the Federal fleet] the river had not been lighted by fire-rafts, although General Lovell had several times requested that it should be done. Moreover, the person in charge of the signals neglected to throw up rockets on the approach of the fleet, and, by a strange coincidence, the enemy's signals, on that night, were identically the same as those used by our gunboats. . . . the advance of the enemy was not discovered until they were abreast of the [two] forts.—POLLARD'S FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 12, p. 312.

1155. CONTINGENCIES of Success. Columbus. [Terrific and perilous storms attended his return voyage. All gave themselves up for lost.] Such were the difficulties and perils which attended his return to Europe; had one tenth part of them beset his outward voyage, his timid and factious crew would have risen in arms against the enterprise, and he never would have discovered the New World.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 5, ch. 2.

1156. CONTRACTS, Suspension of. Marcus Cælius. He told the mob that Cæsar would do nothing for them, that Cæsar cared only for his capitalists. He wrote privately to Cicero that he was bringing them over to Pompey, and he was doing it in the way in which pretended revolutionists so often play into the hands of reactionaries. He proposed a law in the Assembly in the spirit of Jack Cade, that no debts should be paid in Rome for six years, and that every tenant should occupy his house for two years free of rent. The administrators of the government treated him as a madman, and deposed him from office. He left the city pretending that he was going to Cæsar.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 22.

1157. CONTRADICTION, Proneness to. Samuel Johnson. I was sensible that he was sometimes a little actuated by the spirit of contradiction, and by means of that I hoped I should gain my point. I was persuaded, that if I had come upon him with a direct proposal, "Sir, will you dine in company with Jack Wilkes?" he would have flown into a passion, and would probably have answered, "Dine with Jack Wilkes, sir! I'd as soon dine with Jack Ketch." I therefore, while we were sitting quietly by ourselves at his house in an evening, took occasion to open my plan thus: "Mr. Dilly, sir, sends his respectful compliments to you, and would be happy if you would do him the honor to dine with him on Wednesday next, along with me, as I must soon go to Scotland." JOHNSON: "Sir, I am obliged to Mr. Dilly. I will wait upon him—" BOSWELL: "Provided, sir, I suppose, that the company which he is to have is agreeable to you." JOHNSON: "What do you mean, sir? What do you take me for? Do you think I am so ignorant of the world as to imagine that I am to prescribe to a gentleman what company he is to have at his table?" BOSWELL: "I beg your pardon, sir, for wishing to prevent you from meeting people whom you might not like. Perhaps he may have some of what he calls his patriotic friends with him." JOHNSON: "Well, sir, and what then? What care I for his patriotic friends? Poh!" BOSWELL: "I should not be surprised to find Jack Wilkes there." JOHNSON: "And if Jack Wilkes should be there, what is that to me, sir? My dear friend, let us have no more of this."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, 306.

1158. CONTRIBUTION, Unconscious. Siege of Acre. A.D. 1799. The siege had now continued for sixty days. . . . Napoleon had now expended all his cannon for balls. By a singular expedient he obtained a fresh supply. A party of soldiers were sent upon the beach. . . . apparently throwing up a rampart for the erection of a battery. Sir Sidney [Smith] immediately approached with the English ships and poured in upon them broadside after broadside from all his tiers. The soldiers . . . collected the balls as they rolled over the sand. [A dollar was paid for each ball.]—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 13.

1159. CONTROVERSY, Abusive. Luther. A new pope, Adrian VI., had ascended the papal throne. Earnest and severe in disposition, he sought most emphatically to crush Luther's heresy, which, in spite of ban and edict, was making continual progress. Nor did he hesitate to attack Luther's personal character, and to heap abuse upon him. Luther was not disturbed at this; he was accustomed to call Adrian "the jackass!"—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 13, p. 119.

1160. CONTROVERSY, Afraid of. George Fox, the Quaker. By degrees the "hypocrites" feared to dispute with him; and the simplicity of his principle found such ready entrance among the people, that the priests trembled and scud as he drew near; "so that it was a dreadful thing to them when it was told them, 'The man in leathern breeches is come.'"—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 16.

1161. CONTROVERSY, Angry. Samuel Johnson. MURRAY: "It seems to me that we are not angry at a man for controverting an opinion which we believe and value; we rather pity him." JOHNSON: "Why, sir, to be sure; when you wish a man to have that belief which you think is of infinite advantage, you wish well to him; but your primary consideration is your own quiet. If a madman were to come into this room with a stick in his hand, no doubt we should pity the state of his mind; but our primary consideration would be, to take care of ourselves. We should knock him down first, and pity him afterward. No, sir; every man will dispute with great good humor upon a subject in which he is not interested. I will dispute very calmly upon the probability of another man's son being hanged; but if a man zealously enforces the probability that my own son will be hanged, I shall certainly not be in a very good humor with him."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 291.

1162. CONTROVERSY, Bitterness in. Luther. The more Zwingli endeavored to convince Luther of the impossibility of the bodily presence of Christ, the more firmly did Luther adhere to the literal interpretation of the words of institution. And when Zwingli quoted the sixth chapter of St. John's Gospel in his favor, venturing rather boldly to remark, "This passage will break your neck, doctor!" Luther replied, "Do not exalt yourself too highly; you are in Hesse and not in Switzerland. Necks are not so readily broken here; spare your proud and defiant words until you return home to your fellow-countrymen. If not, I will administer a blow which will cause you to repent of your remark." Whereupon Zwingli responded: "In Switzerland also justice is administered in equity, and no one's neck is endangered without due process of law. I simply made use of a proverbial saying, which signifies that a person has lost his cause." The Landgrave likewise interposed at this point and entreated Luther not to understand such an expression so seriously.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 17, p. 153.

1163. CONTROVERSY, Christian. Luther. Zwingli declared with tears in his eyes: "There are no other people on earth with whom I would rather agree than with the Wittenbergers." But Luther rejected the proffered hand of union, with the words, "Your spirit is different from our spirit. I am surprised that you are willing to recognize in me, who regard your teaching to be false, a brother. It cannot be that you think very highly of your own doctrine." Then Bucer, who had come from Strasburg, advanced and said, "Take your choice! Either you will acknowledge no one as brother who may deviate from you in a single point—in which case you have no brethren, not even in your own party—or else if you recognize some who differ from you, then you must also acknowledge us." And when at last the Landgrave exhorted them all not to withhold the fraternal love which they owed one another as brethren, Luther remarked he would not deny his opponents that love which he owed to all his enemies.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 17, p. 155.

1164. CONTROVERSY, Dread of. Isaac Newton. Newton resided at the University of Cambridge for thirty-three years, devoted to profound researches in chemistry and astronomy. His discoveries in the nature of light and color remain to this day the accepted system in all countries. He was accustomed to make his apparatus with his own hands, even to his brick furnaces and brass-work. He seemed to become, at length, all mind, spending his days in meditation, insensible to all that usually interests mankind. Nevertheless, he was pleasant and amiable in his demeanor and exceedingly bountiful in gifts to his dependents and relatives. So little did he value the glory of his discoveries, that he was with difficulty induced to make them known to the world, having a mortal dread of being drawn into controversy. Some of his most brilliant discoveries remained unpublished for several years. And when, at last, his "Principia" had appeared, which contained the results of his studies, he had to be much persuaded before he would consent to issue a second edition.—Cyc. or Broc., p. 253.

1165. CONTROVERSY, Personal. Milton and Morus. Morus fitted the "Clamor" [a political pamphlet] with a preface, in which Milton was further reviled, and styled a "monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademtum." The secret of the authorship was strictly kept, and Morus, having been known to be concerned in the publication, was soon transformed in public belief into the author. So it was reported to Milton, and so Milton believed. He nursed his wrath, and took two years to meditate his blow. He caused inquiries to be made into Morus's antecedents. It happened that Morus's conduct had been wanting in discretion, especially in his relations with women. He had been equally imprudent in his utterances on some of the certainties of Calvinistic doctrine.—MILTON, BY M. PATTISON, ch. 10.

1166. CONTROVERSY prevented. Maryland. The provincial legislature in 1649 . . . enacted that no person believing in the fundamental doctrines of Christianity should, on account of his religious principles or practices, be in any wise distressed. . . . Freedom of conscience was reiterated. . . . It was declared a fineable offence for citizens to apply to each other the opprobrious names used in religious controversy. While Massachusetts was attempting by proscription to establish Puritanism, . . . it sometimes happened in those days that Protestants escaping from Protestants found an asylum with the Catholic colonists of the Chesapeake.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 26.

1167. CONTROVERSY, Ridiculous. Milton. Milton's "Defensio Secunda" came out in May, 1654. In this piece (written in Latin) Morus is throughout assumed to be the author of the "Clamor," and as such is pursued through many pages in a strain of invective, in which banter is mingled with ferocity. The Hague tittle-tattle about Morus's love-affairs is set forth in the pomp of Milton's loftiest Latin. Sonorous periods could hardly be more disproportioned to their material content. To have kissed a girl is painted as the blackest of crimes. The sublime and the ridiculous are here blended without the step between. Milton descends even to abuse the publisher, Vlac, who had officially signed his name to Morus's preface. The mixture of fanatical choler and grotesque jocularity, in which he rolls forth his charges of incontinence against Morus, and of petty knavery against Vlac, are only saved from being unseemly by being ridiculous. The comedy is complete when we remember that Morus had not written the "Clamor," nor Vlac the preface. Milton's rage blinded him; he is mad Ajax castigating innocent sheep instead of Achæans.—MILTON, BY M. PATTISON, ch. 10.

1168. CONTROVERSY, Spirit of. Constantinople. [Reign of Theodosius.] Their diocese enjoyed a free importation of vice and error from every province of the empire; the eager pursuit of religious controversy afforded a new occupation to the busy idleness of the metropolis; and we may credit the assertion of an intelligent observer, who describes, with some pleasantry, the effects of their loquacious zeal. "This city," says he, "is full of mechanics and slaves, who are all of them profound theologians, and preach in the shops and in the streets. If you desire a man to change a piece of silver, he informs you wherein the Son differs from the Father; if you ask the price of a loaf, you are told, by way of reply, that the Son is inferior to the Father."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 27.

1169. CONVENTS, Refuge in. Fear of Vice. [Samuel Johnson said of religious orders:] "It is as unreasonable for a man to go into a Carthusian convent for fear of being immoral, as for a man to cut off his hands for fear he should steal. There is, indeed, great resolution in the immediate act of dismembering himself; but when that is once done, he has no longer any merit; for though it is out of his power to steal, yet he may all his life be a thief in his heart. So when a man has once become a Carthusian, he is obliged to continue so, whether he chooses it or not. Their silence, too, is absurd. We read in the Gospel of the apostles being sent to preach, but not to hold their tongues. All severity that does not tend to increase good or prevent evil is idle. I said to the lady abbess of a convent, 'Madam, you are here not for the love of virtue, but the fear of vice.' She said she should remember this as long as she lived."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 275.

1170. CONVERSATION, Care in. Cato. [At the hospitable table of Cato the Censor] conversation generally turned upon the praises of great and excellent men among the Romans; as for the bad and the unworthy, no mention was made of them, for he would not allow in his company one word, either good or bad, to be said of such kind of men.—PLUTARCH'S CATO.

1171. CONVERSATION, Corrupting. Mary Stuart. [Mary Queen of Scots.] One of those mistresses, Lady Reves, a dissipated woman, celebrated by Brantôme for the notoriety of her adventures, was the confidante of the queen. She had retained for Bothwell an admiration which survived their intimacy. The queen, who amused herself by interrogating her confidante regarding the exploits and amours of her old favorite, allowed herself to be gradually attracted toward him by a sentiment which, at first, assumed the appearance of a mere good-natured curiosity. The confidante, divining, or believing she divined, the yet unexpressed desires of the queen, introduced Bothwell one evening into the garden, and even to the apartment of her mistress. This secret meeting forever sealed the ascendancy of Bothwell over the queen.—LAMAR-TINE'S QUEEN OF SCOTS, p. 17.

1172. CONVERSATION, Gifts for. Samuel Johnson. In our way to the club-to-night, when I regretted that Goldsmith would, upon every occasion, endeavor to shine, by which he often exposed himself, Mr. Langton observed that he was not like Addison, who was content with the fame of his writings, and did not aim also at excellency in conversation, for which he found himself unfit; and that he said to a lady who complained of his having talked little in company, "Madam, I have but nine pence in ready money, but I can draw for a £1000." I observed that Goldsmith had a great deal of gold in his cabinet, but, not content with that, was always taking out his purse. JOHNSON: "Yes, sir, and that so often an empty purse!"—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 219.

1173. CONVERSATION, Limit of. Bend-leather. [Walter] Scott tells a story of Clerk's being once baffled—almost for the first time—by a stranger in a stage-coach, who would not, or could not, talk to him on any subject, until at last Clerk addressed to him this stately remonstrance: "I have talked to you, my friend, on all the ordinary subjects—literature, farming, merchandise, gaming, game-laws, horse-races, suits-at-law, politics, swindling, blasphemy, and philosophy—is there any one subject that you will favor me by opening upon?" "Sir," replied the inscrutable stranger, "can you say anything clever about 'bend-leather'?" [Clerk was Scott's friend.]—HUTTON'S LIFE OF SCOTT, ch. 6.

1174. CONVERSATION vs. Talk. Samuel Johnson. Though his usual phrase for conversation was talk, yet he made a distinction; for when he once told me that he dined the day before at a friend's house, with "a very pretty company," and I asked him if there was good conversation, he answered, "No, sir; we had talk enough, but no conversation; there was nothing discussed."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 488.

1175. CONVERSION, Clear. John Bunyan. "One day," he says, "as I was travelling into the country, musing on the wickedness of my heart, and considering the enmity that was in me to God, the Scripture came into my mind, 'He hath made peace through the blood of His cross.' I saw that the justice of God and my sinful soul could embrace and kiss each other. I was ready to swoon, not with grief and trouble, but with solid joy and peace." Everything became clear: the Gospel history, the birth, the life, the death of the Saviour; how gently He gave Himself to be nailed on the cross for his (Bunyan's) sake, "I saw Him in the spirit," he goes on, "a man on the right hand of the Father, pleading for me, and have seen the manner of His coming from heaven to judge the world with glory."—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 3.

1176. CONVERSION demanded. Peruvians. The Emperor Attabalipa, at the approach of the Spaniards, had drawn up his army near the city of Quito. Pizarro began with offering terms of friendship, which being disregarded, he prepared himself for a hostile assault. A monk advanced in the front of the army, holding in his hand a Bible, and told the inca Attabalipa, by means of an interpreter, that it was absolutely necessary for his salvation that he should believe all that was contained in that book. He then proceeded to set forth the doctrine of the creation, the fall of Adam, the incarnation of our Saviour, the redemption of man, the power of the apostles, and the transmission of their authority by succession to the Pope of Rome, concluding with the donation made by this Pope to Ferdinand and Isabella, the predecessors of the Emperor Charles V., of all the regions in the New World. In consequence of this clear deduction, he ordered the inca immediately to embrace the Christian faith and acknowledge the pope's supremacy. . . . The terrors of a cruel death prevailed on Attabalipa to receive the sacrament of baptism; and immediately thereafter he was strangled at a stake. The same punishment was inflicted on several of the Peruvian chiefs, who, from a principle of generous magnanimity, chose rather to suffer death than disclose the treasures of the empire to its inhuman and insatiable invaders.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 21.

1177. CONVERSION, Intellectual. Constantine. The sublime theory of the gospel had made a much fainter impression on the heart than on the understanding of Constantine himself. He pursued the great object of his ambition through the dark and bloody paths of war and policy; and after the victory he abandoned himself, without moderation, to the abuse of his fortune. . . . As he gradually advanced in the knowledge of truth, he proportionally declined in the practice of virtue; and the same year of his reign in which he convened the council of Nice was polluted by the execution, or rather murder, of his eldest son.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 20.

1178. CONVERSION, Peculiar. Martin Luther. In the year 1510 an Augustinian monk walked, with desolate heart, the streets of Rome, and, turning away from the pomp of her churches and the corruptions of the Vatican, sought relief to his awakened soul by ascending, on his knees, with peasants and beggars, the staircase of Pilate, which was supposed to have been trodden by Christ at His trial, and is now enclosed near the Lateran Palace. While pausing on the successive steps to weep and pray, a voice from heaven seemed to cry within him, "The just shall live by faith." It was the voice of apostolical Christianity, and the announcement of the Reformation. He fled from the superstitious scene.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 19.

1179. CONVERSION, Remarkable. Henry Dorsey Gough. He was a young man of great wealth, residing at Perry Hall, about twelve miles from Baltimore, in one of the most spacious and elegant residences in America at that time. . . . His wife had been deeply impressed by the Methodist preaching, but he forbade her to hear them again. While revelling with wine and gay companions, one evening it was proposed that they should divert themselves by going together to a Methodist assembly. Asbury was the preacher, and no godless diversion could be found in his presence. "What nonsense," exclaimed one of the convivialists, as they returned—"what nonsense have we heard to-night?" "No," exclaimed Gough, startling them with sudden surprise—"no; what we have heard is the truth, the truth as it is in Jesus." "I will never hinder you again from hearing the Methodists," he said as he entered his house and met his wife. The impression of the sermon was so profound that he could no longer enjoy his accustomed pleasures. He became deeply serious, and at last melancholy, "and was near destroying himself," under the awakened sense of his misspent life. . . . [His converted slaves were happier than he, with all his luxuries.] He went to his chamber, leaving a large company of friends at his table; there he threw himself upon his knees and implored the mercy of God, until he received conscious pardon and peace. In a transport of joy he went to his company, exclaiming, "I have found the Methodist's blessing—I have found the Methodist's God!"—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 1, p. 287.

1180. ——. John Bunyan. Bunyan had been bred a tinker, and had served as a private soldier in the Parliamentary army. Early in his life he had been fearfully tortured by remorse for his youthful sins, the worst of which seem, however, to have been such as the world thinks venial. His keen sensibility and his powerful imagination made his internal conflicts singularly terrible. He fancied that he was under sentence of reprobation, that he had committed blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, that he had sold Christ, that he was actually possessed by a demon. Sometimes loud voices from heaven cried out to warn him. Sometimes fiends whispered impious suggestions in his ear. He saw visions of distant mountain-tops, on which the sun shone brightly, but from which he was separated by a waste of snow. He felt the devil behind him pulling his clothes. He thought that the brand of Cain had been set upon him. He feared that he was about to burst asunder like Judas. His mental agony disordered his health. One day he shook like a man in the palsy. On another day he felt a fire within his breast. It is difficult to understand how he survived sufferings so intense and so long continued. At length the clouds broke. From the depths of despair the penitent passed to a state of serene felicity. An irresistible impulse now urged him to impart to others the blessings of which he was himself possessed. He joined the Baptists.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7.

1181. ——. Adam Clark. When he was a young man a preacher asked him, "Do you think that God, for Christ's sake, has forgiven your sins?" "No, sir; I have no evidence of this," the youth replied. He was directed to pray for it, and the passing word was "like a nail in a sure place." He accompanied his mother to a class meeting, and soon was fervently seeking the spiritual life of which he heard its simple members speak. He sought it through much mental anguish. . . . One morning, in deep distress, he went out to his work in the fields; he began, but could not proceed. He fell on his knees on the earth, and prayed, but seemed to be without ability to utter even a broken supplication. . . . His physical strength seems to have departed from him. He again endeavored to pray . . . but the thickest darkness settled on his soul. He fell flat on his face, and tried to pray. His agonies were indescribable. He says he seemed forever separated from God. Death . . . [would have been welcome, if it had brought an end to his painful feelings]. No fear of hell produced these terrible conflicts. . . . Where to go, what to do, and what to say he knew not; even the words of prayer at last failed. . . . He experienced a sense of the displeasure of a holy God for having sinned against Him. . . . Passing through this agony, he felt strongly in his soul, "Pray to Christ;" . . . he looked up confidently to the Saviour of sinners, his agony subsided, his soul became calm. He examined his conscience, and found it no longer a register of sins against God. He searched for his distress, but could not find it. . . . A change had taken place within him for which he had no name. He sat down upon the ridge where he had been working, filled with ineffable delight. He felt a sudden transition from darkness to light. He was like a person who had entered a new world. . . . He could draw nigh to God with more confidence than he ever could to his earthly father. [Thus did this moral young man begin that Christian life which adorned and sanctified the eminent scholarship of his riper years.]—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 2, p. 286.

1182. CONVERSION, Results of. Constantine. The public establishment of Christianity may be considered as one of those important and domestic revolutions which excite the most lively curiosity, and afford the most valuable instruction. The victories and the civil policy of Constantine no longer influence the state of Europe; but a considerable portion of the globe still retains the impression which it received from the conversion of that monarch; and the ecclesiastical institutions of his reign are still connected, by an indissoluble chain, with the opinions, the passions, and the interests of the present generation.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 20.

1183. CONVERSION, Sudden. Among Ulster Mountains. "Are there any drunkards here?" cried a Methodist itinerant, as he preached amid a mongrel multitude [in the open air]. "Yes, I am one," replied a sobbing Irishman, who, returning intoxicated toward his home, had stepped aside to the assembly, supposing it was witnessing a cockfight; and from that day he was not only reclaimed from his long-confirmed vice, but became a genuine Christian.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 284.

1184. CONVERSIONS, Slow. Mahomet. Three years were silently employed in the conversion of fourteen proselytes, the first-fruits of his mission; but in the fourth year he assumed the prophetic office, and resolving to impart to his family the light of divine truth, he prepared a banquet—a lamb, as it is said—and a bowl of milk, for the entertainment of forty guests of the race of Hashem. "Friends and kinsmen," said Mahomet to the assembly, "I offer you, and I alone can offer, the most precious of gifts—the treasures of this world and of the world to come. God has commanded me to call you to His service. Who among you will support my burden? Who among you will be my companion and my vizier?" No answer was returned, till the silence of astonishment and doubt and contempt was at length broken by the impatient courage of Ali, a youth in the fourteenth year of his age. "O prophet, I am the man; whosoever rises against thee I will dash out his teeth, tear out his eyes, break his legs, rip up his belly. O prophet, I will be thy vizier over them." Mahomet accepted his offer with transport.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50.

1185. CONVERSIONS by the Sword. Charlemagne. Charlemagne traversed the entire territory [of the Saxons] to its western extremity, receiving the submission of the inhabitants, and causing them to be baptized by thousands by the army of priests who accompanied his march. But these conversions, as one of the chroniclers observes, being made at the point of the sword, were of necessity insincere.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 5, § 5, p. 65.

1186. CONVERT, A renegade. Lord Sunderland. Sunderland [prime minister of James II.], less scrupulous and less sensible of shame, resolved to atone for his late moderation, and to recover the royal confidence by an act which, to a mind impressed with the importance of religious truth, must have appeared to be one of the most flagitious of crimes, and which even men of the world regard as the last excess of baseness. . . . The renegade protested that he had been long convinced of the impossibility of finding salvation out of the communion of Rome, and that his conscience would not let him rest till he had renounced the heresies in which he had been brought up. The news spread fast. At all the coffee-houses it was told how the prime-minister of England, his feet bare, and a taper in his hand, had repaired to the royal chapel and knocked humbly for admittance; how a priestly voice from within had demanded who was there; how Sunderland had made answer that a poor sinner who had long wandered from the true Church implored her to receive and to absolve him; how the doors were opened; and how the neophyte partook of the holy mysteries.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8.

1187. CONVICTION, Popular. Joan of Arc. Her sanctity seized the hearts of the people. In a moment all were for her. Women, ladies, citizens' wives, all flocked to see her at the house where she was staying, with the wife of an advocate to the parliament, and all returned full of emotion. Men went there too; and counsellors, advocates, old hardened judges, who had suffered themselves to be taken thither incredulously, when they had heard her wept even as the women did, and said, "The maid is of God."—MICHAEL'S JOAN OF ARC., p. 10.

1188. CONVICTION, Prayer for. George Müller. When conversing with two university friends—formerly his companions in worldly pleasures and amusements—he told them how happy he was, and urged them also to seek the Lord. To this, however, they replied, "We do not feel that we are sinners," upon which he knelt down in their presence, asking God to convince them of their lost condition by nature, and afterward went into his bedroom, where he continued to pray for them. Upon returning to his sitting-room he found the two young men in tears; for God, by His Spirit, in answer to prayer, had convinced them both of sin. From that time a work of grace commenced in their hearts, and they became devoted servants of the Lord Jesus.—LIFE OF MÜLLER, p. 13.

1189. CONVICTION of Sin. Rev. John Nelson. [John Nelson, who became one of Wesley's most successful preachers, was a man of good morals from his youth. His mind became deeply agitated on religious subjects. He went to the Established Church and to dissenters' meetings, visiting chapel after chapel, but found no relief.] He became morbidly despondent; he slept little, and often awoke from terrible dreams, dripping with sweat, and shivering with terror. [He went to hear Wesley preach.] "My heart," he says, "beat like the pendulum of a clock, and when he spoke I thought his whole discourse was aimed at me." "This man," he said to himself, "can tell the secrets of my breast; he has shown me the remedy for my wretchedness, even the blood of Christ." [He soon found the peace he had been seeking.]—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 177.

1190. CONVICTIONS maintained. Massachusetts Colony. The colony had been much vexed by the efforts of the [London] managers to thrust on them a minister of the Established Church. Was it not to avoid this very thing that they had come to the wilds of the New World? Should the tyranny of the prelates follow them even across the sea and into the wilderness? There was dissension and strife for awhile; the English managers withheld support; oppression was resorted to; the stores intended for the colonists were sold to them at three prices; and they were obliged to borrow money at sixty per cent. But no exactions could break the spirit of the Pilgrims; and the conflict ended with the purchase of whatever rights the London proprietors had in the colony.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 13.

1191. CONVICTIONS, Realistic. John Bunyan. More than ever he was convinced that he was possessed by the devil. He "compared himself to a child carried off by a gypsy." "Kick sometimes I did," he says, "and scream and cry, but yet I was as bound in the wings of temptation, and the wind would bear me away." "I blessed the dog and toad, and counted the condition of everything that God had made far better than this dreadful state of mine. The dog or horse had no soul to perish under the everlasting weight of hell for sin, as mine was like to do."—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 3.

1192. CONVICTIONS, Strong. John Bunyan. To Bunyan the future life of Christianity was a reality as certain as the next day's sunrise; and he could have been happy on bread and water if he could have felt himself prepared to enter it. Every created being seemed better off than he was. He was sorry that God had made him a man. He "blessed the condition of the birds, beasts, and fishes, for they had not a sinful nature. They were not obnoxious to the wrath of God; they were not to go to hell-fire after death." He recalled the texts which spoke of Christ and forgiveness. He tried to persuade himself that Christ cared for him. He could have talked of Christ's love and mercy "even to the very crows which sat on the ploughed land before him." But he was too sincere to satisfy himself with formulas and phrases. He could not, he would not, profess to be convinced that things would go well with him when he was not convinced.—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 3.

1193. ———. Conversion. [Benjamin Abbott relates the following incident:] A Quaker woman went from [his] preaching under strong conviction and such anguish of mind that she paid no attention to her family, not even to her suckling child. Early in the morning I was sent for; when I arrived she was sitting with both hands clenched fast in the hair of her head, crying out, "Lord, have mercy on me! Save, Lord, or I perish!" I told her to pray in faith; to look to Jesus, and lay hold on the promises, and God would have mercy on her; but she said, "I cannot pray." I said, "You do pray very well; go on." I then kneeled down and prayed; three pious women who were present did likewise. . . . The distressed woman appeared to be worse, like one going distracted. I then sang. When the last words were sung . . . I kneeled down; in a few minutes she clapped her hands together and cried, "My Lord, my God, my Father!" Her soul was immediately set at liberty, and she sprang up rejoicing and giving glory to God.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 1, p. 257.

1194. CO-OPERATION, Impossible. James II. [The Dutch ambassador to London,] Dykvelt, reported that James was bitterly mortified by the conduct of the prince and princess [William of Orange and Mary his wife, the daughter of James]. "My nephew's duty," said the king, "is to strengthen my hands; but he has always taken a pleasure in crossing me." Dykvelt answered that in matters of private concern his Highness had shown, and was ready to show, the greatest deference to the king's wishes; but that it was scarcely reasonable to expect the aid of a Protestant prince against the Protestant religion.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 226.

1195. CO-OPERATION in Manufactures, Seventeenth Century. There is the remnant of an old system of co-operative industry in the "tributer" system of their [the Cornish tanners'] mining labor, which assigns each man a reward different from the ordinary system of wages. The Cornish fisheries were conducted on the same principle, which has probably prevailed from very remote times. The same system of co-operation prevailed in one of the industries of Somersetshire—the cheese-making of Cheddar—for which Fuller has the characteristic name of "Join-dairies." All the cowkeepers united in manuring the common upon which the cows fed. Every one brought his milk to a common room, where the quantity was measured and recorded. The making of a great cheese went duly forward; and when the milk of a poor man who kept but one cow was sufficient for one cheese, he received his cheese. The rich owner of many cows had his return earlier, but the poor man was sure of his just share.—Knight's Eng., vol. 5, ch. 1, p. 14.

1196. CORONATION ceremony. Franks. The kings of the Franks had hitherto been inaugurated by a ceremony peculiar to the Gothic nation. Seated on a shield, they were carried through the ranks, and received the homage of the army. Pepin, aware of the violence he had done to human institutions, was anxious to impress the belief that his right to the crown was of heavenly origin. He adopted from Scripture the ceremony of consecration by holy oil, and was anointed by the hands of Boniface, Archbishop of Mentz; and this ceremony became ever after an established usage in the coronation of Christian princes.—Tytler's Hist., Book 6, ch. 2.

1197. CORONATION a personal Act. At Notre Dame. [The Senate had chosen and proclaimed him emperor. The pope was brought from Italy to consecrate the ceremony of coronation.] The pope anointed the emperor, blessed the sword and sceptre, and as he approached to take up the crown, Napoleon firmly and with dignity took it in his own hand and placed it himself upon his head. This characteristic act produced an indescribable effect upon the assembly.—Abbott's Napoleon B., vol. 1, ch. 28.

1198. CORPULENCE, Distinguished. Louis VI. Louis VI., surnamed Le Gros from his corpulency, was unquestionably one of the ablest and best sovereigns who have filled the throne of France.—Students' France, ch. 7, § 21, p. 126.

1199. CORPULENCE, Inactive. Charles the Fat. Emperor Charles the Fat, youngest son of Louis the German . . . was utterly unworthy of the lofty position to which fortune had raised him. He was devoid both of military and political talent; his corpulence rendered him inactive; he was cruel, treacherous, cowardly.—Students' France, ch. 6, § 7, p. 92.

1200. CORRESPONDENT, Burdensome. Cromwell. [One of his daughters married Ireton.] She was called Bridget. Her enlightened intellect and fervent piety made her the habitual confidante of all her father's religious feelings. We may trace in some scraps of his letters to this young female the constant preoccupation of his mind. "I do not write to your husband, because he replies by a thousand letters to every one that I address to him. This makes him sit up too late; besides, I have many other things to attend to at present."—Lamartine's Cromwell, p. 34.

1201. CORRUPTION, Audacious. Catiline. Catiline, being prosecuted for some great offence, corrupted the judges. When they had given their verdict, though he was acquitted only by a majority of two, he said he had put himself to a needless expense in bribing one of those judges, for it would have been sufficient to have had a majority of one.—Plutarch's Cicero.

1202. CORRUPTION denied. Pelagians. In the fifth century arose the Pelagian heresy. The authors of it were Pelagius and Cælestius, the former a native of Britain, the latter of Ireland. These men looked upon the doctrines commonly received concerning the original corruption of human nature, and the necessity of divine grace to enlighten the understanding and purify the heart, as prejudicial to the progress both of religion and virtue, and tending to lull mankind into a presumptuous and fatal security. They maintained that these doctrines were equally false and pernicious; that the sins of our first parents were imputed to them alone, and not to their posterity; that we derive no corruption from their fall, but are born as pure and unspotted as Adam came from the hands of his Maker . . . that mankind are capable of arriving at the highest degree of piety and virtue, by the use of their own natural faculties and powers.—Tytler's Hist., Book 6, ch. 3.

1203. CORRUPTION, Ecclesiastical. Papal Throne. Amid these contentions of parties it became a usual practice to adjust the difference by setting the popedom up to public sale, and disposing of it to the highest bidder; and bishopric and inferior benefices were filled in the same manner. Benedict VIII. and John XIX., two brothers, publicly bought the popedom one after another, and on the death of the latter it was purchased in a similar manner for a child of ten years of age, Benedict IX.—Tytler's Hist., Book 6, ch. 4.

1204. ———. Twelfth Century. Corrupt as the Church of Rome was, there is reason to believe that if the church had been overthrown in the twelfth or even in the fourteenth century, the vacant space would have been occupied by some system more corrupt still. There was then, through the greater part of Europe, very little knowledge, and that little was confined to the clergy. Not one man in five hundred could have spelled his way through a psalm. Books were few and costly. The art of printing was unknown. Copies of the Bible, inferior in beauty and clearness to those which every cottager may now command, sold for prices which many priests could not afford to give. It was obviously impossible that the laity should search the Scriptures for themselves. It is probable, therefore, that, as soon as they had put off one spiritual yoke, they would have put on another.—Macaulay's Eng., ch. 1, p. 42.

1205. CORRUPTION, Governmental. Roman. [In 399 the ambitious eunuch Eutropius was made consul.] Claudian . . . says this infamous broker of the empire appreciates and divides the Roman provinces from Mount Hæmus to the Tigris. One man, at the expense of his villa, is made proconsul of Asia; a second purchases Syria with his wife's jewels; and a third laments that he has exchanged his paternal estate for the government of Bithynia. In the antechamber of Eutropius a large tablet is exposed to public view, which marks the respective prices of the provinces. The different value of Pontus, of Galatia, of Lydia, is accurately distinguished. Lycia may be obtained for so many thousand pieces of gold; but the opulence of Phrygia will require a more considerable sum. The eunuch wishes to obliterate, by the general disgrace, his personal ignominy; and as he has been sold himself, he is desirous of selling the rest of mankind. In the eager contention, the balance, which contains the fate and fortunes of the province, often trembles on the beam; and till one of the scales is inclined by a superior weight, the mind of the impartial judge remains in anxious suspense.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 32.

1206. ——. English. [In 1616] Sir Fulk Greville paid £4000 for the chancellorship of the Exchequer. Inferior places went to the highest bidder.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 23, p. 364.

1207. ——. By Ministry. The borough of Hull, in the reign of Charles II., chose as member of Parliament Andrew Marvell, a gentleman of little or no fortune, and maintained him in London for the service of the public. With a view to bribe him, his old school-fellow, the Lord Treasurer Danby, went to him in his garret. At parting, the Lord Treasurer slipped into his hands an order upon the Treasury for £1000, and then went into his chariot. Marvell looked at the paper, and called after the Treasurer, "My Lord, I request another moment." They went up again to the garret, and Jack, the servant boy, was called. "Jack, what had I for dinner yesterday?" "Don't you remember, sir, you had the little shoulder of mutton that you asked me to bring from a woman in the market?" "Very right. What have I for dinner to-day?" "Don't you know, sir, that you made me lay up the bladebone to broil?" "Tis so; very right. Go away. My lord, do you hear that? Andrew Marvell's dinner is provided; there's your piece of paper, I want it not. I knew the sort of kindness you intended. I live here to serve my constituents. The Ministry may seek men for their purpose; I am not one."

1208. CORRUPTION, Judicial. Romans. As it was reasonably apprehended that the integrity of the judge might be biassed if his interest was concerned or his affections were engaged, the strictest regulations were established to exclude any person, without the special dispensation of the emperor, from the government of the province where he was born; and to prohibit the governor or his son from contracting marriage with a native or an inhabitant; or from purchasing slaves, lands, or houses within the extent of his jurisdiction. Notwithstanding these rigorous precautions, the Emperor Constantine, after a reign of twenty-five years, still deploras the venal and oppressive administration of justice, and expresses the warmest indignation that the audience of the judge, his despatch of business, his seasonable delays, and his final sentence were publicly sold, either by himself or by the officers of his court. The continuance, and perhaps the impunity, of these crimes is attested by the repetition of impotent laws and ineffectual menaces.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 17.

1209. CORRUPTION, Official. Romans. The [captive Goths] barbarians, who considered their arms as the ensigns of honor and the pledges of safety, were disposed to offer a price, which the lust or avarice of the Imperial officers was easily tempted to accept. To preserve their arms, the haughty warriors consented, with some reluctance, to prostitute their wives or their daughters; the charms of a beauteous maid or a comely boy secured the connivance of the inspectors, who sometimes cast an eye of covetousness on the fringed carpets and linen garments of their new allies, or who sacrificed their duty to the mean consideration of filling their farms with cattle and their houses with slaves. The Goths, with arms in their hands, were permitted to enter the boats; and when their strength was collected on the other side of the river, the immense camp which was spread over the plains and the hills of the Lower Mæsia assumed a threatening and even hostile aspect.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26.

1210. ——. Senator Verres. Verres held his province for three years. He was supreme judge in all civil and criminal cases. He negotiated with the parties to every suit which was brought before him, and then sold his decisions. He confiscated estates on fictitious accusations. The island was rich in works of art. Verres had a taste for such things, and seized without scruple the finest productions of Praxiteles or Zeuxis. If those who were wronged dared to complain, they were sent to forced labor at the quarries, or, as dead men tell no tales, were put out of the world. He had an understanding with the pirates, which throws light upon the secret of their impunity. A shipful of them were brought into Messina as prisoners, and were sentenced to be executed. A handsome bribe was paid to Verres, and a number of Sicilians whom he wished out of the way were brought out, veiled, and gagged that they might not be recognized, and were banded as the pirates' substitutes. By these methods Verres was accused of having gathered out of Sicily three quarters of a million of our money. Two thirds he calculated on having to spend in corrupting the consuls and the court before which he might be prosecuted.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 9.

1211. CORRUPTION, Political. Romans. [Cæsar and Pompey tried to ruin each other.] And all ranks of men were so corrupted that tables were publicly set out, upon which the candidates for offices were professedly ready to pay the people the price of their votes; and the people came not only to give their voices for the man who had bought them, but with all manner of offensive weapons to fight for him. Hence it often happened that they did not part without polluting the tribunal with blood and murder, and the city was a perpetual scene of anarchy. In this dismal situation of things, in these storms of epidemic madness, wise men thought it would be happy if they ended in nothing worse than monarchy. Nay, there were many who scrupled not to declare publicly that monarchy was the only cure for the desperate disorders of the State, and that the physician ought to be pitched upon who would apply that remedy with the gentlest hand; by which they hinted at Pompey. —PLUTARCH'S CÆSAR.

1212. ——. England. The machinery of both sides [Whig and Tory] was unlimited bribery. The degradation of the briber was as great as that of the bribed. Berkeley writes in 1721: "This corruption has become a national crime, having infected the lowest as well as the highest among us." —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 4, p. 56.

1213. CORRUPTION, Shameful. Francis Bacon. He was charged by the Commons, before the Lords, with twenty-two acts of bribery and corruption. He attempted no defence. He made a distinct confession in writing of the charges brought against him. And when a deputation of peers asked if that confession was his own voluntary act, he replied: "It is my act, my hand, my heart. O my Lords, spare a broken reed." . . . He was fined £40,000 and sentenced to imprisonment in the Tower during the king's pleasure. —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 24, p. 380.

1214. CORRUPTION of Statesmen. English. [In 1695 the Houses of Parliament disclosed] the frightful corruption by which statesmen in power and statesmen in opposition were moved to support, or to resist, some measure in which large pecuniary interests were involved; or to screen some public delinquent. Guy, a member of Parliament and Secretary of the Treasury, was sent to the Tower for receiving a bribe in connection with some inquiries into the conduct of a colonel of a regiment, who had appropriated the money with which he ought to have paid the quarters of his troops. Trevor, the Speaker of the House of Commons, was proved to have received a bribe of 1000 guineas from the corporation of London, for assisting in passing an act for the relief of the orphans and other creditors of the city of London. He had to put the question from the chair, whether he himself was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor; and had to say "The ayes have it." He was expelled the house. The East India Company had spent £107,000 in secret service money. . . . Sir Thomas Cook, the chairman of the company, had the management of these delicate matters. . . . In his place in Parliament he refused to answer inquiries. The Commons then passed a bill compelling him to answer, under enormous penalties. Upon the bill going to the Upper House, the Duke of Leeds spoke strongly against the bill, and, laying his hand on his breast, protested that he was entirely disinterested in the matter. The inquiries went on, implicating others; and the Commons finally impeached Thomas, Duke of Leeds, President of the Council, for that he did agree with the merchants trading to the East Indies, for 500 guineas, to procure their charter of confirmation. The king's [William III.] personal friend, Portland, was found to have been proof against these temptations, having refused a bribe of £50,000. —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 12, p. 177.

1215. CORRUPTION, Unabashed. James II. [Sunderland was his prime-minister.] What sums he made by selling places, titles, and pardons can only be conjectured, but must have been enormous. James seemed to take a pleasure in loading with wealth one whom he regarded as his own convert [to Romanism]. All fines, all forfeitures, went to Sunderland. On every grant toll was paid to him. If any suitor ventured to ask any favor directly from the king, the answer was, "Have you spoken to my Lord President?" One bold man ventured to say that the Lord President got all the money of the court. "Well," replied his Majesty, "he deserves it all." We shall scarcely overrate the amount of the minister's gains if we put them at £30,000 a year; and it must be remembered that fortunes of £30,000 a year were in his time rarer than fortunes of £100,000 a year now are. —MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 409.

1216. CORRUPTION, Universal. Reign of James I. [The reign of James I. was exceedingly corrupt.] It was an age of universal abuses. Local magistrates were influenced by the pettiest gifts, and were called "basket-justices." . . . Upon the highest branch of this rotten tree sat Francis Bacon, Viscount St. Albans, the great Lord Chancellor. . . . He was charged by the Commons, before the Lords, with twenty-two acts of bribery and corruption. He attempted no defence. . . . He made a distinct confession in writing. [A.D. 1621.] —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 24, p. 380.

1217. CORRUPTION unrestrainable. By Law. [In 1275 Parliament enacted] that no king's officer should take any reward to do his office, such enactment being one of the many proofs of the inefficiency of law to restrain corruption; for within fourteen years there were only two judges out of fifteen who were not found guilty of the grossest extortions. —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 25, p. 385.

1218. COSMOS, Philosophy of the. Descartes. He sets out upon this principle, that in order to form the universe, nothing else was requisite but matter and motion; that extension is the essence of all bodies, and space being extended as well as matter, there is no difference between space and matter, consequently there is no void or vacuum in nature. He divides this homogeneous mass of space and matter into angular parts of a cubical form, leaving no interstices between them. "To these cubes," says he, "the Author of Nature gave a rotatory motion round their axes, and likewise an impulse forward, which drives them round the sun as a centre." From the attrition of the parts in this rotation he supposes the planets to be formed. This strange romance . . . seemed to explain several of the phenomena of nature. —TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 36.

1219. COUNSEL of the Dying. Louis XIV. Louis did not long survive the pacification of his empire. He died on the 1st of September, 1715, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. . . . The last words which he uttered, as reported by Madame Maintenon, who heard them, were the dictates equally of a wise and a magnanimous spirit; he called to him his grandson the dauphin, who stood by his bedside, and holding him between his arms gave him his blessing, and said to him, "My son, you are going to be a great king; be always a good Christian. Do not follow my example with regard to war; endeavor to live in peace with your neighbors. Render to God what you owe to Him; follow always the most moderate counsels; endeavor to reduce the taxes, and thus do that which I have, unhappily, not been able to do. Take notice, my son; these are my last words, and let them sink deep into your mind—remember that kings die like other men.”—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 34.

1220. COUNSEL, Inopportune. Deputies of Naples. As soon as the place was invested by sea and land, Belisarius gave audience to the deputies of the people, who exhorted him to disregard a conquest unworthy of his arms, to seek the Gothic king in a field of battle, and, after his victory, to claim, as the sovereign of Rome, the allegiance of the dependent cities. “When I treat with my enemies,” replied the Roman chief, with a haughty smile, “I am more accustomed to give than to receive counsel; but I hold in one hand inevitable ruin, and in the other peace and freedom, such as Sicily now enjoys.”—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41.

1221. COUNSEL, Safety in. Battle. [When the forces of William III. obtained their crowning victory over those of James II. at Aghrim, the army of the latter was commanded by the Marquis St. Ruth, a French general.] St. Ruth had made able dispositions for the battle, but, jealous of the Irish generals, had kept his plans to himself, and when he was killed by a cannon shot early in the action, there was no one to succeed him. The English troops, in spite of the well-chosen position of their opponents, totally routed James' army.—AM. CYCLOPEDIA, “AGHRIM.”

1222. COUNSELLOR, An evil. Robert Ferguson. [An exile from England and promoter of the rebellion against James II.] Ferguson, who, ever since the death of Charles, had been Monmouth's evil angel, had a suggestion ready. The duke had put himself into a false position by declining the royal title. Had he declared himself sovereign of England, his cause would have worn a show of legality. At present it was impossible to reconcile his Declaration with the principles of the Constitution. It was clear that either Monmouth or his uncle was rightful king. Monmouth did not venture to pronounce himself the rightful king, and yet denied that his uncle was so. Those who fought for James fought for the only person who ventured to claim the throne, and were, therefore, clearly in their duty according to the laws of the realm. Those who fought for Monmouth fought for some unknown polity, which was to be set up by a convention not yet in existence. . . . On the morning of the 20th of June he was proclaimed in the market-place of Taunton. His followers repeated his new title with affectionate delight; but, as some confusion might have arisen if he had been called King James II., they commonly used the strange appellation of King Monmouth.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 544.

1223. COUNSELLORS, Dangerous. Of James II. But there was at the court a small knot of Roman Catholics whose hearts had been ulcerated by old injuries, whose heads had been turned by recent elevation, who were impatient to climb to the highest honors of the State, and who, having little to lose, were not troubled by thoughts of the day of reckoning. One of these was Roger Palmer, Earl of Castlemaine in Ireland, and husband of the Duchess of Cleveland.

His title had notoriously been purchased by his wife's dishonor and his own. His fortune was small. His temper, naturally ungentle, had been exasperated by his domestic vexations, by the public reproaches, and by what he had undergone in the days of the Popish Plot. . . . These men called with one voice for war on the constitution of the Church and the State. They told their master that he owed it to his religion and to the dignity of his crown to stand firm against the outcry of heretical demagogues, and to let the Parliament see from the first that he would be master in spite of opposition, and that the only effect of opposition would be to make him a hard master.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 43.

1224. COUNSELLORS, Whimsical. “Wise Woman.” The Germans advanced to within a few miles of the Roman outposts. The Romans lay intrenched near Cernay. The Germans were at Colmar. Cæsar offered battle, which Ariovistus declined. Cavalry fights happened daily which led to nothing. Cæsar then formed a second camp, smaller but strongly fortified, within sight of the enemy, and threw two legions into it. Ariovistus attacked them, but he was beaten back with loss. The “wise women” advised him to try no more till the new moon. But Cæsar would not wait for the moon, and forced an engagement. The wives and daughters of the Germans rushed about their camp, with streaming hair, adjuring their countrymen to save them from slavery. The Germans fought like heroes, but they could not stand against the short sword and hand-to-hand grapple of the legionaries. Better arms and better discipline again asserted the superiority. . . . A few swam the river; a few, Ariovistus among them, escaped in boats; all the rest, men and women alike, were cut down and killed.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 14.

1225. COUNTERFEIT, Preserved by. Reign of Numa. [There was at Rome] a sacred buckler, or ancile, which was said to have dropped from heaven, which gave occasion to the foundation of a new college of priests, who had the charge of it, and paraded with it, on particular occasions, in a kind of dance or procession. These were called Salii (a saliendo); and, lest the sacred buckler should be stolen or lost, eleven others were made exactly resembling it, and deposited in the temple of Jupiter.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 1, p. 293.

1226. COUNTERFEIT Relics. General Grant. [When in Egypt, at the village of Luxor of the upper Nile,] they were shown a house where an American lived for fifteen years, making . . . mummy-lids, hieroglyphic inscriptions, idols and relics of all kinds to suit the purchaser, which now doubtless adorn many a private collection.—GEN. GRANT'S TRAVELS, p. 137.

1127. COUNTERFEIT signature. Antony. The Consul Antony, by the steps he had hitherto taken, wanted only to sound the dispositions of the people. Finding these to his wish, he very soon began to discover his own views of ambition. He was possessed of the whole of the dictator's papers. He had received likewise from Calpurnia, the widow, all the treasures of Cæsar. Not content with these, he made a traffic of fabricating acts and deeds, to which he counterfeited the dictator's subscription, and availed himself of them as genuine. — TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 2.

1228. COUNTRY, Contemptible. Samuel Johnson. Mr. Ogilvie was unlucky enough to choose for the topic of his conversation the praises of his native country. . . . He observed that Scotland had a great many noble wild prospects. JOHNSON: "I believe, sir, you have a great many. Norway, too, has noble wild prospects; and Lapland is remarkable for prodigious noble wild prospects. But, sir, let me tell you, the noblest prospect which a Scotchman ever sees is the high road that leads him to England!" This unexpected and pointed sally produced a roar of applause. — BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 117.

1229. COUNTRY, A deserted. Rome in Rebellion. When the troops of Maximin, advancing in excellent order, arrived at the foot of the Julian Alps, they were terrified by the silence and desolation that reigned on the frontiers of Italy. The villages and open towns had been abandoned on their approach by the inhabitants, the cattle was driven away, the provisions removed or destroyed, the bridges broken down, nor was anything left which could afford either shelter or subsistence to an invader. Such had been the wise orders of the generals of the Senate, whose design was to protract the war, to ruin the army of Maximin by the slow operation of famine, and to consume his strength in the sieges of the principal cities of Italy, which they had plentifully stored with men and provisions from the deserted country. — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 7.

1230. COUNTRY, Preservation of One's. Solon's Law. The most peculiar and surprising of his other laws is that which declares the man infamous who stands neuter in the time of sedition. It seems he would not have us be indifferent and unaffected with the fate of the public when our own concerns are upon a safe bottom; nor when we are in health be insensible to the distempers and griefs of our country. He would have us espouse the better and juster cause, and hazard everything in defence of it, rather than wait in safety to see which side the victory will incline to. — PLUTARCH.

1231. COUNTRYMEN abused. Reign of Charles II. When the lord of a Lincolnshire or Shropshire manor appeared in Fleet Street, he was as easily distinguished from the resident population as a Turk or a Lascar. His dress, his gait, his accent, the manner in which he stared at the shops, stumbled into the gutters, ran against the porters, and stood under the waterspouts marked him out as an excellent subject for the operations of swindlers and banterers. Bullies jostled him into the kennel. Hackney-coachmen splashed him from head to foot. Thieves explored with perfect security the huge pockets of his horseman's coat, while he stood entranced by the splendor of the lord mayor's show. Money-droppers, sore from the cart's tail, introduced themselves to him, and appeared to him the most honest, friendly gentlemen that he had ever seen. Painted women, the refuse of Lewkner Lane and Whetstone Park, passed themselves on him for courtesans and maids of honor. If he asked his way to St. James', his informants sent him to Mile End.

If he went into a shop, he was instantly discerned to be a fit purchaser of everything that nobody else would buy—of second-hand embroidery, copper rings, and watches that would not go. — MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3.

1232. COURAGE in Battle. Marcus. [When the Romans met the Volscians,] Marcus inquired of Cominius in what manner the enemy's army was drawn up, and where their best troops were posted. Being answered that the Antiates, who were placed in the centre, were supposed to be the bravest and most warlike, "I beg it of you, then," said Marcus, "as a favor, that you will place me directly opposite to them." — PLUTARCH.

1233. COURAGE, Christian. Martyrs. [Dr. Rowland Taylor, the martyr, was told:] "If you will not rise with us now, and receive mercy now offered, you shall have judgment according to your demerit." . . . [He replied:] "So to rise should be the greatest fall that ever I could receive; for I should so fall from my dear Saviour Christ to Antichrist." . . . [Hooper was urged to recant. He replied in these solemn words:] "I have taught the truth with my tongue and with my pen heretofore; and hereafter shall shortly confirm the same, by God's grace, with my blood." [Latimer was urged to submit to the Church, but refused, and before the commissioners the aged man encouraged his younger friend, Ridley, saying:] "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man! We shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England as shall never be put out." [Cranmer was urged to recant. His natural courage was not strong; but he renounced his former recantation, and added:] "Forasmuch as my hand offended in writing contrary to my heart, therefore my hand shall first be punished; for if I may come to the fire, it shall first be burned." At the burning he thrust it into the flames, exclaiming, with a loud voice, "This hand hath offended!" — KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 6.

1234. — — —. John Wesley. [At Sheffield he was contradicted by a blaspheming military officer while preaching.] Stones were thrown, hitting the desk and people. To save them and the house, he gave notice that he would preach out of doors, and look the enemy in the face. He prayed for sinners as servants of their master, the devil, upon which an officer ran at him with great fury, threatening revenge for his abuse, as he called it, of the king, his master. He forced his way through the crowd, drew his sword, and presented it to the breast of the preacher, who threw open his vest, and, fixing his eye on his assailant, calmly said: "I fear God, and honor the king." The captain's countenance fell in a moment; he put up his sword, and quickly retreated from the scene. — STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 190.

1235. COURAGE of Despair. Gladiators. The triumph due to the valor of Probus, the Roman general, was conducted with a magnificence suitable to his fortune, and the people who had so lately admired the trophies of Aurelian gazed with equal pleasure on those of his heroic successor. We cannot, on this occasion, forget the desperate courage of about fourscore gladiators, reserved, with near six hundred others, for the inhuman sports of the amphitheatre. Disdain-ing to shed their blood for the amusement of the populace, they killed their keepers, broke from the place of their confinement, and filled the streets of Rome with blood and confusion. After an obstinate resistance they were overpowered and cut in pieces by the regular forces; but they obtained at least an honorable death, and the satisfaction of a just revenge.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12.

1236. COURAGE or Disgrace. Frederick the Great. [His army was about to attack three times their number of Austrians. He said to his officers:] "The regiment of cavalry which shall not instantly, at the order, charge, shall be dismounted and sent into garrisons; the battalion of infantry that shall but falter in person, and lose its colors and its swords. Now farewell, friends; soon we shall have vanquished, or we shall see each other no more." [A great victory was won at Leuthen.]—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 12.

1237. COURAGE, Intrepid. Prince of Wales. [Margaret of Anjou, wife of the captive king,] prepared to strike a decisive blow for the Crown of England. This was at Tewkesbury, where she commanded her army in person, and led her son, the Prince of Wales, through the ranks. But all was in vain; victory declared in favor of Edward, and the unhappy mother, separated from her son, was sent a prisoner to the Tower of London. The Prince of Wales, a youth of intrepid spirit, being brought into the presence of Edward, and asked, in an insulting manner, how he dared to invade the territories of his sovereign, "I have entered," said he, "the dominions of my father, to revenge his injuries and redress my own." The barbarous Edward is said to have struck him in the face with his gauntlet, while the dukes of Gloucester and Clarence, and others of the attendants, rushed upon the noble youth and stabbed him to the heart with their daggers.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 14.

1238. COURAGE, Loss of. By one Man. The immediate loss of Constantinople may be ascribed to the bullet, or arrow, which pierced the gauntlet of John Justiniani. The sight of his blood, and the exquisite pain, appalled the courage of the chief, whose arms and counsels were the firmest rampart of the city. As he withdrew from his station in quest of a surgeon, his flight was perceived and stopped by the indefatigable emperor. "Your wound," exclaimed Palæologus, "is slight; the danger is pressing; your presence is necessary; and whither will you retire?" "I will retire," said the trembling Genoese, "by the same road which God has opened to the Turks;" and at these words he hastily passed through one of the breaches of the inner wall. By this pusillanimous act he stained the honors of a military life; and the few days which he survived in Galata, or the Isle of Chios, were embittered by his own and the public reproach. His example was imitated by the greatest part of the Latin auxiliaries.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 68.

1239. COURAGE of Madness. Charles XII. [After receiving pacific proposals from the Turks, he rejected them and defied the whole power of the Ottoman Empire.] His own officers employed supplications, remonstrances, and at length menaces, to make him depart from his frantic design. Charles was inflexible. [He had but three hundred men, and was surrounded by Turks.] The attack was begun, and the intrenchments, invested at once on every quarter, were broken in an instant. A small house within the camp became the citadel and last resort of Charles and his intrepid Swedes. Their number was now reduced to a very few, whom personal regard attached to their sovereign. They did not fail, however, to remonstrate with him against the madness of his resolution; and in consulting how to sustain a siege in this last retreat, there was but one man who declared a positive opinion that the place might be defended. This was his Majesty's cook. "Then, sir," says the king, "I name you my chief engineer." They now proceeded to barricade the doors and windows, and kept up an incessant fire from within upon the whole Turkish army. The besiegers, exasperated at length at the numbers killed by this handful of madmen, threw fire upon the roof of the house, which in a moment was all in flames. It was now necessary to quit their post; a desperate sally was made, and this handful of Swedes, armed with their swords and pistols, were cutting their passage through an army of several thousand men, when Charles, entangled with his spurs, and accidentally falling to the ground, was surrounded by a body of janizaries. In short, the whole troop, after making an incredible carnage, were seized and taken prisoners. An attempt of this kind is only to be paralleled in the romances of knight-errantry. This obstinacy and infatuation was the occasion of the loss of Charles' dominions in Germany, and almost of his kingdom of Sweden.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 35.

1240. COURAGE, Masterly. Charles XII. [The Danes and Prussians besieged Stralsund in Pomerania. The Swedes made a brave defence.] An incident is recorded of this siege which strongly marks the character of Charles. The town was bombarded, and a shell penetrated the roof of his house, and fell into the apartment where he was dictating his despatches. The secretary, terrified out of his senses, having let fall his pen—"Go on," said the king, gravely; "what has the bombshell to do with the letter which I am dictating?" The city, however, was taken, and Charles obliged to escape in a small bark to Carlescroon, where he passed the winter.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 35.

1241. COURAGE, Moral. Martin Luther. [He had been summoned to appear before the emperor at Worms.] As he was nearing the city of Worms, his friend Spalatin, who was in the company of the elector, sent him a message warning him not to enter the city and to incur so great danger. Luther replied to him: "To Worms was I called, and to Worms must I go. And were there as many devils there as tiles upon the roofs, yet would I enter into that city."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 9, p. 84.

1242. ———. Rev. Samuel Johnson. [Convicted of disseminating seditious tracts.] Julian Johnson, as he was popularly called, was sentenced to stand three in the pillory, and to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn. The judge, Sir Francis Withins, told the criminal to be thankful for the great lenity of the attorney-general, who might have treated the case as one of high treason. "I owe him no thanks," answered Johnson, dauntlessly. "Am I, whose only crime is that I have defended the Church and the laws, to be grateful for being scourged like a dog, while popish scribblers are suffered daily to insult the Church and to violate the laws with impunity?" The energy with which he spoke was such that both the judges and the Crown lawyers thought it necessary to vindicate themselves, and protested that they knew of no popish publications such as those to which the prisoner alluded. He instantly drew from his pocket some Roman Catholic books and trinkets, which were then freely exposed for sale under the royal patronage, read aloud the titles of the books, and threw a rosary across the table to the king's counsel. "And now," he cried, with a loud voice, "I lay this information before God, before this court, and before the English people. We shall soon see whether Mr. Attorney will do his duty."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6.

1243. ——. Gideon Ouseley. [Gideon Ouseley met with much opposition, and sometimes peril, from the Irish Roman Catholics among whom he labored as an itinerant Methodist. He was an Irishman of great courage and frankness.] In a town filled with Romanists he hired the bellman, as was his custom, to announce through the streets preaching for the evening. The man, afraid of opposition, uttered the announcement timidly and indistinctly. Ouseley, passing in the street, heard him, and taking the bell, rang it himself, proclaiming aloud: "This is to give you notice that Gideon Ouseley, the Irish missionary, is to preach this evening in such a place, and at such an hour. And I am the man myself."—STEVENS' METHODISM.

1244. ——. Raleigh. [When Sir Walter Raleigh came to the scaffold he was very faint, and commenced his speech to the crowd by saying that during the last two days he had been visited by twoague fits.] "If, therefore, you perceive any weakness in me, I beseech you ascribe it to my sickness rather than to myself." He took the axe and kissed the blade, and said to the sheriff, "'Tis a sharp medicine, but a sound cure for all diseases."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 24, p. 376.

1245. ——. Gurdun. [When Richard I. (the Lion) was near his death,] he then ordered Bertram de Gurdun, who had wounded him, to come into his presence, and said to him: "What harm have I done to you, that you have killed me?" On which he made answer: "You slew my father and my two brothers with your own hand, and you intend now to kill me; therefore take any revenge on me that you may think fit, for I will readily endure the greatest torments you can devise, so long as you have met with your end, after having inflicted evils so many and so great upon the world."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 22, p. 330.

1246. COURAGE, Noble. Rumbold. [Under the Duke of Argyll he had attempted to overthrow the rule of James II. in Scotland. The enterprise was disastrous, and Rumbold mortally wounded.] He was hastily tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hanged and quartered within a few hours, near the city cross in the High Street [Edinburgh]. Though unable to stand without the support of two men, he maintained his fortitude to the last, and under the gibbet raised his feeble voice against popery and tyranny with such vehemence that the officers ordered the drums to strike up lest the people should hear him. He was a friend, he said, to limited monarchy; but he never would believe that Providence had sent a few men into the world ready booted and spurred to ride, and millions ready saddled and bridled to be ridden. "I desire," he cried, "to bless and magnify God's holy name for this, that I stand here, not for any wrong that I have done, but for adhering to His cause in an evil day. If every hair of my head were a man, in this quarrel I would venture them all."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 525.

1247. COURAGE, Opportunity for. Frederick the Great. [He addressed his officers before his unequal battle with the Austrians.] A part of Silesia, my capital [Berlin], my stores of war, are lost; my disasters would be extreme had I not a boundless trust in your courage, firmness, and love of country. . . . The moment for courage has come. Listen, then; I am resolved, against all rules of the art of war, to attack the nearly threefold stronger army of Charles of Lorraine, wherever I may find it. There is no question of the number of the enemy, nor of the strength of their position. We must beat them, or all of us find our graves before their batteries. Thus I think, thus I mean to act. . . . Does any one of you fear to share all dangers with me, he can this day retire; I never will reproach him. Then, as the enthusiasm enkindled around him, he added, with a serene smile, "I know that not one of you will leave me."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 4.

1248. COURAGE, Only physical. Marlborough. [The Duchess of Marlborough held the office of lady of the wardrobe to Queen Anne. She was to be removed from her position because of the dislike of the queen. Her husband, "the greatest captain of the age," presented to the queen a humble letter from the duchess, expressing her apprehension that her lord could not live six months if some end was not put to his sufferings on her account. "I am really sorry that I ever did anything that was uneasy to your Majesty." The duke then implored her majesty not to renounce the duchess—not to discharge her from the great office she held. "I cannot change my resolution," said the queen. Again he entreated. "Let the key be sent me within three days." The victor of Blenheim is now on his knees, imploring for a respite of ten days. "Send me the key in two days," cried the inexorable queen. The duchess had more spirit than her lord. When the duke told her the queen expected the gold key, she took it from her side and threw it into the middle of the room, and bid him take it up and carry it to whom he pleased.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 24, p. 265.

1249. COURAGE recovered. Bishop Cranmer. The courage which Cranmer had shown since the accession of Mary gave way the moment his final doom was announced. The moral cowardice which had displayed itself in his miserable compliance with the lust and despotism of Henry displayed itself again in six successive recantations by which he hoped to purchase pardon. But pardon was impossible; and Cranmer's strangely mingled nature found a power in its very weakness when he was brought into the church of St. Mary at Oxford on the 21st of March, to repeat his recantation on the way to the stake. "Now," ended his address to the hushed congregation before him—"now I come to the great thing that troubleth my conscience more than any other thing that ever I said or did in my life, and that is the setting abroad of writings contrary to the truth; which here I now renounce and refuse as things written by my hand contrary to the truth which I thought in my heart, and written for fear of death to save my life, if it might be. And, forasmuch as my hand offended in writing contrary to my heart, my hand therefore shall be the first punished; for if I come to the fire, it shall be the first burned. This was the hand that wrote it," he again exclaimed at the stake, "therefore it shall suffer first punishment;" and holding it steadily in the flame, "he never stirred nor cried" till life was gone.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 687.

1250. COURAGE, Religious. Puritan. Abraham Holmes, a retired officer of the Parliamentary army, and one of those zealots who would own no king but King Jesus, had been taken at Sedgemoor. His arm had been frightfully mangled and shattered in the battle; and, as no surgeon was at hand, the stout old soldier amputated it himself. He was carried up to London and examined by the king in council, but would make no submission. "I am an aged man," he said, "and what remains to me of life is not worth a falsehood or a baseness. I have always been a Republican, and I am so still." He was sent back to the west and hanged. The people remarked with awe and wonder that the beasts which were to drag him to the gallows became restive and went back. Holmes himself doubted not that the Angel of the Lord, as in the old time, stood in the way, sword in hand, invisible to human eyes, but visible to the inferior animals. "Stop, gentlemen," he cried, "let me go on foot. There is more in this than you think. Remember how the ass saw Him whom the prophet could not see." He walked manfully to the gallows.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 600.

1251. COURAGE, Safety in. Bajazet. [Amurath, the famous Ottoman general, held a council of war before battle with the Christians on the plain of Cassova.] In default of artillery to break open these masses, Ainebeg and Saridje Pasha proposed to place in the first lines, before the front of the Ottoman army, the six thousand Asiatic camels that carried the tents, the provisions, and the baggage of their divisions, to the end of exhausting upon these animals the arrows of the enemy, and of striking astonishment and terror into the ranks of the Christians by the aspect and by the moanings of the camels, unknown to the soldiers of Europe. This opinion was prevailing when the impetuous Bajazet, more chivalrous still than princely, opposed it with the disdain of a hero. "Have the sons of Othman," cried Bajazet, "ever feared to meet their enemies face to face? Is it then in sheltering themselves like women behind the baggage, the elephants, or the camels, that they have conquered Asia from multitudes armed against them with all the arts and the appliances of warfare? Are such artifices worthy of the divine cause for which we fight? Is it not an avowal of fear at a moment when the only safety is in courage? Is it not to doubt of God in presence of His profaners? Is not our confidence in Him as our first bulwark our best force? The victory is his who believes himself victor, not his who is in dread of being vanquished." [They obtained a decisive victory.] LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 272.

1252. COURAGE, Unfaltering. Pelopidas. When he had arrived at Pharsalus, he assembled his forces, and then marched directly against Alexander; who, knowing that Pelopidas had but few Thebans about him, and that he himself had double the number of Thessalian infantry, went to meet him as far as the temple of Thetes. When he was informed that the tyrant was advancing toward him with a great army, "So much the better," said he, "for we shall beat so many the more."—PLUTARCH'S PELOPIDAS.

1253. COURAGE, Unshaken. At Tripoli. Decatur conceived the project of running into the harbor with a small vessel, surprising the frigate, and setting her on fire. How neatly this was done, most readers know. The surprise was so complete, that Decatur had possession of the ship in just ten minutes after he had given the order to board. Combustibles were all ready, and were placed in various parts of the vessel. At the signal they were set on fire, and the ship, dry as tinder from many months' exposure to a tropical sun, blazed up with such rapidity that the ketch in which the Americans had boarded her narrowly escaped being involved in the same conflagration. . . . In this affair Lieutenant Lawrence commanded one division of the attacking party, and behaved with admirable coolness and gallantry. Decatur pronounced a fine eulogium upon him when he said, "There is no more dodge about Lawrence than there is about the mainmast."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 123.

1254. COURT, Infamous. Trial of Clodius. [He attempted to corrupt Pompeia, the wife of Cæsar, and was brought to trial.] Marcus Crassus . . . during the night sent for the judges one by one. He gave them money. What else he gave or promised them must continue veiled in Cicero's Latin. Before these influences the resolution of the judges melted away, and when the time came thirty-one out of fifty-six high-born Roman peers and gentlemen declared Clodius innocent. The original cause was nothing. That a profligate young man should escape punishment for a licentious frolic was comparatively of no consequence; but the trial acquired a notoriety of infamy which shook once more the already tottering constitution.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 12.

1255. COURT, A terrible. Star Chamber. The king in his council had always asserted a right in the last resort to enforce justice and peace by dealing with offenders too strong to be dealt with by his ordinary courts. Henry systematized this occasional jurisdiction by appointing, in 1486, a committee of his council as a regular court, to which the place where it usually sat gave the name of the court of star chamber. The king's aim was probably little more than a purpose to enforce order on the land by bringing the great nobles before his own judgment-seat; but the establishment of the court as a regular and no longer an exceptional tribunal, whose traditional powers were confirmed by Parliamentary statute, and where the absence of a jury cancelled the prisoner's right to be tried by his peers, furnished his son with an instrument of tyranny which laid justice at the feet of the monarchy.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 496.

1257. COURTESY denied. James K. Polk. When Mr. Polk closed his service in the [Speaker's] chair, at the end of the Twenty-fifth Congress, no Whig member could be found to move the customary resolution of thanks—an act of courtesy which derives its chief grace by coming from a political opponent. When the resolution was presented by a Democratic Representative from the South, it was opposed in debate by prominent Whig members. . . . The Whigs as a party resisted its adoption. The Democrats could not even bring the House to a vote upon the resolution without the use of the previous question. [He was accused of partiality, injustice, and narrowness.]—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 59.

1258. COURTESY forfeited. Cromwell. [He swept over the country like a tempest.] He threw himself before Winchester. The last-named place surrendered by capitulation. While here he very courteously sent in to the Bishop of Winchester, and offered him a guard to secure his person; but the bishop, flying into the castle, refused his courtesy. Afterward, when the castle began to be battered by two pieces of ordnance, he sent to the lieutenant-general, thanking him for the great favor offered to him, and being now more sensible what it was, he desired the enjoyment of it. To whom the wise lieutenant-general replied, that since he made not use of the courtesy, but wilfully ran away from it, he must now partake of the same conditions as the others who were with him in the castle; and if he were taken, he must expect to be used as a prisoner of war.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 10, p. 188.

1259. COURTESY, Marked. English. Courtesy to strangers, and to each other, which . . . was a peculiarity of the English [in 1509], has scarcely so maintained its ancient ascendancy. "They have the incredible courtesy of remaining with their heads uncovered, with an admirable grace, while they talk to each other."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15, p. 254.

1260. COURTESY to the Unfortunate. Black Prince. [At the battle of Poitiers the Black Prince defeats and captures the French king

John II.] That night the Prince of Wales [the Black Prince] made a supper in his lodging for the French king and to the great lords that were prisoners. "And always the Prince served before the king, as humbly as he could, and would not sit at the king's board, for any desire that the king could make, and exhorted him not to be of heavy cheer, for that King Edward, his father, should bear him all honor and amity, and accord with him so reasonably that they should be friends ever after." . . . This scene, so gracefully performed by him who, a few hours before, was "courageous and cruel as a lion," was in perfect accordance with the system of chivalry.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 31, p. 476.

1261. COURTS, Injustice of. Persecution. To abolish the worship and to dissolve the government of the Christians, it was thought necessary to subject to the most intolerable hardships the condition of those perverse individuals who should still reject the religion of nature, of Rome, and of their ancestors. Persons of a liberal birth were declared incapable of holding any honors or employments; slaves were forever deprived of the hopes of freedom, and the whole body of the people were put out of the protection of the law. The judges were authorized to hear and to determine every action that was brought against a Christian. But the Christians were not permitted to complain of any injury which they themselves had suffered; and thus those unfortunate sectaries were exposed to the severity, while they were excluded from the benefits, of public justice.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16.

1262. COURTS packed. Reign of James II. [Judges were appointed for the purpose of securing the desired judgment.] Judgment was given by the lord chief justice, Sir Edward Herbert. He announced that he had submitted the question to all the judges, and that, in the opinion of eleven of them, the king might lawfully dispense with penal statutes in particular cases, and for special reasons of grave importance. . . . There can be no reasonable doubt that the dissenting judge was, like the plaintiff and the plaintiff's counsel, acting collusively. It was important that there should be a great preponderance of authority in favor of the dispensing power; yet it was important that the bench, which had been carefully packed for the occasion, should appear to be independent. One judge, therefore, the least respectable of the twelve, was permitted, or more probably commanded, to give his voice against the prerogative.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 78.

1263. COURTS, Scandalous. Reign of Charles I. The judges of the common law, holding their situations during the pleasure of the king, were scandalously obsequious. Yet, obsequious as they were, they were less ready and efficient instruments of arbitrary power than a class of courts, the memory of which is still, after the lapse of more than two centuries, held in deep abhorrence by the nation. Foremost among these courts in power and in infamy were the Star Chamber and the High Commission, the former a political, the latter a religious, inquisition. Neither was a part of the old Constitution of England.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 83.

1264. COVETOUSNESS, Contemptible. Henry III. History presents him in scarcely any other light than that of an extortioner and a beggar. The records of the Exchequer abundantly show, that, for forty years, there were no contrivances for obtaining money so mean or unjust that he disdained to practise them.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 24, p. 261.

1265. COVETOUSNESS punished. Gold. Mithridates . . . sent Aquilius round the cities of the province seated on an ass, with a proclamation stating that to his covetous dealings alone the war was due, and then put him to death by having molten gold poured down his throat.—LIDDELL'S ROME, ch. 59, § 6, p. 596.

1266. COVETOUSNESS, Royal. Henry III. In 1239 the queen bore a son, Edward; and then the streets were illuminated, while bands of dancers made the night joyful with drum and tambourine. But Henry . . . was not satisfied with barren rejoicings. He sent out messengers to ask for presents, into city and into country. They came back. If well loaded, the king smiled; if the gift were small, it was rejected with contempt. "God gave us the child," said a Norman, "but the king sells him to us." In 1251 he went about seeking hospitality of abbots, friars, clerks, and men of low degree, staying with them and asking gifts." . . . Two years before this . . . Henry shamelessly transgressed the bounds of royal dignity, by exacting New Year's gifts from the citizens of London. "Lend me £100," said the king to the abbot of Ramsay; and the abbot replied: "I have sometimes given, but never lend," and so went to the money-lenders and borrowed it, "that he might satisfy the wants of this beggar king."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 24, p. 362.

1267. COWARD, The deserted. Perseus. [After receiving an overwhelming defeat from the Romans, Perseus, the King of the Macedonians,] fled from Pydna to Pella, with his cavalry, which had suffered no loss. When the foot overtook them, they reproached them as cowards and traitors, pulled them off their horses, and wounded several of them; so that the king, dreading the consequences of the tumult, turned his horse out of the common road; and, lest he should be known, wrapped up his purple robe, and put it before him; he also took off his diadem, and carried it in his hand; and that he might converse the more conveniently with his friends, alighted from his horse and led him. But they all slunk away from him by degrees: one under pretense of tying his shoe, another of watering his horse, and a third of being thirsty himself; not that they were so much afraid of the enemy, as of the cruelty of Perseus, who, exasperated with his misfortunes, sought to lay the blame of his misfortune on anybody but himself.—PLUTARCH'S PAULUS ÆMILIUS.

1268. COWARD, Professions of the. Gelimer. [The defeated king of Carthage.] In the evening Belisarius led his infantry to the attack of the camp; and the pusillanimous flight of Gelimer exposed the vanity of his recent declarations, that to the vanquished death was a relief, life a burden, and infamy the only object of terror. His departure was secret; but as soon as the Vandals discovered that their king had deserted them, they hastily dispersed, anxious only for their personal safety, and careless of every object that is dear or valuable to mankind.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41.

1269. COWARDICE, Appearance of. Abdallah. [Gregory offered his daughter's hand and great riches to the youth who would bring him the head of Abdallah, the general of the Saracens. He withdrew from the field at the solicitation of his brethren.] A noble Arabian . . . on the news of the battle, Zobeir, with twelve companions, cut his way through the camp of the Greeks, and pressed forward, without tasting either food or repose, to partake of the dangers of his brethren. He cast his eyes round the field: "Where," said he, "is our general?" "In his tent." "Is the tent a station for the general of the Moslems?" Abdallah represented with a blush the importance of his own life, and the temptation that was held forth by the Roman prefect.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51.

1270. COWARDICE of the Cruel. Nero. Nero, abandoned by his guards, was obliged to conceal himself in the house of one of his freedmen. The Senate proclaimed him an enemy to his country, and condemned him to die more majorum—that is, to be scourged, thrown from the Tarpeian rock, and then flung into the Tiber. Unable to bear the thoughts of such a death, Nero tried the points of two daggers, but wanted courage to die by his own hand. He entreated the aid of one of his slaves, who was not slow in the performance of that friendly office . . . a character happily difficult to be paralleled in the annals of human nature.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1.

1271. COWARDICE despised. General Whitefeather. [General Whitlock surrendered Montevideo in a cowardly manner, and returned to England with a whole skin. He was nicknamed General Whitefeather.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 27, p. 486.

1272. — — — "Little King." Ferdinand attacked his former ally with the united forces of Castile and Arragon. The war was tedious, and lasted several years. Isabella accompanied her husband in several of his military expeditions, and attended him when he laid siege to the city of Granada, in 1491. After a blockade of eight months, the pusillanimous Abo-Abdelli, who has been called El Rey Chico, or the Little King, meanly capitulated, contrary to the sentiments and urgent remonstrances of above twenty thousand of the inhabitants, who offered to defend their native city to the last extremity. The treaty between Abo-Abdelli and Ferdinand secured to the Moors of Granada a small mountainous part of the kingdom, with the enjoyment of their laws and religion. The Moorish prince, execrated by his people, betook himself to this despicable retreat. He is said to have wept when he cast back his eyes to the beautiful plain and city of Granada. "You have reason," said his mother, "to weep like a woman for the loss of that kingdom, which you could not defend like a man." Thus ended the dominion of the Moors in Spain, about eight hundred years after its foundation [A.D. 1491].—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 14.

1273. COWARDICE, Disgrace of. Daniel Scott. [Sir Walter Scott's brother.] Daniel Scott was the black sheep of the family. He got into difficulties in business, formed a bad connection with an artful woman, and was sent to try his fortunes in the West Indies. There he was employed in some service against a body of refractory negroes, . . . and apparently showed the white feather. Mr. Lockhart says that "he returned to Scotland a dishonored man; and though he found shelter and compassion from his mother, his brother would never see him again. Nay, when, soon after, his health, shattered by dissolute indulgence, . . . gave way altogether, and he died, as yet a young man, the poet refused either to attend his funeral or to wear mourning for him, like the rest of his family." Indeed, he always spoke of him as his "relative," not as his brother. Here again Scott's severity was due to his brother's failure as a "man of honor"—i.e., in courage.—HUTTON'S SCOTT, ch. 11.

1274. COWARDICE prevented. Robert Guiscard. [Normans were victorious over the Greeks.] On the report and distant prospect of these formidable numbers, Robert assembled a council of his principal officers. "You behold," said he, "your danger; it is urgent and inevitable. The hills are covered with arms and standards, and the emperor of the Greeks is accustomed to wars and triumphs. Obedience and union are our only safety, and I am ready to yield the command to a more worthy leader." The vote and acclamation, even of his secret enemies, assured him, in that perilous moment, of their esteem and confidence; and the duke thus continued: "Let us trust in the rewards of victory, and deprive cowardice of the means of escape. Let us burn our vessels and our baggage, and give battle on this spot, as if it were the place of our nativity and our burial." The resolution was unanimously approved; and, without confining himself to his lines, Guiscard awaited in battle array the nearer approach of the enemy.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 56.

1275. COWARDICE punished. Romans. The dictator, or consul, had a right to command the service of the Roman youth, and to punish an obstinate or cowardly disobedience by the most severe and ignominious penalties—by striking the offender out of the list of citizens, by confiscating his property, and by selling his person into slavery.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 3.

1276. ———. Deputies. On the 2d of June [1793] the Tuileries were completely surrounded by an armed multitude of 80,000 men, with a formidable park of artillery commanded by Henriot; and the commune required from the affrighted deputies an immediate decree for the arrest of the Girondist members. They at first refused compliance, but were at length compelled to vote at the point of the bayonet the arrest of thirty-two Girondist members, including Brissot, Vergniaud, Guadet, Gensonné, Pétion, and all the celebrated names of the party. Such was the fall of the Girondists—a memorable and righteous retribution for their cowardly abandonment of the king.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 27, § 2, p. 566.

1277. COWARDICE reproved. Romans. [During the war of the Allies the enemy] gave the Romans a good opportunity of attacking them, and they were afraid to embrace it; after both parties were retired Marius called his soldiers together, and made this short speech to them: "I know not which to call the greatest cowards, the enemy or you; for neither dare they face your backs nor you theirs." At last, pretending to be incapacitated for the service by his infirmities, he laid down the command.—PLUTARCH.

1278. COWARDICE, Shameful. General Hull. [The British] advanced to the siege of Detroit. The Americans, in their trenches outside of the fort, were eager for battle, and stood with lighted matches awaiting the order to fire. When the British were within five hundred yards, to the amazement of both armies, Hull hoisted a white flag over the fort. There was a brief parley and a surrender, perhaps the most shameful in the history of the United States. Not only the army in Detroit, but all the forces under Hull's command, became prisoners of war. The whole of Michigan territory was surrendered to the British. At the capitulation, the American officers, in rage and despair, stamped the ground, broke their swords, and tore off their epaulets. The whole country was humiliated. [Hull was court-martialed, convicted of cowardice, and sentenced to be shot. President Madison pardoned him.] —RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 49, p. 395.

1279. COWARDICE, Unpardonable. Germans. In the faith of soldiers (and such were the Germans) cowardice is the most unpardonable of sins. A brave man was the worthy favorite of their martial deities; the wretch who had lost his shield was alike banished from the religious and civil assemblies of his countrymen.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9.

1280. COWARDS punished. Lacedæmonians. Such persons are not only excluded all offices, but it is infamous to intermarry with them. Any man who meets them is at liberty to strike them. They are obliged to appear in a forlorn manner, and in a vile habit, with patches of divers colors; and to wear their beards half shaved and half unshaved.—PLUTARCH.

1281. CREDULITY of Philosophers. Seven. Seven friends and philosophers, Diogenes and Hermias, Eulalius and Priscian, Damascius, Isidore, and Simplicius, who dissented from the religion of their sovereign, embraced the resolution of seeking in a foreign land the freedom which was denied in their native country. They had heard, and they credulously believed, that the republic of Plato was realized in the despotic government of Persia, and that a patriot king reigned over the happiest and most virtuous of nations. They were soon astonished by the natural discovery, that Persia resembled the other countries of the globe; that Chosroes, who affected the name of a philosopher, was vain, cruel, and ambitious; that bigotry and a spirit of intolerance prevailed among the Magi; that the nobles were haughty, the courtiers servile, and the magistrates unjust; that the guilty sometimes escaped, and that the innocent were often oppressed. The disappointment of the philosophers provoked them to overlook the real virtues of the Persians; and they were scandalized, more deeply perhaps than became their profession, with the plurality of wives and concubines, the incestuous marriages, and the custom of exposing dead bodies to the dogs and vultures, instead of hiding them in the earth, or consuming them with fire. Their repentance was expressed by a precipitate return, and they loudly declared that they had rather die on the boders of the empire than enjoy the wealth and favor of the barbarian.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40.

1282. CREDULITY, Religious. Priestcraft. [The blood which flowed during the agony of our Lord was pretended to be exhibited according to the price paid for the sight. Latimer declared it to be clarified honey, colored with saffron.] There was in the priory of Cardigan an image of the Virgin, with a taper in her hand, which was found standing on the river Tyne, with the taper always burning; but being carried into Christ's Church, in Cardigan, the image would not stay there, but was found three or four times in the place where now is builded the Church of our Lady, and the taper burning in her hand, which continued still burning for the space of nine years without wasting, until the time that one foreswore himself thereon, and then it extincted and never burned thereafter. . . . There was an image at Bangor worth to the friars 20 marks by the year in corn, cattle and cheese, and money. . . . The famous rood of Boxley, of which the figure could move its threatening eyes, twitch his nostrils, throw back his head, or nod approbation, is elevated on a scaffold, and goes through the performance at which past generations had wondered and trembled. . . . The imposture is proclaimed from the pulpit . . . the machinery is disclosed and consigned to the flames.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 25, p. 409.

1283. CREDULITY of the Sick. Lord Audley. The belief in empirical remedies was not confined to the humble classes. Lord Audley, in 1553, sends to Cecil, who was seriously ill, recipes for two medicines which he had proved upon himself and his wife. One of these is founded on the healing virtues of a sow pig nine days old, distilled with many herbs and spices. The other is more ample: "Item. Take a . . . hedgehog, and quarter him in pieces, and put the said beast in a still with these ingredients: item, a quart of red wine, a pint of rose-water, a quart of sugar, cinnamon and great raisins, one date, twelve nepe" [turnips].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 8, p. 498.

1284. CREDULITY, Superstitious. Romans. The nations and the sects of the Roman world admitted, with equal credulity and similar abhorrence, the reality of that infernal art which was able to control the eternal order of the planets and the voluntary operations of the human mind. They dreaded the mysterious power of spells and incantations, of potent herbs, and execrable rites, which could extinguish or recall life, inflame the passions of the soul, blast the works of creation, and extort from the reluctant demons the secrets of futurity. They believed, with the wildest inconsistency, that the preternatural dominion of the air, of earth, and of hell was exercised, from the vilest motives of malice or gain, by some wrinkled hags and itinerant sorcerers, who passed their obscure lives in penury and contempt. The arts of magic were equally condemned by the public opinion and by the laws of Rome; but as they tended to gratify the most imperious passions of the heart of man, they were continually proscribed and continually practised. An imaginary cause is capable of producing the most serious and mischievous effects. The dark predictions of the death of an emperor, or the success of a conspiracy, were calculated only to stimulate the hopes of ambition and to dissolve the ties of fidelity; and the intentional guilt of magic was aggravated by the actual crimes of treason and sacrilege. Such vain terrors disturbed the peace of society and the happiness of individuals; and the harmless flame which insensibly melted a waxen image might derive a powerful and pernicious energy from the affrighted fancy of the person whom it was maliciously designed to represent. From the infusion of those herbs which were supposed to possess a supernatural influence, it was an easy step to the use of more substantial poison; and the folly of mankind sometimes became the instrument and the mask of the most atrocious crimes.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 25, p. 536.

1286. CRIME, Epidemic of. England. There was a good deal of alarm in the autumn of 1692 from the daring crimes that sometimes seem epidemic in a nation. Hence a proclamation against highwaymen was issued. Gangs of banditti robbed mails and stage-coaches even in the daytime. . . . Burglars were almost as bold and numerous as footpads and highwaymen. [There had been four years of war with James II. and Louis XIV.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 10, p. 155.

1287. CRIME, Evidence of. Circumstantial. [Burning of Rome by Nero.] Whether he was really guilty or not of having ordered that immense conflagration, it is certain that he was suspected of it by his contemporaries, and has been charged with it by many historians of his country. It is certain, also, that his head had been full for years of the image of flaming cities; that he used to say that Priam was to be congratulated on having seen the ruin of Troy; that he was never able to resist the fixed idea of a crime; that the year following he gave a public recitation of a poem called "Troica," from the orchestra of the theatre, and that this was only the burning of Rome under a thin disguise; and that just before his flight he meditated setting fire to Rome once more. It was rumored that when some one had told him how Gaius used to quote the phrase of Euripides—

"When I am dead, sink the whole earth in flames!"

he replied, "Nay, but while I live!" He was accused of the ambition of destroying Rome, that he might replace its tortuous and narrow lanes with broad, regular streets and uniform Hellenic edifices, and so have an excuse for changing its name from Rome to Neropolis. It was believed that in his morbid appetite for new sensations he was quite capable of devising a truly artistic spectacle which would thrill his jaded æstheticism, and supply him with vivid imagery for the vivid antitheses of his poems. It was both believed and recorded that during the terrors of the actual spectacle he had climbed the Tower of Mæcenas, had expressed his delight at what he called "the flower and loveliness of the flames," and in his scenic dress had sung on his own private stage the "Capture of Ilium."—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, p. 29.

1288. CRIME, Expiation of. Burning of Rome. It is clear that a shedding of blood—in fact, some form or other of human sacrifice—was imperatively demanded by popular feeling as an expiation of the ruinous crime which had plunged so many thousands into the depths of misery. In vain had the Sibylline Books been once more consulted, and in vain had public prayer been offered, in accordance with their directions, to Vulcan and the goddesses of Earth and Hades. In vain had the Roman matrons walked in procession in dark robes, and with their long hair unbound, to propitiate the insulted majesty of Juno, and to sprinkle with seawater her ancient statue. In vain had largesses been lavished upon the people and propitiatory sacrifices offered to the gods. In vain had public banquets been celebrated in honor of various deities. A crime had been committed, and Romans had perished unavenged. Blood cried for blood before the sullen suspicion against Nero could be averted, or the indignation of heaven appeased. [Nero accused, and then persecuted, the Christians for his own crime.]—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, p. 35.

1289. CRIME of Imagination. Capital. [On the trial of the Duke of Buckingham, in 1521,] a monk of the Charter-house, who pretended to a knowledge of future events, "had divers times said to the duke that he should be King of England; but the duke said that in himself he never consented to it." The judicial inference was, that he had committed the crime of imagining the death of the king, and that his words were satisfactory evidence of such imagining. Buckingham was convicted [and beheaded].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 17, p. 287.

1290. CRIME, Memorial of. "Labrador." Men were already with the Portuguese an established article of traffic; the inhabitants of the American coast seemed well fitted for labor; and Corte-Real [the Portuguese sailor] freighted his ships with more than fifty Indians, whom, on his return, he sold as slaves. . . . The name of Labrador, transferred to a more northern coast, is probably a memorial of his crime.—BANCROFT'S HISTORY OF U. S., ch. 1.

1291. CRIME, Organization for. England. 1752. Fielding said, "there are at this time a great gang of rogues, whose number falls little short of a hundred, who are incorporated into one body, have officers and a treasurer, and have reduced theft and robbery into a regular system."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 12, p. 192.

1292. CRIME, Reaction of. Rosamond. [She was the exiled murderess of Alboin, her royal husband.] With her daughter, the heiress of the Lombard throne, her two lovers, her trusty Gepidae, and the spoils of the palace of Verona, Rosamond descended the Adige and the Po, and was transported by a Greek vessel to the safe harbor of Ravenna. Longinus beheld with delight the charms and the treasures of the widow of Alboin: her situation and her past conduct might justify the most licentious proposals; and she readily listened to the passion of a minister who, even in the decline of the empire, was respected as the equal of kings. The death of a jealous lover was an easy and grateful sacrifice; and as Helmichis [her former lover] issued from the bath he received the deadly potion from the hand of his mistress. The taste of the liquor, its speedy operation, and his experience of the character of Rosamond, convinced him that he was poisoned; he pointed his dagger to her breast, compelled her to drain the remainder of the cup, and expired in a few minutes, with the consolation that she could not survive to enjoy the fruits of her wickedness.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 45.

1293. CRIME taught. "Devil's Acre." In 1837 there was a district lying near Westminster Abbey, called "The Devil's Acre," where depravity was universal; where professional beggars were fitted out with all the appliances of imposture; where there was an agency office for the hire of children to be carried about by forlorn widows and deserted wives to move the compassion of street-giving benevolence; where young pickpockets were duly trained in the art and mystery which was to conduct them in due course to an expensive voyage for the good of their country [to Botany Bay].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 22, p. 399.

1294. CRIMES, Equality of. Stoics. From the portico the Roman civilians learned to live, to reason, and to die; but they imbibed in some degree the prejudices of the sect—the love of paradox, the pertinacious habits of dispute, and a minute attachment to words and verbal distinctions. The superiority of form to matter was introduced to ascertain the right of property; and the equality of crimes is countenanced by an opinion of Trebatius, that he who touches the ear touches the whole body; and that he who steals from a heap of corn or a hogshead of wine is guilty of the entire theft.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44.

1295. CRIMINAL, A monster. Catiline. In an age when licentiousness of the grossest kind was too common to attract attention, Catiline had achieved a notoriety for infamy. He had intrigued with a Vestal virgin, the sister of Cicero's wife, Terentia. If Cicero is to be believed, he had made away with his own wife, that he might marry Aurelia Orestilla, a woman as wicked as she was beautiful, and he had killed his child also because Aurelia had objected to be incumbered with a stepson. But this, too, was common in high society in those days. Adultery and incest had become familiar excitements. Boys of ten years old had learned the art of poisoning their fathers.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 11.

1296. CRIMINALS branded. Clerical. The act for Bishops, to punish priests and other religious men for dishonest life, . . . provides that if a person not in orders shall have once been admitted to such benefit [of clergy], he shall not be again so admitted, but be marked with M upon the brawn of the left thumb if convicted of murder, and with T if for any other felony, and then be delivered to the ordinary. — KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15, p. 243.

1297. CRIMINALS, Clerical, Flavored. [In 1512 a statute was passed, which] exempts from benefit of clergy all murderers, highway robbers, and burglars, such as be within holy orders only except. . . . The ecclesiastical authorities regarded it as encroachment upon the privileges of the Church, and they prevented its renewal at the expiration of the first year. . . . A certain abbot . . . denounced from the pulpit at Paul's Cross all those who had assented to the act. — KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 17, p. 277.

1298. CRIMINALS, Conniving with, Pirates. [The Emperor Maximian appointed Carausius to the command of his fleet in the British Channel for the suppression of the German pirates.] The integrity of the new admiral corresponded not with his abilities. When the German pirates sailed from their own harbors he connived at their passage, but he diligently intercepted their return, and appropriated to his own use an ample share of the spoil which they had acquired. The wealth of Carausius was, on this occasion, very justly considered as an evidence of his guilt; and Maximian gave orders for his death. — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 13, p. 409.

1299. CRIMINALS, Haunts of, London. The house of the Carmelite Friars . . . had, before the Reformation, been a sanctuary for criminals, and still retained the privilege of protecting debtors from arrest. Insolvents consequently were to be found in every dwelling, from cellar to garret. Of these a large proportion were knaves and libertines, and were followed to their asylum by women more abandoned than themselves. . . . Though the immunities legally belonging to the place extended only to cases of debt; cheats, false witnesses, forgers, and highwaymen found refuge there; for amid a rabble so desperate no peace officer's life was in safety. At the cry of "Rescue," bullies, with swords and cudgels, and termagant hags, with spits and broomsticks, poured forth by hundreds. . . . Even the warrant of the chief justice of England could not be executed without the help of a company of musketeers. — MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 338.

1300. CRIMINALS honored, Highlanders. The "Highlanders being in general poorly provided for, they are apt to covet other men's goods; nor are they taught by any laws to distinguish with great accuracy their own property from that of other people. They are not ashamed of the gallows—nay, they pay a religious respect to a fortunate plunderer." — CUNNINGHAM, IN KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 6.

1301. CRIMINALS, Protection from, Police, 1780. [The London] police-officer of that day was called a "thief-taker"—he was in no sense of the word a detective or a preventive functionary. He knew the thieves, and the thieves knew him. His business was to "let the matter ripen" when he had information of a house to be broken open or a mail to be robbed. When he was sure of a capital conviction he took his man, and obtained £40 "blood money." — KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6, p. 117.

1302. CRIMINALS, Rule of, Bridewell, 1738. Mr. Booth is committed to Bridewell. . . .

When he goes to prison, a number of persons gather round him in the yard, and demand "garnish." The keeper explained that it was customary for every new prisoner to treat the others with something to drink. The young man had no money, and the keepers quietly permit the scoundrels to strip him of his clothes. All persons sent to Bridewell were treated alike, so far as the prison discipline was concerned. — FIELDING, IN KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6, p. 117.

1303. CRISIS, Equal to the, Cromwell. Pym was dead, Hampden was dead. Cromwell, as he looked along its benches, would notice many a place vacated where once sat some strong friend of order and of freedom. It had so shrunk from honor that it had come to be called "the Rump." . . . On the 20th of April, 1653, while Cromwell was quietly sitting in his own "lodgings" in Whitehall, there was brought to him a message, that at that very moment a bill was being hurried through the House, by which this most comely piece of government was resolving its own indefectible perpetuity, and thus attempting a great act of usurpation. Let the reader, therefore, distinctly understand that it was the usurpation of capability against incapability; the House must be checkmated. Cromwell, therefore, immediately gathered his officers round him and walked down to the assembly [and turned it into the street]. — HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 14, p. 176.

1304. CRITIC at Church, The, Lord George Sackville Germain. [Minister in charge of the American department under George III., A.D. 1775.] Apparelled on Sunday morning in gala, as if for the drawing-room, he constantly marched out all his household to the parish church, where he would mark time for the singing gallery, chide a rustic chorister for a discord, stand up during the sermon to survey the congregation or overawe the idle, and with unmoved sincerity gesticulate approbation to the preacher, whom he sometimes cheered on by name. . . . This friendless man . . . could plan . . . how to lay America in ashes. — BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 51.

1305. CRITICISM, Aroused by, Lord Byron. The Edinburgh Review appeared which contained the celebrated article that stung the poet so cruelly. "The poesy of this young lord," began the reviewer, "belongs to the class which neither gods nor men are said to permit. . . . His effusions are spread over a dead flat, and can no more get above or below the level than if they were so much stagnant water." And so on for three bantering pages, interspersed with specimens of the noble "minor's" stanzas. This stinging satire, which would have crushed some young writers of verses, fixed Lord Byron in the career of letters. — CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 294.

1306. CRITICISM, Directed, Alcibiades. Alcibiades had a dog of uncommon size and beauty, which cost him 70 minæ, and yet his tail, which was his principal ornament, he caused to be cut off. Some of his acquaintance found great fault with his acting so strangely, and told him that all Athens rung with the story of his foolish treatment of the dog; at which he laughed and said, "This is the very thing I wanted; for I would have the Athenians talk of this, lest they should find something worse to say of me."—PLUTARCH'S ALCIBIADES.

1307. CRITICISM feared. William Cowper. There was a trembling consultation as to the expediency of bringing the volume [of satires] under the notice of Johnson. "One of his pointed sarcasms, if he should happen to be displeased, would soon find its way into all companies, and spoil the sale." "I think it would be well to send in our joint names, accompanied with a handsome card, such a one as you will know how to fabricate, and such as may predispose him to a favorable perusal of the book, by coaxing him into a good temper; for he is a great bear, with all his learning and penetration." Fear prevailed; but it seems that the book found its way into the dictator's hands, that his judgment on it was kind, and that he even did something to temper the wind of adverse criticism to the shorn lamb.—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 4.

1308. CRITICISM, Good. Samuel Johnson. When I pointed out to him in the newspaper one of Mr. Grattan's animated and glowing speeches, in favor of the freedom of Ireland, in which this expression occurred (I know not if accurately taken), "We will persevere till there is not one link of the English chain left to clank upon the rags of the meanest beggar in Ireland"—"Nay, sir" (said Johnson), "don't you perceive that one link cannot clank?"—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 580.

1309. CRITICISM ignored. Abraham Lincoln. [Being urged to set a false report right by a statement of facts in the papers, he said:] Oh, no, at least not now. If I were to try to read, much less to answer, all the attacks made on me, this shop might as well be closed for any other business. I do the very best I know how—the very best I can; and I intend to keep doing so unto the end. If the end brings me out all right, what is said against me won't amount to anything. If the end brings me out wrong, ten angels swearing I was right would make no difference.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 753.

1310. CRITICISM, Mania for. Thackeray. The little courtesies of the world and the little discourtesies became snobbish to him. A man could not wear his hat, or carry his umbrella, or mount his horse without falling into some error of snobbism before his hypercritical eyes. St. Michael would have carried his armor amiss, and St. Cecilia have been snobbish as she twanged her harp.—TROLLOPE'S THACKERAY, ch. 2.

1311. CRITICISM, Opposition by. Palmerston. One great secret of his power was, that he could always make the house laugh. He had a quiet, homely way of joking, which no British audience could resist. Many of his comic illustrations were drawn from the "ring," all the slang and science of which he knew. I have no doubt that if he had been attacked in one of his midnight walks by three unarmed men, not prize-fighters, he would have been able to knock down the first assailant, damage the second, and put to flight the third. I remember, in one of his speeches, a passage like this: "Gentlemen on the other side remind me of another sort of encounter familiar to us all. Tom Spring, hard pressed, cries out, 'You strike too high!' Bob Clinch changes his tactics; whereupon Tom roars, 'You strike too low!' I have the same ill-luck; let me strike high or low, I cannot please honorable members opposite."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 502.

1312. CRITICISM, Requests for. Samuel Johnson. We talked of a lady's verses on Ireland. REYNOLDS: "And how was it, sir?" JOHNSON: "Why, very well for a young miss's verses—that is to say, compared with excellence, nothing; but very well for the person who wrote them. I am vexed at being shown verses in that manner." MISS REYNOLDS: "But if they should be good, why not give them hearty praise?" JOHNSON: "Why, madam, because I have not then got the better of my bad humor from having been shown them. You must consider, madam, beforehand, they may be bad as well as good. Nobody has a right to put another under such a difficulty, that he must either hurt the person by telling the truth, or hurt himself by telling what is not true."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 389.

1313. CRITICISM silenced. Dionysius. Philoxenus, it is said, being invited to dine with Dionysius [the tyrant of Syracuse], and to hear him recite some poetical composition, was the only one of the guests who took the liberty of censuring it; he was condemned to the mines; but being soon after set at liberty, and invited to hear another recitation, he held his peace when it came to his turn to give his opinion. "What," said Dionysius, "have you nothing to say on this occasion?" "Carry me back to the mines," said Philoxenus. Dionysius, we are told, was not displeased with the answer.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 8, p. 361.

1314. CRITICISM, Undisturbed by. Plato. When one told Plato that the boys in the streets were laughing at his singing, "Ay," said he, "then I must learn to sing better." Being at another time reminded that he had many aspersers, "It is no matter," said he; "I will live so that none shall believe them." And once again, being told that a friend was speaking detractingly of him, he replied, "I am confident he would not do it if he had not some reason."

1315. CROAKING of Degeneracy. Puritans. There never was a period in which the satirist did not affirm that the preceding generation was healthier, braver, and altogether nobler than that to which he had the misfortune to belong. And so our good Puritan writes [Stubbes, in 1593: "How strong men were in times past, how long they lived, and how healthful they were, before such niceness and vain pampering curiosity was invented, we may read, and many that live at this day can testify."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16, p. 248.

1316. CROAKING, Habit of. Weather. Adison's Tory Fox-hunter is the true representative of that class of "country gentlemen who have always lived out of the way of being better informed." The Fox-hunter was of the opinion there had been no good weather since the Revolution; and that the weather was always fine in the reign of Charles II.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 4, p. 54.

1317. CROSS, Emblems of the. Christian. An instrument of the tortures which were inflicted only on slaves and strangers became an object of horror in the eyes of a Roman citizen; and the ideas of guilt, of pain, and of ignominy were closely united with the idea of the cross. The piety, rather than the humanity, of Constantine soon abolished in his dominions the punishment which the Saviour of mankind had condescended to suffer; but the emperor had already learned to despise the prejudices of his education and of his people before he could erect in the midst of Rome his own statue, bearing a cross in its right hand, with an inscription which referred the victory of its arms and the deliverance of Rome to the virtue of that salutary sign, the true symbol of force and courage. The same symbol sanctified the arms of the soldiers of Constantine; the cross glittered on their helmet, was engraved on their shields, was interwoven into their banners; and the consecrated emblems which adorned the person of the emperor himself were distinguished only by richer materials and more exquisite workmanship.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 20.

1318. CROSS, Protection of the. Labarum. [The Roman labarum] is described as a long pike intersected by a transversal beam. The silken veil which hung down from the beam was curiously inwrought with the images of the reigning monarch and his children. The summit of the pike supported a crown of gold, which enclosed the mysterious monogram, at once expressive of the figure of the cross and the initial letters of the name of Christ. The safety of the labarum was intrusted to fifty guards of approved valor and fidelity; their station was marked by honors and emoluments; and some fortunate accidents soon introduced an opinion, that as long as the guards of the labarum were engaged in the execution of their office they were secure and invulnerable amid the darts of the enemy. In the second civil war Licinius felt and dreaded the power of this consecrated banner, the sight of which, in the distress of battle, animated the soldiers of Constantine with an invincible enthusiasm, and scattered terror and dismay through the ranks of the adverse legions.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 18.

1319. CROSS recovered, The. Relic. In the recovery of the standards and prisoners which had fallen into the hands of the Persians . . . the subjects and brethren of Heraclius were redeemed from persecution, slavery, and exile; but, instead of the Roman eagles, the true wood of the holy cross was restored to the importunate demands of the successor of Constantine. . . . Heraclius performed in person the pilgrimage of Jerusalem, the identity of the relic was verified by the discreet patriarch, and this august ceremony has been commemorated by the annual festival of the exaltation of the cross. Before the emperor presumed to tread the consecrated ground he was instructed to strip himself of the diadem and purple, the pomp and vanity of the world.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 47.

1320. CROSS, Victory by the. Constantine. [Emperor of Rome.] In one of the marches of Constantine he is reported to have seen with his own eyes the luminous trophy of the cross, placed above the meridian sun, and inscribed with the following words: BY THIS CONQUER. This amazing object in the sky astonished the whole army, as well as the emperor himself, who was yet undetermined in the choice of a religion; but his astonishment was converted into faith by the vision of the ensuing night. Christ appeared before his eyes, and, displaying the same celestial sign of the cross, He directed Constantine to frame a similar standard, and to march, with an assurance of victory, against Maxentius and all his enemies.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 20.

1321. CROWN, Composite. Napoleon I. On the 26th of May [1805] the [second] coronation of Napoleon took place in the Cathedral of Milan. The iron crown of Charlemagne, which is a circlet of gold and gems covering an iron ring, formed of one of the spikes said to have pierced our Saviour's hand at the crucifixion . . . was brought forth. . . . He placed the crown upon his own head, repeating aloud the historical words, "God has given it to me—woe to him who touches it."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 29.

1323. ——. Cæsar. The Senate, meditating on the insult which they had received, concluded that Cæsar might be tempted, and that if they could bring him to consent he would lose the people's hearts. They had already made him Dictator for life; they voted next that he really should be king, and, not formally perhaps, but tentatively, they offered him the crown. He was sounded as to whether he would accept it. He understood the snare, and refused. What was to be done next? He would soon be gone to the East. Rome and its hollow adulations would lie behind him, and their one opportunity would be gone also. They employed some one to place a diadem on the head of his statue which stood upon the Rostra. It was done publicly, in the midst of a vast crowd, in Cæsar's presence. Two eager tribunes tore the diadem down, and ordered the offender into custody.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 26.

1324. CROWN of Honor. Roman. The civic crown was the foundation of many privileges. He who had once obtained it had a right to wear it always. When he appeared at the public spectacles, the senators rose up to do him honor. He was placed near their bench; and his father and grandfather, by the father's side, were entitled to the same privileges. Here was an encouragement to merit, which cost the public nothing, and yet was productive of many great effects.—PLUTARCH'S CAIUS MARCIUS CORIOLANUS, LANGHORNE'S NOTE.

1325. CROWN of Merit. Poet. The ceremony of his coronation was performed in the Capitol by his friend and patron, the supreme magistrate of the republic. Twelve patrician youths were arrayed in scarlet; six representatives of the most illustrious families, in green robes, with garlands of flowers, accompanied the procession; in the midst of the princes and nobles, the senator, Count of Anguillara, a kinsman of the Colonna, assumed his throne; and at the voice of a herald Petrarch arose. After discoursing on a text of Virgil, and thrice repeating his vows for the prosperity of Rome, he knelt before the throne, and received from the senator a laurel crown, with a more precious declaration, "This is the reward of merit." The people shouted, "Long life to the Capitol and the poet!"—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 70, p. 469.

1326. CROWN, Self-imposed. Napoleon I. The crown, the sceptre, the mantle, and the sword were on the altar. The pope lifted the crown; but Napoleon, snatching the diadem, modelled after the crown of Charlemagne, out of the hands of the Holy Father, placed it upon his own head; and then he crowned the empress.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 25, p. 437.

1327. CROWN, Theft of a. England. [In 1671 a Colonel Blood, disguised as a clergyman, gagged the keeper of the royal jewels, and after beating him senseless, with the aid of two others, he made off with the crown. He was soon arrested, and the crown was restored.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 19, p. 314.

1328. CROWN, Transferred. Cæsar. Antony, his colleague in the consulship, approached with a tiara, and placed it on Cæsar's head, saying, "The people give you this by my hand." That Antony had no sinister purpose is obvious. He perhaps spoke for the army; or it may be that Cæsar himself suggested Antony's action, that he might end the agitation of so dangerous a subject. He answered in a loud voice that the Romans had no king but God, and ordered that the tiara should be taken to the Capitol and placed on the statue of Jupiter Olympius. The crowd burst into an enthusiastic cheer.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 26.

1329. CROWN, A troublesome. Envy. Demosthenes rebuilt the walls of Athens at his own expense, for which the people, at the motion of Ctesiphon, decreed him a crown of gold. This excited the envy and jealousy of Æschines, who thereupon brought that famous impeachment against Demosthenes, which occasioned his inimicable oration "De Corona."—PLUTARCH'S DEMOSTHENES, LANGHORNE'S NOTE.

1330. CROWNS of Iron and Gold. Charles IV. In the cathedral of St. Ambrose, Charles [IV.] was crowned with the iron crown, which tradition ascribed to the Lombard monarchy; but he was admitted only with a peaceful train; the gates of the city were shut upon him; and the King of Italy was held a captive by the arms of the Visconti, whom he confirmed in the sovereignty of Milan. In the Vatican he was again crowned with the golden crown of the empire; but, in obedience to a secret treaty, the Roman emperor immediately withdrew without reposing a single night within the walls of Rome.—GIBBON'S ROME, vol. 5.

1331. CRUCIFIXION, Modern. India. [In February, 1825, a part of the army in India made an unsuccessful attack upon the formidable works at Donopew; the retreat was so precipitate that the wounded men were not carried off.] These unfortunate men were all crucified, and their bodies sent floating down the river upon rafts.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 12, p. 220.

1332. CRUELTY, Aristocratic. "Norman Gentlemen." [In 1070 one of the Norman chivalry, named Ivo Taillebois, at his good pleasure] would follow the various animals of the people of Croyland in the marshes with his dogs; drive them to a great distance, drown them in the lakes, mutilate some in the tail, others in the ear; while often, by breaking the feet and the legs of the beasts of burden, he would render them utterly useless.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 14, p. 197.

1333. CRUELTY, Atrocious. Roman Emperor Caracalla. The tyranny of Tiberius, Nero, and Domitian, who resided almost constantly at Rome, or in the adjacent villas, was confined to the senatorial and equestrian orders. But Caracalla was the common enemy of mankind. . . . Every province was by turns the scene of his rapine and cruelty. The senators, compelled by fear to attend his capricious motions, were obliged to provide daily entertainments at an immense expense, which he abandoned with contempt to his guards; and to erect, in every city, magnificent palaces and theatres, which he either disdained to visit or ordered to be immediately thrown down. The most wealthy families were ruined by partial fines and confiscations, and the great body of his subjects oppressed by ingenious and aggravated taxes. In the midst of peace, and upon the slightest provocation, he issued his commands, at Alexandria, in Egypt, for a general massacre. From a secure post in the temple of Serapis he viewed and directed the slaughter of many thousand citizens, as well as strangers, without distinguishing either the number or the crime of the sufferers; since, as he coolly informed the Senate, all the Alexandrians, those who had perished and those who had escaped, were alike guilty.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6.

1334. CRUELTY, Barbarian. War. The Thuringians served in the army of Attila; they traversed, both in their march and in their return, the territories of the Franks; and it was perhaps in this war that they exercised the cruelties which, about fourscore years afterward, were revenged by the son of Clovis. They massacred their hostages as well as their captives; two hundred young maidens were tortured with exquisite and unrelenting rage; their bodies were torn asunder by wild horses, or their bones were crushed under the weight of rolling wagons; and their unburied limbs were abandoned on the public roads as a prey to dogs and vultures. Such were those savage ancestors whose imaginary virtues have sometimes excited the praise and envy of civilized ages.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 35.

1335. CRUELTY, Bloodless. Michael Palæologus. [He was the usurper of Constantinople.] By fear or conscience Palæologus was restrained from dipping his hands in innocent and royal blood; but the anxiety of a usurper and a parent urged him to secure his throne by one of those imperfect crimes so familiar to the modern Greeks. The loss of sight incapacitated the young prince for the active business of the world; instead of the brutal violence of tearing out his eyes, the visual nerve was destroyed by the intense glare of a red-hot basin, and John Lascaris was removed to a distant castle, where he spent many years in privacy and oblivion.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 62.

1336. CRUELTY, Catholic, Ireland. "In fact," writes Merle d'Aubigné, "the Catholics burned the houses of the Protestants, turned them out naked in the midst of winter, and drove them, like herbs of swine, before them. If, ashamed of their nudity, and desirous of seeking shelter from the rigor of a remarkably severe season, these unhappy wretches took refuge in a barn, and concealed themselves under the straw, the rebels instantly set fire to it and burned them alive. At other times they were led without clothing to be drowned in rivers; and if, on the road, they did not move quick enough, they were urged forward at the point of the pike. When they reached the river or the sea they were precipitated into it, in bands of several hundreds, which is doubtless an exaggeration. If these poor wretches arose to the surface of the water, men were stationed along the brink to plunge them in again with the butts of their muskets, or to fire at and kill them. Husbands were cut to pieces in the presence of their wives; wives and virgins were abused in the sight of their nearest relations; and infants of seven or eight years were hung before the eyes of their parents. Nay, the Irish even went so far as to teach their own children to strip and kill the children of the English, and dash out their brains against the stones. Numbers of Protestants were buried alive, as many as seventy in one trench. An Irish priest, named MacOdeghan, captured forty or fifty Protestants, and persuaded them to abjure their religion on a promise of quarter. After their abjuration he asked them if they believed that Christ was bodily present in the Host, and that the pope was head of the Church? and on their replying in the affirmative, he said: 'Now, then, you are in a very good faith!' and, for fear they should relapse into heresy, he cut all their throats."—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 11, p. 141.

1337. CRUELTY to Children, Timour. [Timour the Tartar was a terrible destroyer of human life.] A Greek city on the coast of Ephesus having sent to meet him and implore his pity a multitude of children of both sexes, who sung his praises and recited verses of the Koran to flatter his religion: "What is that bleating of sheep that annoys my ears?" said he to his emirs. "It is the children of the city sent by their parents to meet your horse to implore you to spare their fathers and mothers." "Let the horses of the Tartars crush them all beneath their feet!" cried Timour. The cavalry of the vanguard rushed at the word upon those innocents, and thousands of the bodies of mutilated children traced the route of Timour. The habit of spilling blood had ended with giving Timour that last degree of military brutality—an indifference to blood.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 358.

tected the monopoly of a medicine man by the gallows, or the block, or by fire.—BANCROFT'S HIST., U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

1339. CRUELTY to Criminals, England. [In 1531] it was enacted that poisoning should be deemed high treason, without having any advantage of clergy, and that . . . all future prisoners should be boiled to death. . . . We have the following undoubted record under the thirteenth year of Henry [VIII.]: "This year was a man sodden in a cauldron in Smithfield; and let up and down divers times till he was dead, for because he would have poisoned divers persons." "This year [1532] was a cook boiled in a cauldron in Smithfield, for he would have poisoned the Bishop of Rochester, Fisher, with divers of his servants; and he was locked in a chain and pulled up and down with a gibbet at divers times till he was dead."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 21, p. 340.

1340. CRUELTY for Cruelty, Sicilian Vespers. The pope armed in support of his vassal Charles of Anjou. An engagement ensued, in which Conradin and the Duke of Austria were totally defeated—they were taken prisoners and condemned as rebels against the supreme authority of the holy church; Charles ordered them to suffer death upon a scaffold. Thus this prince secured his claim to the kingdom of Naples and Sicily by a deed which filled his new subjects with horror. They submitted, for a while, with silent indignation to his tyrannical government. The Sicilians at length, to whom the authority of this usurper became every day more intolerable, formed a conspiracy to vindicate their liberty which terminated in one of the most dreadful massacres ever known in history. In the year 1282, upon Easter Sunday, at the ringing of the bell for vespers, it was resolved to put to death every Frenchman through the whole island of Sicily, and the resolution was punctually executed. Even women and infants underwent the general fate; and such was the savage fury of the Sicilians, that the priests assisted in the murder of their brethren, and cut the throats even of their female penitents.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 11.

1341. CRUELTY, Enjoyment of, By Romans. The Bructeri (it is Tacitus who now speaks) were totally exterminated by the neighboring tribes, provoked by their insolence, allured by the hopes of spoil, and perhaps inspired by the tutelar deities of the empire. Above 60,000 barbarians were destroyed; not by the Roman arms, but in our sight, and for our entertainment. May the nations, enemies of Rome, ever preserve this enmity to each other. We have now attained the utmost verge of prosperity, and have nothing left to demand of fortune, except the discord of the barbarians.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 275.

1342. CRUELTY, Exquisite, Basil. [In the beginning of the eleventh century the second Basil came to the throne.] His cruelty inflicted a cool and exquisite vengeance on 15,000 [Bulgarian] captives who had been guilty of the defence of their country. They were deprived of sight; but to one of each hundred a single eye was left, that he might conduct his blind century to the presence of their king. Their king is said to have expired of grief and horror; the nation was awed by this terrible example.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 55.

1343. CRUELTY, Female. Constantina. Constantina, the wife of Gallus, a Roman ruler, is described, not as a woman, but as one of the infernal furies tormented with an insatiate thirst of human blood. Instead of employing her influence to insinuate the mild counsels of prudence and humanity, she exasperated the fierce passions of her husband; and as she retained the vanity, though she had renounced the gentleness, of her sex, a pearl necklace was esteemed an equivalent price for the murder of an innocent and virtuous nobleman.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 19.

1344. ———. Theodora. [The wife of the Roman Emperor Julian.] The reproach of cruelty, so repugnant even to her softer vices, has left an indelible stain on the memory of Theodora. Her numerous spies observed, and zealously reported, every action or word or look injurious to their royal mistress. Whomsoever they accused were cast into her peculiar prisons, inaccessible to the inquiries of justice; and it was rumored that the torture of the rack, or scourge, had been inflicted in the presence of the female tyrant, insensible to the voice of prayer or of pity. Some of these unhappy victims perished in deep, unwholesome dungeons, while others were permitted, after the loss of their limbs, their reason, or their fortunes, to appear in the world, the living monuments of her vengeance, which was commonly extended to the children of those whom she had suspected or injured. The senator or bishop, whose death or exile Theodora had pronounced, was delivered to a trusty messenger, and his diligence was quickened by a menace from her own mouth. "If you fail in the execution of my commands, I swear by Him who liveth forever, that your skin shall be flayed from your body."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41.

1345. CRUELTY of Government. Henry VIII. [At the time of the second rebellion, in 1537, Henry wrote to his minister:] Our pleasure is, that before you shall close up our said banner again, you shall, in any wise, cause such dreadful execution to be done upon a good number of the inhabitants of every town, village and hamlet, that have offended in this rebellion, as well by the hanging them up in trees, as by the quartering of them, and the setting of their heads and quarters in every town, great and small, and in all such other places, as they may be a fearful spectacle to all others hereafter that would practise any like matter; which we require you to do without pity or respect.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 25, p. 403.

1346. ———. John Howard. He was led to visit the hulks anchored in the Thames, wherein were confined large numbers of convicts awaiting transportation. He told members of the government what he saw there. . . . He went below, where he found large numbers of sick men lying on the floor, with not so much as straw under them, to whom were given only the loathsome and poisonous provisions which had caused their sickness. He was not surprised to learn that one third of the convicts die before leaving the country to begin the fulfilment of their sentence; and he told the government that, unless the system were changed, there would be no need of transporting prisoners to Botany Bay, for they would all die in the Thames. It was a horrid aggravation of this infernal cruelty that the long detention on board those hulks—from four to eight months—did not expunge a day from the term of their sentence; it was so much added to their legal punishment.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 53.

1347. CRUELTY, An inherited. Nero. He appeared in public a wise and amiable prince; yet at this very time it was his favorite amusement to range through the streets of Rome with a band of young debauchees, who indulged themselves in every species of outrage and disorder. His natural disposition first publicly showed itself in an indolent neglect of all the cares of government; and his mother, Agrippina, took advantage of this disposition by ruling everything as she chose. Seneca warned his pupil of the danger of allowing free course to the views of this ambitious and unprincipled woman, and his first step was to dismiss from the court her chief favorites and confidants. The violence of Agrippina prompted her to seek an outrageous revenge. She proposed to bring Britannicus to the prætorian bands, and to acknowledge before them the crimes she had committed to place Nero on the throne. The emperor prevented the execution of this purpose by poisoning Britannicus, while he sat at supper with himself; but he sought against his mother a more refined vengeance. She was invited to Baïæ, to celebrate the feast of Bacchus. The ship in which she sailed was constructed in such a manner as to burst and fall to pieces at sea; but the machinery failed, and Agrippina came safe ashore. Nero, enraged at the disappointment of his stratagem, ordered one of his freedmen to assassinate her.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1.

1348. CRUELTY, Inhuman. Phocas the Tyrant. After the [forced] abdication of [the Greek Emperor] Maurice, the two factions disputed the choice of an emperor; but the favorite of the blues was rejected by the jealousy of their antagonists. . . . On the third day, amid the acclamations of a thoughtless people, Phocas made his public entry in a chariot drawn by four white horses; the revolt of the troops was rewarded by a lavish donative. . . . The ministers of death were despatched to Chalcedon; they dragged the emperor from his sanctuary; and the five sons of Maurice were successively murdered before the eyes of their agonizing parent. At each stroke, which he felt in his heart, he found strength to rehearse a pious ejaculation: "Thou art just, O Lord! and thy judgments are righteous." And such, in the last moments, was his rigid attachment to truth and justice, that he revealed to the soldiers the pious falsehood of a nurse who presented her own child in the place of a royal infant.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 46.

1349. CRUELTY, Love of. Scythians. In all their invasions of the civilized empires of the South, the Scythian shepherds have been uniformly actuated by a savage and destructive spirit. The laws of war, that restrain the exercise of national rapine and murder, are founded on two principles of substantial interest: the knowledge of the permanent benefits which may be obtained by a moderate use of conquest, and a just apprehension lest the desolation which we inflict on the enemy's country may be retaliated on our own. But these considerations of hope and fear are almost unknown in the pastoral state of nations. . . . After the Moguls had subdued the northern provinces of China, it was seriously proposed, not in the hour of victory and passion, but in calm, deliberate council, to exterminate all the inhabitants of that populous country, that the vacant land might be converted to the pasture of cattle. The firmness of a Chinese mandarin, who insinuated some principles of rational policy into the mind of Zingis, diverted him from the execution of this horrid design.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 34.

1350. CRUELTY, Maternal. Spartan. Cruelty, too, a quality extremely opposite to heroic virtue, was a strong ingredient in the Spartan system of manners. Paternal or maternal tenderness seemed perfectly unknown among this ferocious people. New-born children were publicly inspected by the elders of each tribe; and such as promised to be of a weak and delicate constitution were immediately put to death by drowning. At the festival of Diana children were scourged, sometimes even to death, in the presence of their mothers, who exhorted them, meantime, to suffer every extremity of pain without complaint or murmur. It is no wonder that such mothers should receive, without emotion, the intelligence of the death of a son in the field of battle; but is it possible to believe that on such occasions they should so far conquer nature as to express a transport of joy? What judgment must we form of the Spartan notions of patriotic virtue, when, to love their country, it was thought necessary to subdue and extinguish the strongest feelings of humanity, the first instinct of nature?—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 9.

1351. CRUELTY, Merciless. Bonaparte. [At the battle of Austerlitz] the flying Russians crowded on the frozen lakes. Napoleon, from the table-land of Pratzen, on the side of these lakes, saw the disaster which he had so well prepared. He ordered the battery of his guard to fire round shot on the ice that was unbroken, to complete the destruction of those who had taken refuge upon the frozen waters. The batteries fired on them till 6000 were either killed or drowned.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 25, p. 450.

1352. CRUELTY, Monster of. Roman Emperor or Caligula. Upon the death of his sister, Drusilla, he punished some for mourning for her, because they ought to have known she was a goddess; and put to death others for not mourning, because she was the sister of the emperor. In addition to all this, Caligula loaded the provinces with the most excessive taxes; and such was his avarice, that every day some of the citizens fell a sacrifice in the confiscations of their property. It would only create disgust were we to enter into any detail of the complicated and ingenious cruelties and the absurd extravagances of a madman—of the multiplied instances of his folly as well as of his depravity—his ridiculous mock campaigns—the temples he erected in honor of himself, where, in the character of his own priest, he offered sacrifices to himself, sometimes as Jupiter and sometimes as Juno. One day he chose to be Mercury, the next he was Bacchus or Hercules. At last, in the fourth year of his reign, this monster met with the fate which he deserved, and was assassinated by Chareas, a tribune of the prætorian guards, in the twenty-ninth year of his age.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1.

1353. CRUELTY, Natural. Samuel Johnson. JOHNSON: "Pity is not natural to man. Children are always cruel. Savages are always cruel. Pity is acquired and improved by the cultivation of reason. We may have uneasy sensations from seeing a creature in distress, without pity; for we have not pity unless we wish to relieve them. When I am on my way to dine with a friend, and, finding it late, have bid the coachman make haste, if I happen to attend when he whips his horses, I may feel unpleasantly that the animals are put to pain, but I do not wish him to desist. No, sir, I wish him to drive on."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 121.

1354. CRUELTY a Passion. Commodus. The Emperor Commodus was not, as he has been represented, a tiger born with an insatiate thirst of human blood, and capable, from his infancy, of the most inhuman actions. Nature had formed him of a weak rather than a wicked disposition. His simplicity and timidity rendered him the slave of his attendants, who gradually corrupted his mind. His cruelty, which at first obeyed the dictates of others, degenerated into habit, and at length became the ruling passion of his soul. [He was made ruler of Rome A.D. 180.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4.

1355. CRUELTY, Pleasure in. [Lucius Quintus Flamininus] had a favorite boy whom he carried with him, even when he commanded armies and governed provinces. One day as they were drinking, the boy, making his court to Lucius, said: "I love you so tenderly, that, preferring your satisfaction to my own, I left a show of gladiators to come to you, though I have never seen a man killed." Lucius, delighted with the flattery, made answer: "If that be all you need not be in the least uneasy, for I shall soon satisfy your longing." He immediately ordered a convict to be brought from the prison, and having sent for one of his lictors, commanded him to strike off the man's head in the room where they were carousing.—PLUTARCH'S FLAMININUS.

1356. CRUELTY to Prisoners. Black Hole. [In 1756 Surajah Dowlah, the nabob of Bengal, attacked the British factory at Calcutta. After two days' bombardment the fort surrendered, having the promise that their lives would be spared.] There were one hundred and forty-five men and one woman of this devoted company. They were to be secured for the night in the dungeon of the fort. Into that den eighteen feet by fourteen, with two small windows, were these one hundred and forty-six adults forced by the ferocious guard that the tyrant had set over them; and the door was closed. Of that night of horror, the relation given by Mr. Holwell [one of the prisoners] is one of the most powerful narratives of the extremity of suffering which was ever penned. The expedient of the prisoners to obtain more room and air, some sitting down, never to rise again, through their companions falling upon them; the calling out to the guard to fire and relieve them from their misery; the raging thirst ; the delirium ; the stupefaction ; the many dead trampled upon by the few living—these are horrors without a parallel in history or fiction.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 14, p. 223.

1357. CRUELTY in Punishment. Andronicus. [After an unsuccessful attempt to escape from the fury of his subjects, Andronicus, the Roman emperor and tyrant,] was dragged to the presence of Isaac Angelus, one of his victims, loaded with fetters, and a long chain round his neck. His eloquence, and the tears of his female companions, pleaded in vain for his life ; but, instead of the decencies of a legal execution, the new monarch abandoned the criminal to the numerous sufferers whom he had deprived of a father, a husband, or a friend. His teeth and hair, an eye and a hand, were torn from him, as a poor compensation for their loss ; and a short respite was allowed, that he might feel the bitterness of death. Astride on a camel, without any danger of a rescue, he was carried through the city, and the basest of the populace rejoiced to trample on the fallen majesty of their prince. After a thousand blows and outrages Andronicus was hung by the feet, between two pillars that supported the statues of a wolf and a sow ; and every hand that could reach the public enemy inflicted on his body some mark of ingenious or brutal cruelty, till two friendly or furious Italians, plunging their swords into his body, released him from all human punishment. In this long and painful agony, "Lord, have mercy upon me" and "Why will you bruise a broken reed?" were the only words that escaped from his mouth. Our hatred for the tyrant is lost in pity for the man.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 48.

1358. CRUELTY, Reaction of. Nero's. [Tacitus says] various forms of mockery were added to enhance their dying agonies. Covered with the skins of wild beasts [the Christians] . . . were doomed to die by the mangling of dogs, or by being nailed to crosses, or to be set on fire and burnt after twilight by way of nightly illumination. Nero offered his own gardens for this show. . . . Hence, guilty as the victims were [they were charged with hatred toward mankind], and deserving the worst of punishments, a feeling of compassion toward them began to rise, as men felt they were immolated, not for any advantage to the commonwealth, but to glut the savagery of a single man.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, p. 39.

1359. CRUELTY, Refined. Greek Emperor's Persecution. [Constantine Sylvanus, the leader of a Gnostic sect, fell a victim to Roman persecution at the hands of a minister named Simeon.] By a refinement of cruelty Simeon placed the unfortunate Sylvanus before a line of his disciples, who were commanded, as the price of their pardon and the proof of their repentance, to massacre their spiritual father. They turned aside from the impious office ; the stones dropped from their filial hands, and of the whole number only one executioner could be found, a new David, as he is styled by the Catholics, who boldly overthrew the giant of heresy. This apostate (Justus was his name) again deceived and betrayed his unsuspecting brethren.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 54.

1360. CRUELTY, Religious. Crusades. [In 1191, after the surrender of Acre to the Crusaders,] King Richard, aspiring to destroy the Turks, root and branch, . . . and to vindicate the Christian religion, on the Friday after the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary ordered twenty-seven hundred of the Turkish hostages to be led forth from the city and hanged. The soldiers marched forth with delight to fulfil his commands.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 21, p. 312.

1361. CRUELTY, Remorse from. Cloataire. [One of the early kings of France was] embittered by a rebellion stirred up by one of his own sons, whom he at length took prisoner, and condemned, together with his wife and daughters, to be burned alive. This horrible tragedy took place in 560, and the wretched Cloataire expired precisely a year afterward, a prey to the deepest remorse.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 4, § 2.

1362. CRUELTY, Royal. Constantine V. His reign was a long butchery of whatever was most noble or holy or innocent in his empire. In person the emperor assisted at the execution of his victims, surveyed their agonies, listened to their groans, and indulged, without satiating, his appetite for blood ; a plate of noses was accepted as a grateful offering, and his domestics were often scourged or mutilated by the royal hand.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 48.

1363. CRUELTY, Sectarian. Greek Church. During the reign [of Manuel] and that of his successor, Alexius, they [the Romans] were exposed at Constantinople to the reproach of foreigners, heretics, and favorites ; and this triple guilt was severely expiated in the tumult which announced the return and elevation of Andronicus. The people rose in arms ; from the Asiatic shore the tyrant despatched his troops and galleys to assist the national revenge ; and the hopeless resistance of the strangers served only to justify the rage and sharpen the daggers of the assassins. Neither age nor sex nor the ties of friendship or kindred could save the victims of national hatred and avarice and religious zeal ; the Latins were slaughtered in their houses and in the streets ; their quarter was reduced to ashes ; the clergy were burnt in their churches, and the sick in their hospitals ; and some estimate may be formed of the slain from the clemency which sold above four thousand Christians in perpetual slavery to the Turks. The priests and monks were the loudest and most active in the destruction of the schismatics ; and they chanted a thanksgiving to the Lord when the head of a Roman cardinal, the pope's legate, was severed from his body, fastened to the tail of a dog, and dragged, with savage mockery, through the city.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 60.

1364. CRUELTY, Shameful. James II. [The Duke of Monmouth's rebellion had been crushed, and his adherents were condemned to death.] So many dead bodies were quartered that the executioner stood ankle deep in blood. He was assisted by a poor man whose loyalty was suspected, and who was compelled to ransom his own life by seething the remains of his friends in pitch. The peasant who had consented to perform this hideous office afterward returned to his plough. But a mark like that of Cain was upon him. He was known through his village by the horrible name of Tom Boilman.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5.

1365. CRUELTY of Slavery. Lacedæmonians. The Helots were a neighboring people of Peloponnesus, whom they had subdued in war and reduced to servitude. They were numerous, and had at times attempted to shake off their yoke; whence it was judged a necessary policy to curb, to intimidate, and to weaken them by the most shocking inhumanity. It was not allowable to sell or to export them; but the youth were encouraged to put them to death for pastime. They went forth to the field to hunt them like wild beasts; and when at any time it was apprehended that those unhappy wretches had become so numerous as to endanger the State, the cryptia, or secret act—viz., a general massacre in the night—was ordained by law.—TITLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 9.

1366. CRUELTY taught. Spartans. The governors of the youth ordered the shrewdest of them from time to time to disperse themselves in the country provided only with daggers and some necessary provisions. In the day-time they hid themselves, and rested in the most private places they could find; but at night they sallied out into the roads, and killed all the Helots they could meet with. Nay, sometimes by day they fell upon them in the fields, and murdered the ablest and strongest of them. [LANGHORNE'S NOTE.] These poor wretches were marked out for slaves in their dress, their gesture, and, in short, in everything. They wore dogskin bonnets and sheepskin vests; they were forbidden to learn any liberal art, or to perform any act worthy of their masters. Once a day they received a certain number of stripes, for fear they should forget they were slaves; and, to crown all, they were liable to this cryptia, which was sure to be executed on all such as spoke, looked, or walked like freemen; a cruel and unnecessary expedient, and unworthy of a virtuous people.—PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

1367. CRUELTY, Terrible. Timour. [Leaving his main army at Damascus, Timour] crossed the desert of forty days' journey, with a select detachment, and ran to besiege Bagdad, a third time revolted. His vengeance was this time un pitying. The 100,000 Tartars whom he led to the siege of Bagdad received orders to bring him, each of them, the head of an insurgent. All perished, from the age of eight to that of eighty years, in Bagdad. But he once more saved the men of letters, the artists, the skilled mechanics, the priests, the poets, the historians—all those who give intelligence and immortality to the human species.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 325.

1368. ———. Timour the Tartar. [Timour besieged Siwas, the most opulent city of Asiatic Greece, which capitulated after receiving the promise that life should be spared.] But scarcely entered into Siwas, he inundated it with the blood of its defenders. Whether anger or policy, his ferocity made the East shudder. Four thousand Ottomans were buried alive to the neck, and thus awaited the end of their life and of their torture—a spectacle worthy of the brutality of Tartars, and which the ferocious animals do not exhibit in their mutual carnage.

The Christians, cast by couples into trenches covered with boards, and surcharged afterward with earth, prolonged for unknown days their subterranean agony under the tents of the Tartars, who heard their moanings. The brave were massacred, that the contagion of their courage might not gain upon the cowardly; the cowards died through their cowardice, which rendered them unworthy to live. Every pretext was good to consign to death. Timour caused to be immolated even the unfortunate lepers of the hospital of Siwas, lest their infirmity might be communicated to his Tartars, among whom it was unknown. With the exception of the male children fit for slavery, and the young girls fit for the harems, the entire population was destroyed.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 319.

1369. CRUELTY, Undetested. Roman Senators. In the hearing of that same Senate in A.D. 59, not long before St. Paul wrote his letter to Philémon, C. Cassius Longinus had gravely argued that the only security for the life of masters was to put into execution the sanguinary Silanian law, which enacted that, if a master was murdered, every one of his slaves, however numerous, however notoriously innocent, should be indiscriminately massacred. It was the senators of Rome who thronged forth to meet with adoring congratulations the miserable youth who came to them with his hands reeking with the blood of matricide. They offered thanksgivings to the gods for his worst cruelties, and obediently voted Divine honors to the dead infant, four months old, of the wife whom he afterward killed with a brutal kick.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, p. 17.

1370. CRUELTY, A Victor's. Roman Emperor Gallienus. There is still extant a most savage mandate from [the Emperor] Gallienus to one of his ministers, after the suppression of Ingenuus, who had assumed the purple in Illyricum. "It is not enough," says that soft but inhuman prince, "that you exterminate such as have appeared in arms; the chance of battle might have served me as effectually. The male sex of every age must be extirpated, provided that, in the execution of the children and old men, you can contrive means to save our reputation. Let every one die who has dropped an expression, who has entertained a thought against me—against me, the son of Valerian, the father and brother of so many princes. Remember that Ingenuus was made emperor; tear, kill, hew in pieces. I write to you with my own hand, and would inspire you with my own feelings."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 10.

1371. CRUELTY of War. Timour. Timour [the Tartar] was satisfied with the siege and destruction of Siwas or Sebaste, a strong city on the borders of Anatolia; and he revenged the indiscretion of the Ottoman on a garrison of 4000 Armenians, who were buried alive for the brave and faithful discharge of their duty.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 43.

1372. ———. Cæsar. Anxious debates were held among the beleaguered chiefs [Gauls in Alesia]. The faint-hearted wished to surrender before they were starved. Others were in favor of a desperate effort to cut their way through or die. One speech Cæsar preserves for its remarkable and frightful ferocity. A prince of Auvergne said that the Romans conquered to enslave and beat down the laws and liberties of free nations under the lictors' axes, and he proposed that, sooner than yield, they should kill and eat those who were useless for fighting. Vercingetorix was of noble nature. To prevent the adoption of so horrible an expedient, he ordered the peaceful inhabitants, with their wives and children, to leave the town. Cæsar forbade them to pass his lines. Cruel—but war is cruel; and where a garrison is to be reduced by famine the laws of it are inexorable.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 19.

1373. CRUELTY to Woman. Clotaire. [Brunehaut, Queen of Austrasia, fell into the hands of the King of Neustria, whose name was] Clotaire. He overwhelmed her with a torrent of reproaches, abandoned her for three days to every kind of torture and indignity, and then caused her to be fastened to the tail of a wild horse, so that the wretched queen's body was dragged, torn, and trampled into fragments. The remains were collected, and the ashes scattered to the winds.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 4, § 5.

1374. CRUELTY in Worship. Ancient Druids. In these graves [of England], and upon these altars, the Druids offered sacrifices of various kinds, the most acceptable of which were human victims. This was not to be wondered at, considering that it was their opinion that the Supreme Deity placed his chief delight in blood and slaughter. . . . Every ninth month there was a sacrifice offered up to the gods of nine human victims; and in the first month of every ninth year was held an extraordinary solemnity, which was marked with dreadful slaughter.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 6.

1375. CRUSADERS, Numerous. Six Millions. We depend not on the eyes or knowledge, but on the belief and fancy, of a chaplain of Count Baldwin, in the estimate of six hundred thousand pilgrims able to bear arms, besides the priests and monks, the women and children of the Latin camp. The reader starts; and before he is recovered from his surprise, I shall add, on the same testimony, that if all who took the cross had accomplished their vow, above six millions would have migrated from Europe to Asia. Under this oppression of faith, I derive some relief from a more sagacious and thinking writer, who, after the same review of the cavalry, accuses the credulity of the priest of Chartres, and even doubts whether the Cisalpine regions (in the geography of a Frenchman) were sufficient to produce and pour forth such incredible multitudes. The coolest scepticism will remember, that of these religious volunteers great numbers never beheld Constantinople and Nice. Of enthusiasm the influence is irregular and transient; many were detained at home by reason or cowardice, by poverty or weakness; and many were repulsed by the obstacles of the way, the more insuperable as they were unforeseen, to these ignorant fanatics.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58.

1376. CRUSADES, Origin of. Peter the Hermit. About twenty years after the conquest of Jerusalem by the Turks, the holy sepulchre was visited by a hermit by the name of Peter, a native of Amiens, in the province of Picardy in France. His resentment and sympathy were excited by his own injuries and the oppression of the Christian name; he mingled his tears with those of the patriarch, and earnestly inquired if no hopes of relief could be entertained from the Greek emperors of the East. The patriarch exposed the vices and weakness of the successors of Constantine. "I will rouse," exclaimed the hermit, "the martial nations of Europe in your cause;" and Europe was obedient to the call of the hermit.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58.

1377. CULTURE, Improvement by. Germany. The climate of ancient Germany has been mollified, and the soil fertilized, by the labor of ten centuries from the time of Charlemagne. The same extent of ground which at present maintains, in ease and plenty, a million of husbandmen and artificers, was unable to supply a hundred thousand lazy warriors with the simple necessities of life.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9.

1378. CURE, Imaginary. Mohammedans. On his back he had a round, fleshy tumor of the size of a pigeon's egg; its furrowed surface was covered with hair, and its base was surrounded by black moles. This was considered as the seal of his prophetic mission, at least during the latter part of his career, by his followers, who were so devout that they found a cure for their ailments in drinking the water in which he had bathed; and it must have been very refreshing, for he perspired profusely, and his skin exhaled a strong smell.—SPRENGER'S LIFE OF MOHAMMED, p. 84.

1379. CURE, Superstitious. King's Evil. [Dr. Samuel Johnson was afflicted with scrofula in his childhood, which disfigured his countenance, injured his visual nerves, and destroyed the sight of one eye.] It has been said that he contracted this grievous malady from his nurse. His mother, yielding to the superstitious notion, which, it is wonderful to think, prevailed so long in this country, as to the virtue of the regal touch—a notion which our kings encouraged, and to which a man of such inquiry and such judgment as Carte could give credit—carried him to London, where he was actually touched by Queen Anne.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 6.

1380. CURES fanciful. Weakness. Queen Anne revived the ceremony of touching for the king's evil, by which all English monarchs, from the time of Edward the Confessor, whether saints or sinners, had asserted the miraculous power of the wearer of the "golden rigol." William III. was profane enough not to believe in this power. William was once prevailed upon to touch for the malady which kings could cure, and he said to the patient that he prayed God to heal him and grant him more wisdom at the same time.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 17, p. 272.

1381. CURES, Fraudulent. King's Evil. An old man who was a witness in a case described how the good Queen [Anne] had touched him when a child [for the cure of the king's evil]. He was asked whether he was really cured, upon which he answered, with a significant smile, that he believed himself never to have had a complaint that deserved to be considered as the Evil, but that his parents were poor, and had no objection to the bit of gold—the angel of gold—with the impress of St. Michael, which was hung about the patient's neck.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 17, p. 272.

1382. CURIOSITIES, Indifference to. General Grant. [At Naples] he climbed to the castle of San Martin, now a museum. . . . They spent nearly an hour in examining the curiosities, in which Mrs. Grant seemed to take more interest than the General. . . . When the guide showed him the portrait of the man who gave the collection to Naples, he dryly remarked, in English: "Well, if I had a museum like this, I would give it to Naples, or anybody who would take it."—TRAVELS OF GENERAL GRANT, p. 95.

1383. CURIOSITY, Destructive. Empedocles. [A Pythagorean] . . . who attained considerable eminence in physical science, and who is said to have thrown himself into the crater of Mount Etna, either from the desire of exploring the cause of its eruptions, or of propagating the belief that the gods had caught him up in heaven; it is a wiser and more charitable supposition, that he owed his death to a laudable but rash curiosity.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9.

1385. CUSTOM, Reign of. "Ducking." At the bridewell, in Liverpool, Howard found a singular custom prevailing. Every woman, on her admission to the jail, was brought into the bath-room clad only in a flannel chemise, and placed in a chair with her back to the bath-tub. This chair turned on a hinge, and when the signal was given it was turned over, and the woman with it, who went backward into the water over head and ears. This operation was repeated three times, when the woman was considered initiated. [John] Howard inquired why the men were not subjected to this ducking; but he could only learn that such was the custom at Liverpool.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 64.

1386. DANCING, Ceremonious. Indian. Though generally sedate in manners and serious in behavior, the Red men at times gave themselves up to merry-making and hilarity. The dance was universal—not the social dance of civilized nations, but the dance of ceremony, of religion, and of war. Sometimes the warriors danced alone, but frequently the women joined in the wild exercise, circling around and around, chanting the weird, monotonous songs of the tribes.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 1, p. 49.

1387. DANCING, Delight in. Sixteenth Century. [With the people, high and low, it was a favorite amusement.] Upon the rushes of the torch-lighted hall the courtiers danced their grave measures and corantos to the airs of Queen Elizabeth's "Virginal Book;" and the peasant youths and maidens, on the village green, saw the sun go down, as they tripped "the comely country-round."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16, p. 250.

1388. DANCING, Mystic. West Indians. The dances to which the natives seemed so immoderately addicted, and which had been at first considered by the Spaniards mere idle pastimes, were found to be often ceremonials of a serious and mystic character. They form, indeed, a singular and important feature throughout the customs of the aboriginals of the New World. In these are typified, by signs well understood by the initiated, and, as it were, by hieroglyphic action, their historical events, their projected enterprises, their hunting, their ambuscades, and their battles, resembling in some respects the Pyrrhic dances of the ancients.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 6, ch. 10.

1389. DANCING, Opposed to. Puritans. [In 1593] the Puritans denounced all dancing in mixed companies of the sexes. The dancing schools, which then abounded, were, they said, for teaching "the noble science of heathen devilry." They held that "men by themselves, and women by themselves" might dance without sin, "to recreate the mind oppressed with some great toil and labor."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16, p. 250.

1390. DANGER, Contempt for. William the Red. [The son of William I., the Conqueror.] Normandy had been pledged to him by his brother Robert in exchange for a sum which enabled the duke to march in the first Crusade for the delivery of the Holy Land, and a rebellion at Le Mans was subdued by the fierce energy with which William flung himself at the news of it into the first boat he found, and crossed the Channel in face of a storm. "Kings never drown," he replied, contemptuously, to the remonstrances of his followers.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 116.

1392. DANGER, Unconsciousness of. Explosion. Once upon a time a London exquisite descended into a coal mine on a voyage of exploration and discovery; he saw everything—Davy lamps, blind horses, trucks of coal rolling along subterranean tramways. Seated on a cask to rest himself, he proceeded to question the swarthy miner, who was his conductor, concerning many things, and especially about the operation of blasting. "And whereabouts, my man," condescendingly said he—"whereabouts do you keep your powder?" "Please, sir," replied the swart one, "you're a-sittin' on it!" Charles was in a world to him all dark and subterranean, and sitting on a powder-mine, of the existence of which he had no knowledge, although it was beneath his throne.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 4, p. 89.

1394. DARKNESS feared. In Day-time. In 1679 the Londoners were frightened, as if it were a terrible omen, by a great darkness in London on a Sunday morning, "so that the people in church could not see to read in their Bibles." —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 21, p. 341.

1395. DAYS, Inauspicious. Black Day. As Lucullus was going to pass the river to fight Tigranes the tyrant, some of his officers admonished him to beware of that day, which had been an inauspicious, or (as they called it) a black one to the Romans. For on that day Cæpio's army was defeated by the Cimbri. Lucullus returned that memorable answer, "I will make this day an auspicious one for Rome." It was the sixth of October. [He won a glorious and complete victory.] —PLUTARCH'S LUCULLUS.

1396. DAYS observed. Samuel Johnson. It was his custom to observe certain days with a pious abstraction—viz., New-Year's day, the day of his wife's death, Good Friday, Easter-day, and his own birthday. He this year says: "I have now spent fifty-five years in resolving, having, from the earliest time almost that I can remember, been forming schemes of a better life. I have done nothing. The need of doing, therefore, is pressing, since the time of doing is short. O God, grant me to resolve aright, and to keep my resolutions, for Jesus Christ's sake! Amen." —BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 134.

1397. DEAD, Charity for the. Agésilas. After the death of Lysander, Agésilas found out a conspiracy which that general had formed against him immediately after his return from Asia. And he was inclined to show the public what kind of man Lysander really was, by exposing an oration found among his papers, which had been composed for him by Cleon of Halicarnassus, and was to have been delivered by him to the people, in order to facilitate the innovations he was meditating in the constitution. But one of the senators having the perusal of it, and finding it a very plausible composition, advised him "not to dig Lysander out of his grave, but rather to bury the oration with him." The advice appeared reasonable, and he suppressed the paper. —PLUTARCH'S AGESILAUS.

1398. DEAD, Consciousness of the. American Indians. On burying her daughter the Chipewewa mother adds not only snow-shoes and beads and moccasins, but (sad emblem of woman's lot in the wilderness!) the carrying belt and the paddle. "I know my daughter will be restored to me," she once said, as she clipped a lock of hair for a memorial; "by this lock of hair I shall discover her, for I shall take it with me"—alluding to the day [of her own burial]. —BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

1399. DEAD respected, The. Solon's Law. That law of Solon's is also justly commended which forbids men to speak ill of the dead. For piety requires us to consider the deceased as sacred; justice calls upon us to spare those that are not in being; and good policy to prevent the perpetuating of hatred. —PLUTARCH'S SOLON.

1400. DEAD, Unburied. Parsees in India. They cannot burn them, as do the Hindoos, lest the touch of death should pollute the flames; nor can they bury them in the earth, nor in the sea, for earth and water and air are alike sacred. They therefore expose the bodies of their dead to be devoured by birds of the air. —GENERAL GRANT'S TRAVELS, p. 287.

1401. DEATH, Admirable. Mahomet's. The conclusion of his life was admirable. "Let him," said he, "to whom I have done violence or injustice now appear, and I am ready to make him reparation." For several days preceding his death he ordered himself to be carried to the mosque, and there harangued the people with wonderful eloquence, which, from a dying man, had a powerful effect. It is by no means improbable that he believed himself inspired—as the singular success of all his enterprises might have persuaded a mind of that enthusiastic turn of a divine interposition in his favor. It is certain that with his latest breath he continued to inculcate the doctrines of his new religion. He recommended to his followers to keep the sword unsheathed till they had driven all infidels out of Arabia; and in the agonies of death he declared to Ayesha, the best beloved of his wives, that God, by the mouth of the angel Gabriel, had given him the choice of life or death, and that he had preferred the latter. —TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 1.

1402. DEATH, Apprehension of. Cæsar. Cæsar was more and more weary. He knew that the Senate hated him; he knew they would kill him if they could. All these men whose lips were running over with adulation were longing to drive their daggers into him. He was willing to live if they would let him live; but, for himself, he had ceased to care about it. He disdained to take precautions against assassination. On his first return from Spain he had been attended by a guard; but he dismissed it in spite of the remonstrances of his friends, and went daily into the Senate house alone and unarmed. He spoke often of his danger with entire openness. . . . "Better," he said, "to die at once than live in perpetual dread of treason." —FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 26.

1403. DEATH by Attrition. Samuel Johnson. Johnson mentioned Dr. Barry's System of Physics. "He was a man," said he, "who had acquired a high reputation in Dublin, came over to England, and brought his reputation with him, but had not great success. His notion was, that pulsation occasions death by attrition; and that, therefore, the way to preserve life is to retard pulsation. But we know that pulsation is strongest in infants, and that we increase in growth while it operates in its regular course; so it cannot be the cause of destruction." Soon after this he said something very flattering to Mrs. Thrale, which I do not recollect; but it concluded with wishing her long life. "Sir," said I, "if Dr. Barry's system be true, you have now shortened Mrs. Thrale's life, perhaps, some minutes by accelerating her pulsation."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON.

1404. DEATH, Banquet of. Cæsar in Africa. The end of Juba and Petreius had a wild splendor about it. They had fled together from Thapsus to Zama, Juba's own principal city, and they were refused admission. Disdaining to be taken prisoners, as they knew they inevitably would be, they went to a country-house in the neighborhood belonging to the king. There, after a last sumptuous banquet, they agreed to die like warriors by each other's hands. Juba killed Petreius, and then ran upon his own sword.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 24.

1405. ———. Antony. Antony, concluding that he could not die more honorably than in battle, determined to attack Cæsar at the same time both by sea and land. The night preceding the execution of this design he ordered his servants at supper to render him their best services that evening, and fill the wine round plentifully, for the day following they might belong to another master, while he lay extended on the ground, no longer of consequence either to them or to himself. [He lost the battle, and died by suicide.]—PLUTARCH'S ANTONY.

1406. DEATH, Bravado toward. Duke of Guise. The Duke of Guise received repeated secret intimations of the assassination in preparation for him, but treated them with lofty disdain. "They dare not," he exclaimed; and added that circumstances had brought him to such a pitch of desperation that, even if he saw death coming in at one of the windows, he would not take the trouble to leave the room to escape him. [He was shortly after destroyed by his enemies.]—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 17, § 11.

1407. DEATH, Bravery in. William Howard Strafford. It was pressed upon [Lord] Strafford to ask for a carriage to convey him to the place of execution, fearing that the fury of the people would anticipate the executioner and tear from his hands the victim, denounced by Pym and the orators of the House of Commons as the public enemy. "No," replied Strafford; "I know how to look death and the people in the face; whether I die by the hand of the executioner or by the fury of the populace, if it should so please them, matters little to me." . . . Strafford's brother accompanied him, weeping. "Brother," said he, "why do you grieve thus; do you see anything in my life or death which can cause you to feel any shame? Do I tremble like a criminal, or boast like an atheist? Come, be firm, and think only that this is my third marriage, and that you are my bridesman. This block," pointing to that upon which he was about to lay his head, "will be my pillow, and I shall repose there well, without pain, grief, or fear."—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 15.

1408. DEATH, Bribery of. Riches. [In 1447 Cardinal Henry Beaufort died, aged eighty years. On his death-bed he is reported by his chaplain to have said,] Why should I die, having so much riches? If the whole realm would save my life, I am able by policy to get it, or by riches to buy it. Fie, will not death be hired, nor will money do anything?—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 6, p. 96.

1409. DEATH, Choice in. Sudden. The same evening, the 14th of March, Cæsar was at a "Last Supper" at the house of Lepidus. The conversation turned on death, and on the kind of death which was most to be desired. Cæsar, who was signing papers while the rest were talking, looked up and said, "A sudden one."—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 26.

1410. DEATH, Companions in. Despair. Some violences committed against the Mantchou Tartars had given high provocation to this warlike people, and they determined to invade the empire. Their attempt was favored by an insurrection in some of the provinces; the Tartars met with very little resistance. The rebel Chinese, headed by a mandarin of the name of Litching, joined themselves to the Tartarian army, and both together took possession of the imperial city of Peking. The conduct of the Chinese emperor is unparalleled in history; without making the smallest attempt to defend his capital or maintain possession of his throne, he shut himself up in his palace, and commanded forty of his wives to hang themselves in his presence; he then cut off his daughter's head, and ended the catastrophe by hanging himself.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 24.

1411. ———. American Indians. The chief within whose territory De Soto died selected two young, well-proportioned Indians to be put to death, saying the usage of the country was, when any lord died, to kill Indians to wait on him and serve him by the way.—BANCROFT'S HIST. U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

1412. DEATH, Composure in. Duke of Monmouth. He then accosted John Ketch, the executioner, a wretch who had butchered many brave and noble victims, and whose name has, during a century and a half, been vulgarly given to all who have succeeded him in his odious office. "Here," said the duke, "are six guineas for you. Do not hack me as you did my Lord Russell. I have heard that you struck him three or four times. My servant will give you some more gold if you do the work well." He then undressed, felt the edge of the axe, expressed some fear that it was not sharp enough, and laid his head on the block. The divines in the mean time continued to ejaculate with great energy, "God accept your repentance; God accept your imperfect repentance." [See No. 1979.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5.

1413. DEATH conquered. Immortality. The first exploits of Trajan were against the Dacians, the most warlike of men, who dwelt beyond the Danube, and who, during the reign of Domitian, had insulted, with impunity, the majesty of Rome. To the strength and fierceness of barbarians they added a contempt for life, which was derived from a warm persuasion of the immortality and transmigration of the soul.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1.

1414. ———. Sir Henry Vane. [Condemned by Charles II., and awaiting execution.] A friend spoke of prayer, that for the present the cup of death might be averted. "Why should we fear death?" answered Vane; "I find it rather shrinks from me than I from it."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 11.

1415. DEATH conquers. William the Conqueror. The death-bed of William, according to the chroniclers, was a death-bed of repentance. He had always made a profession of religion, and he was now surrounded by bishops and confessors. He spoke, it is related, of the rivers of blood he had shed. He lamented his barbarities in England. [See No. 436.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 16, p. 218.

1416. DEATH, Contempt of. Scandinavians. This characteristic of an absolute contempt of death . . . was common to all the great parent stock. The poet Lucan . . . assigns its true cause—the belief of a future state, where rewards were to be bestowed solely on the brave. To enjoy the disgrace of dying a natural death, and thus forfeiting the joys of Paradise, the ferocious Scandinavians had often recourse to self-destruction. An Icelandic author mentions a rock in Sweden from which the old men frequently precipitated themselves into the sea, in order that they might go directly to the hall of Odin.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 6.

1417. ———. Scandinavians. Death-song of King Regner Lodbrog . . . King of Denmark . . . about the end of the eighth century, or beginning of the ninth. . . . Lodbrog seems to derive the highest pleasure from recounting all the acts of slaughter and carnage that he had committed in his lifetime. These were his only consolations; they were, in his idea, a certain passport to the joys of Paradise, and insured for him a distinguished place at the banquet of Odin. After enumerating a series of heroic deeds, but all of a most atrocious and sanguinary nature, he thus concludes: "What is more beautiful than to see the heroes pushing on through the battle, though fainting with their wounds? What boots it that the timid youth flies from the combat? he shall not escape from misery; who can avoid the fate which is ordained for him? I did not dream that I should have fallen a sacrifice to Ælla, whose shores I have covered with heaps of the slain. But there is a never-failing consolation for my spirit—the table of Odin is prepared for the brave. There the hero shall know no grief. There we shall quaff the amber liquor from the capacious skulls. I will not tremble when I approach the hall of the god of death. Now the serpents gnaw my vitals; but it is a cordial to my soul that my enemy shall quickly follow me, for my sons will revenge my death. War was my delight from my youth, and from my childhood I was pleased with the bloody spear. No sigh shall disgrace my last moments. The immortals will not disdain to admit me into their presence. Here let me end my song—the heavenly virgins summon me away—the hours of my life are at an end—I exult and smile at death!"—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 6.

1418. DEATH, Cowardly. Nero. The poor wretch who, without a pang, had caused so many brave Romans and so many innocent Christians to be murdered, could not summon up resolution to die. He devised every operative incident of which he could think. When even his most degraded slaves urged him to have sufficient manliness to save himself from the fearful infamies which otherwise awaited him, he ordered his grave to be dug, and fragments of marble to be collected for its adornment, and water and wood for his funeral pyre, perpetually whining, "What an artist to perish!" Meanwhile a courier arrived for Phaon. Nero snatched his despatches out of his hand, and read that the Senate had decided that he should be punished in the ancestral fashion as a public enemy. Asking what the ancestral fashion was, he was informed that he would be stripped naked and scourged to death with rods, with his head thrust into a fork. Horrified at this, he seized two daggers, and after theatrically trying their edges, sheathed them again, with the excuse that the fatal moment had not yet arrived! Then he bade Sporus begin to sing his funeral song, and begged some one to show him how to die. Even his own intense shame at his cowardice was an insufficient stimulus, and he whiled away the time in rapid epigrams and pompous quotations. The sound of horses' hoofs then broke on his ears, and, venting one more Greek quotation, he held the dagger to his throat. It was driven home by Epaphroditus, one of his literary slaves. At this moment the centurion who came to arrest him rushed in. . . . So died the last of the Cæsars!—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 4, p. 44.

1419. DEATH, Deceived in. By Friends. [Henry V. was on his death-bed, and] having delivered his last wishes, he asked the physicians how long he might expect to live. They said the Almighty had power to restore him to health. He repeated the question, requiring a direct answer. The answer was, Not more than two hours. KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 5, p. 74.

1420. DEATH, Deception in. Priest. [The Duchess of Portsmouth, one of the king's mistresses, proposed a priest for the dying king, Charles II.] The duke's orders were obeyed; and even the physicians withdrew. The back door was then opened, and Father Huddleston entered. A cloak had been thrown over his sacred vestments, and his shaven crown was concealed by a flowing wig. "Sir," said the duke, "this good man once saved your life. He now comes to save your soul." Charles faintly answered, "He is welcome." Huddleston went through his part better than had been expected. He knelt by the bed, listened to the confession, pronounced the absolution, and administered extreme unction.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 407.

1421. DEATH, Defiant in. Charles XII. [King of Sweden at Frederickshall.] At the siege of this town, on November 30, 1718 (old style), this inveterate warrior received the fatal blow which ended his troublous and eventful career. He was struck in the head with a cannon ball, and though death must have been instantaneous, he was found with his right hand firmly grasping the handle of his sword, so prompt was he to put himself in an attitude of defence.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 2, p. 33.

1422. DEATH, Encouragement in. God liveth. [At the death of Mahomet] fanaticism alone could suggest a ray of hope and consolation. "How can he be dead, our witness, our intercessor, our mediator, with God? By God he is not dead; like Moses and Jesus, he is wrapped in a holy trance, and speedily will he return to his faithful people." The evidence of sense was disregarded; and Omar, unsheathing his cimeter, threatened to strike off the heads of the infidels who should dare to affirm that the prophet was no more. The tumult was appeased by the weight and moderation of Abubeker. "Is it Mahomet," said he to Omar and the multitude, "or the God of Mahomet, whom you worship? The God of Mahomet liveth forever; but the apostle was a mortal like ourselves, and, according to his own prediction, he has experienced the common fate of mortality." He was piously interred by the hands of his nearest kinsman, on the same spot on which he expired.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50.

1423. DEATH, Fear of. Samuel Johnson. Mr. Henderson, with whom I had sauntered in the venerable walks of Merton College, and found him a very learned and pious man, supped with us. Dr. Johnson surprised him not a little by acknowledging, with a look of horror, that he was much oppressed by the fear of death. The amiable Dr. Adams suggested that God was infinitely good. JOHNSON: "That He is infinitely good, as far as the perfection of His nature will allow, I certainly believe; but it is necessary for good upon the whole, that individuals should be punished. As to an individual, therefore, He is not infinitely good; and as I cannot be sure that I have fulfilled the conditions on which salvation is granted, I am afraid I may be one of those who shall be damned." (Looking dismally.) DR. ADAMS: "What do you mean by damned?" JOHNSON (passionately and loudly): "Sent to hell, sir, and punished everlastingly." DR. ADAMS: "I don't believe that doctrine." JOHNSON: "Hold, sir; do you believe that some will be punished at all?" DR. ADAMS: "Being excluded from heaven will be a punishment; yet there may be no great positive suffering." JOHNSON: "Well, sir; but if you admit any degree of punishment, there is an end of your argument for infinite goodness, simply considered; for infinite goodness would inflict no punishment whatever. There is not infinite goodness, physically considered; morally, there is."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 524.

1424. — — —. The Druids. They appear to have taught the immortality of the soul, or rather the transmigration of souls, and a future state of rewards and punishments. "They lay special stress," says Cæsar, "upon the doctrine that souls do not perish, but pass after death into other bodies; considering this as a most powerful stimulus to bravery and courage, since it tends to remove altogether the fear of death."—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 1, § 10-12.

1425. DEATH, Feast of. American Aborigines. Of the strength and ardor of their affections there can be no evidence so strong as that which arises from their treatment of the dead. Believing in the immortality of the soul, they bury along with the deceased his bow and arrows, together with the most splendid ornaments which belonged to him. They attend him to the grave with the deepest manifestations of sorrow, and those who are his nearest relations retire for a great length of time to their huts, and refuse to take any concern in the active occupations of the tribe. But this is not all; their concern for the dead is manifested in a manner yet more striking, by a ceremony the most solemn and the most awfully affecting that imagination can devise. At stated periods is held what is termed the feast of the dead, or the feast of souls, when all the bodies of those who have died since the last ceremony of that kind are taken out of their graves, and brought together from the greatest distances to one place. A great pit is dug in the ground; and thither, at a certain time, each person, attended by his family and friends, marches in solemn silence, bearing the dead body of a son, father, or a brother. These are deposited in the pit, from which each person takes a handful of earth, which he preserves afterward with the most religious care.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 21.

1426. DEATH, Fortitude in. American Indians. [Brébeuf, the Jesuit missionary, describes the tortures of an Iroquois prisoner, preceded by a feast.] To the crowd of his guests he declared: "My brothers, I am going to die; make merry around me with good heart; I am a man; I fear neither death nor your torments," and he sang aloud. . . . Torments lasted till after sunrise, when the wretched victim, bruised, gashed, mutilated, half roasted and scalped, was carried out of the village and hacked in pieces.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

1427. DEATH, An honorable. Bunyan. His end was characteristic. It was brought on by exposure when he was engaged in an act of charity. A quarrel had broken out in a family at Reading with which Bunyan had some acquaintance. A father had taken offence at his son, and threatened to disinherit him. Bunyan undertook a journey on horseback from Bedford to Reading in the hope of reconciling them. He succeeded, but at the cost of his life. Returning by London, he was overtaken on the road by a storm of rain, and was wetted through before he could find shelter. The chill, falling on a constitution already weakened by illness, brought on fever. He was able to reach the house of Mr. Strudwick, one of his London friends; but he never left his bed afterward. In ten days he was dead.—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 9.

1428. DEATH, Impassioned. Alexander. Whole days and nights were consumed in riot and debauchery . . . at Ecbatana. . . . Amid these tumultuous pleasures the death of Hephæstion, whom Alexander loved with sincere affection, threw him into a paroxysm of despair. He commanded the physicians who attended him to be put to death; he accused the gods as conspiring with them to deprive him of a life more dear to him than his own; he ordered a public mourning, and that the sacred fires should be extinguished through all Asia, an omen which both his friends and enemies regarded as of the blackest import.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4.

1429. DEATH, Information of. Samuel Johnson. Johnson, with that native fortitude which, amid all his bodily distress and mental sufferings, never forsook him, asked Dr. Brocklesby, as a man in whom he had confidence, to tell him plainly whether he could recover. "Give me," said he, "a direct answer." The doctor, having first asked him if he could bear the whole truth, which way soever it might lead, and being answered that he could, declared that, in his opinion, he could not recover without a miracle. "Then," said Johnson, "I will take no more physic, not even my opiates; for I have prayed that I may render up my soul to God unclouded." In this resolution he persevered, and, at the same time, used only the weakest kinds of sustenance Being pressed by Mr. Windham to take somewhat more generous nourishment, lest too low a diet should have the very effect which he dreaded, by debilitating his mind, he said: "I will take anything but inebriating sustenance."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 562.

1430. DEATH, Patriotic. Captain Nathan Hale. September, 1776. [The British entered New York.] He volunteered to venture under disguise within the British lines. . . . He was seized, . . . frankly avowed his name and rank in the American army. . . . Howe ordered him to be executed the next morning. . . . As he ascended the gallows, he said: "I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 7.

1431. DEATH permitted. Mahomet. In a familiar discourse he mentioned his special prerogative; that the angel of death was not allowed to take his soul till he had respectfully asked the permission of the prophet. The request was granted; and Mahomet immediately fell into the agony of his dissolution.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50.

1432. DEATH, Prayer in. Mahomet. His head was reclined on the lap of Ayesha, the best beloved of all his wives; he fainted with the violence of pain; recovering his spirits, he raised his eyes toward the roof of the house, and, with a steady look, though a faltering voice, uttered the last broken though articulate words: "O God! . . . pardon my sins. . . . Yes . . . I come . . . among my fellow-citizens on high;" and thus peaceably expired on a carpet spread upon the floor.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50.

1433. — — —. Luther. His friends comforted him, and administered medicines. But again he spoke: "I am passing away; I shall give up my spirit." Then he repeated in Latin, quickly and three times in succession, the words, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit; Thou hast redeemed me, Thou faithful God."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 25, p. 195.

1434. — — —. Cromwell. "Lord, although I am a wretched and miserable creature, I am in covenant with Thee through grace, and I may, I will, come unto Thee for my people. Thou hast made me a mean instrument to do them some good, and Thee service; and many of them have set too high a value upon me, though others wish and would be glad of my death. But, Lord, however Thou dost dispose of me, continue to go on, and do good for them. Give them consistency of judgment, one heart, and mutual love; and go on to deliver them, and with the work of reformation, and make the name of Christ glorious in the world. Teach those who look too much upon thy instruments to depend more upon thyself. Pardon such as desire to trample upon the dust of a poor worm, for they are thy people too; and pardon the folly of this short prayer, for Jesus Christ His sake, and give us a good night if it be thy pleasure."—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 17, p. 223.

1435. DEATH, Preparation for. German Barbarians. All agreed that a life spent in arms, and a glorious death in battle, were the best preparations for a happy futurity, either in this or in another world.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9.

1436. — — —. Mahomet. His mortal disease was a fever of fourteen days, which deprived him by intervals of the use of reason. As soon as he was conscious of his danger he edified his brethren by the humility of his virtue or penitence. "If there be any man," said the apostle from the pulpit, "whom I have unjustly scourged, I submit my own back to the lash of retaliation. Have I aspersed the reputation of a Mussulman? let him proclaim my thoughts in the face of the congregation. Has any one been despoiled of his goods? the little that I possess shall compensate the principal and the interest of the debt." "Yes," replied a voice from the crowd, "I am entitled to three drams of silver." Mahomet heard the complaint, satisfied the demand, and thanked his creditor for accusing him in this world rather than at the day of judgment.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50.

1437. — — —. Samuel Johnson. About eight or ten days before his death, when Dr. Brocklesby paid him his morning visit, he seemed very low and desponding, and said: "I have been as a dying man all night." He then emphatically broke out in the words of Shakespeare:

"Canst thou not minister to a mind diseas'd;
Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow;
Raze out the written troubles of the brain;
And, with some sweet oblivious antidote,
Cleanse the stuff'd bosom of that perilous stuff

Which weighs upon the heart?"
To which Dr. Brocklesby readily answered, from the same great poet:

"— therein the patient Must minister to himself."

—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 658.

1438. — — —. Capture of Cordova. When the result of the battle was known the leading citizen, who had headed the revolt against Caesar, gathered all that belonged to him into a heap, poured turpentine over it, and, after a last feast with his family, burnt himself, his house, his children, and servants.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 25.

1439. DEATH, Reflections in. Cardinal Wolsey. On his death-bed his thoughts still clung to the prince whom he had served. "Had I but served God as diligently as I have served the king," murmured the dying man, "He would not have given me over in my gray hairs. But this is my due reward for my pains and study, not regarding my service to God, but only my duty to my prince."—ENGLISH PEOPLE, § 562.

1440. DEATH, Results of. Christian's. They testified their attachment for the cause of the pope by the murder of the Calvinist Anne du Bourg, a heroic confessor of the Protestant faith. "Six feet of earth for my body, and the infinite heavens for my soul, is what I shall soon have," cried Anne du Bourg at sight of the scaffold, and in presence of her executioners.—LAMARTINE'S MARY STUART, p. 7.

1441. DEATH, Sayings in. Sir Henry Vane. When he attempted to speak the trumpets sounded to drown his voice. Enthusiasm wept for him while it admired him! At last he turned aside, exclaiming, "It is a bad cause which cannot hear the words of a dying man." He seems to have been permitted to pray a little in peace; such sentences as the following fell from him, recorded by Sykes: "Bring us, O Lord, into the true mystical Sabbath, that we may cease from our works, rest from our labors, and become a meet habitation for thy Spirit," etc., etc. His last words were: "Father, glorify thy servant in the sight of men, that he may glorify Thee in the discharge of his duties to Thee and to his country." Thereupon he stretched out his arms; in an instant swift fell the stroke, and the head of one of the greatest and purest beings that ever adorned our world rolled on the scaffold!—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 18, p. 254.

1442. DEATH, A seeming. Swedenborg. While Swedenborg was living in Sweden, in 1751, his old friend and coadjutor, Polheim, died; and Swedenborg was favored with a view of both sides of his grave. Writing in his "Spiritual Diary," he says: "Polheim died on Monday, and spoke with me on Thursday. I was invited to the funeral. He saw the hearse, the attendants, and the whole procession. He also saw them let down the coffin into the grave, and conversed with me while it was going on, asking me why they buried him, when he was alive. And when the priest pronounced that he would rise again at the day of judgment, he asked why this was, when he had already risen. He wondered that such a belief should prevail, considering that he was even now alive; he also wondered at the belief in the resurrection of the body, for he said he felt that he was in the body."—SWEDENBORG, ch. 10, p. 77.

1443. DEATH, Self-evoked. Marius. Marius [one of the thirty Roman tyrants] was killed by a soldier who had formerly served as a workman in his shop, and who exclaimed, as he struck, "Behold the sword which thyself hast forged!"—NOTE IN GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 10, p. 323.

1444. DEATH, Strength for. Cromwell. He called for his Bible, and desired an honorable and godly person there, with others present, to read unto him that passage in Phil. 4: 11-13: "Not that I speak in respect of want: for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: everywhere and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." Which read, said he, to use his own words as near as we can remember them, "This Scripture did once save my life, when my eldest son, poor Oliver, died, which went as a dagger to my heart—indeed it did." And then, repeating the words of the text himself, and reading the tenth and eleventh verses of St. Paul's contentment and submission to the will of God in all conditions, said he: "It's true, Paul, you have learned this, and attained to this measure of grace; but what shall I do? Ah, poor creature, it is a hard lesson for me to take out! I find it so." But reading on to the thirteenth verse, where Paul saith, "I can do all things through Christ which strengthen me," then faith began work, and his heart to find support and comfort, and he said thus to himself, "He that was Paul's Christ is my Christ too," and so "he drew water out of the wells of salvation."—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 17, p. 221.

1445. DEATH, Study in. Dutch Explorer. A.D. 1596. Barentzen sought to go round Nova Zembla [seeking a north-east passage for Dutch commerce], and when his ship was hopelessly enveloped by ice had the courage to encamp his crew on the desolate northern shore of the island, and cheer them during a winter rendered horrible by famine, cold, and the fierce attacks of huge white bears, whom hunger had maddened. When spring came the gallant company, traversing more than sixteen hundred miles in two open boats, were tossed for three months by storms among icebergs, before they could reach the shelter of the White Sea. Barentzen sunk under his trials, but was engaged in poring over a sea-chart as he died. The expeditions of the Dutch were without a parallel for daring.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 15.

1446. DEATH, Substitutional. Military. [The soldiers of Marcus Crassus were defeated in an engagement.] The first 500, who had shown the greatest marks of cowardice, he divided into fifty parts, and put one in each decade to death, to whose lot it might happen to fall; thus reviving an ancient custom of military punishment which had been long disused. Indeed, this kind of punishment is the greatest mark of infamy, and being put in execution in sight of the whole army is attended with many awful and affecting circumstances.—PLUTARCH'S CRASSUS.

1447. DEATH, Sudden. Washington. On the morning of the 13th [of December, 1799] the general was engaged in making some improvements in the front of Mount Vernon. . . . The day became rainy with sleet . . . [he became wet] before his return to the house. About one o'clock he was seized with chilliness and nausea, but, having changed his clothes, sat down to his indoor work. . . . At night . . . remained writing until between eleven and twelve o'clock. [He died about ten o'clock on the following night].—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 24.

1448. DEATH, Testimony in. Lord Montrose. [A splendid Scotch nobleman, who vainly attempted a revolution in Scotland favorable to exiled Charles II.] They announced that the sentence condemned him "to be hung on a gibbet thirty feet high, where he was to be exposed during three hours; that his head would then be cut off and nailed to the gates of his prison, and that his arms and legs, severed from his body, would be distributed to the four principal cities of the kingdom." "I only wish," replied Montrose, "that I had limbs enough to be dispersed through every city in Europe, to bear testimony in the cause for which I have fought and am content to die."—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 52.

1449. DEATH, Thoughts in. Bonaparte. "France, the army, Josephine," were the last images which lingered in the heart and the last words which trembled on the lips of the dying emperor.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 84.

1450. DEATH, Thoughts of. Samuel Johnson. BOSWELL: "But is not the fear of death natural to man?" JOHNSON: "So much so, sir, that the whole of life is but keeping away the thoughts of it." He then, in a low and earnest tone, talked of his meditating upon the awful hour of his own dissolution, and in what manner he should conduct himself upon that occasion: "I know not," said he, "whether I should wish to have a friend by me, or have it all between God and myself."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 165.

1451. DEATH, Tranquillity in. Socrates. On the day of his death he discoursed, with uncommon force of eloquence, on the immortality of the soul, on the influence that persuasion ought to have on the conduct of life, and on the comfort it diffused on the last moments of existence. He drank the poisoned cup without the smallest emotion; and in the agony of death showed to his attending friends an example of tranquillity which their deep-felt grief denied them all power of imitating. The narrative of this concluding scene, as it is given by Plato in his dialogue entitled "Phædon," is one of the noblest specimens of simple, eloquent, and pathetic description which is anywhere to be met with—a narrative, to the force of which Cicero bears this strong testimony, that he never could read it without tears. Such was the end of this true philosopher, of whom his ungrateful countrymen knew not the value till they had destroyed him.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 2.

1452. DEATH, Triumph in. Battle of Quebec. [General] Wolfe, leading the charge, was wounded in the wrist. Again he was struck, but pressed on at the head of his grenadiers. Just at the moment of victory a third ball pierced his breast, and he sank quivering to the earth. "They run, they run!" said the attendant who bent over him. "Who run?" was the feeble response. "The French are flying everywhere," replied the officer. "Do they run already? Then I die happy," said the expiring hero; and his spirit passed away amid the smoke of battle.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 35, p. 276.

1453. DEATH, Triumphant in. "Stonewall" Jackson. [Having received several severe wounds at Chancellorsville, his arm was amputated. Pneumonia set in, and death followed.] Advising his wife, in the event of his death, to return to her father's house, he remarked: "You have a kind and good father; but there is no one so kind and good as your Heavenly Father." When she told him the doctors did not think he could live two hours, although he did not himself expect to die, he replied: "It will be infinite gain to be translated to heaven and be with Jesus."—POL-LARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 10, p. 265.

1454. DEATH by Violence. Roman Emperors. Such was the unhappy condition of the Roman emperors, that, whatever might be their conduct, their fate was commonly the same. A life of pleasure or virtue, of severity or mildness, of indolence or glory, alike led to an untimely grave; and almost every reign is closed by the same disgusting repetition of treason and murder.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12.

1455. DEATH welcomed. Defeat. [At the battle of Quebec the victorious General Wolfe defeated the French, but died of his wounds. When the French ran, General] Montcalm, still attempting to rally his broken regiments, was struck with a ball, and fell. "Shall I survive?" said he to his surgeon. "But a few hours at most," replied the attendant. "So much the better," replied the heroic Frenchman; "I shall not live to witness the surrender of Quebec." [See more at No. 1452].—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 35, p. 276.

1456. DEATH of the Wicked. Alexander. The first person that brought the news of Alexander's death was Asclepiades, the son of Hipparchus. Demades desired the people to give no credit to it. "For," said he, "if Alexander were dead, the whole world would smell the carcass."—PLUTARCH'S PHOCION.

1457. DEBATE, Personality in. Samuel Johnson. His Majesty then talked of the controversy between Warburton and Lowth, which he seemed to have read, and asked Johnson what he thought of it. Johnson answered: "Warburton has most general, most scholastic, learning; Lowth is the more correct scholar. I do not know which of them calls names best." The king was pleased to say he was of the same opinion; adding, "You do not think then, Dr. Johnson, that there was much argument in the case." Johnson said he did not think there was. "Why, truly," said the king, "when once it comes to calling names, argument is pretty well at an end."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 151.

1458. DEBAUCHERY, Royal. Catherine II. [Of Russia.] The common belief is, that she had a new lover about every three months, who was then dismissed with gifts and pensions. One author informs us that she expended in this way, during her reign, a sum of money equal, in our present currency, to $200,000,000. Lovers she may have had; but when I read her pleasant, innocent, and high-bred letters to the great men of her time, and when I run over the catalogue of the immense and solid benefits which she bestowed upon her country, I find it impossible to believe that she ever abandoned herself to systematic debauchery.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 404.

1459. DEBT, Imprisonment for. England. In the debtors' prison at Sheffield [John] Howard found a cutler plying his trade, who was in jail for thirty cents. The fees of the court which had consigned him to prison amounted to nearly $5, and this sum he had been for several years trying to earn in prison. In another jail there was a man, with a wife and five children, confined for court fees of about $1 and jailer's fees of eighty cents. This man was confined in the same apartment with robbers and murderers, and had little hope of being able to raise the money for his discharge. All such debtors—and they were numerous then in England—Howard released by paying their debts.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 56.

1460. DEBT, Security for. Sir Walter Scott. In May, 1812, Scott having now at last obtained the salary of the Clerkship of Session, the work of which he had for more than five years discharged without pay, indulged himself in realizing his favorite dream of buying a "mountain farm" at Abbotsford—five miles lower down the Tweed than his cottage at Ashiestiel. . . . The place thus bought for £4000—half of which, according to Scott's bad and sanguine habit, was borrowed from his brother, and half raised on the security of a poem at the moment of sale wholly unwritten, and not completed even when he removed to Abbotsford—"Rokeby"—became only too much of an idol for the rest of Scott's life.—HUTTON'S SCOTT, ch. 8.

1461. DEBT by War. United States. The National debt, however, was the greatest and most threatening question; but the genius of Hamilton triumphed over every difficulty. The indebtedness of the United States, including the revolutionary expenses of the several States, amounted to nearly $80,000,000. Hamilton adopted a broad and honest policy. His plan, which was laid before Congress at the beginning of the second session, proposed that the debt of the United States due to American citizens, as well as the war debt of the individual States, should be assumed by the general government, and that all should be fully paid. By this measure the credit of the country was vastly improved, even before actual payment was begun. As a means of augmenting the revenues of the government, a duty was laid on the tonnage of merchant ships, with a discrimination in favor of American vessels; and customs were levied on all imported articles. Hamilton's schemes were violently opposed [but very successful].—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 46.

1462. DEBTS discouraged. Laws of Amasis. The unnecessary contracting of debts was likewise restrained in Egypt by a . . . very laudable regulation. The debtor was obliged to give in pledge the embalmed body of his father, to remain with the creditor till the debt was discharged. He who died without redeeming this sacred pledge was deprived himself of funeral obsequies.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4.

1463. DEBTS, Dishonest. Precedence. The royal custom [of Henry VIII.] has survived among us in many a notorious example. The loans advanced by honest creditors are repudiated; the gambling debts to "crafty persons" are scrupulously discharged. [Henry was a notorious gambler.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 20, p. 329.

1464. DEBTS prevented. Athenians. Solon restrained the severity of creditors to their debtors by prohibiting all imprisonment for debt; but he restrained, at the same time, the frequency of contracting debts by the severe penalty of the forfeiture of the rights of citizenship—a punishment which, though it did not reduce a man to servitude, deprived him of all voice in the public assembly, or share in the government of the commonwealth. In like manner, if a debtor died insolvent, his heir was disfranchised till the debt was paid. This was a wise regulation; for no indigent man ought to be a legislator.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 10.

1465. DEBTS, Punishment for. Insolvent Debtors. After judicial proof or confession of the debt, thirty days of grace were allowed before a Roman was delivered into the power of his fellow-citizen. In this private prison twelve ounces of rice were his daily food; he might be bound with a chain of fifteen pounds weight; and his misery was thrice exposed in the marketplace, to solicit the compassion of his friends and countrymen. At the expiration of sixty days the debt was discharged by the loss of liberty or life; the insolvent debtor was either put to death or sold in foreign slavery beyond the Tiber; but if several creditors were alike obstinate and unrelenting, they might legally dismember his body, and satiate their revenge by this horrid partition. The advocates for this savage law have insisted that it must strongly operate in deterring idleness and fraud from contracting debts which they were unable to discharge; but experience would dissipate this salutary terror, by proving that no creditor could be found to exact this unprofitable penalty of life or limb.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44.

1466. DEBTS scaled. Virginian Colony. In Virginia debts had been contracted to be paid in tobacco; and when the article rose in value, in consequence of [English] laws restricting its culture, the legislature of Virginia did not scruple to provide a remedy, by enacting that "no man need pay more than two thirds of his debt during the stint;" and that all creditors should take "forty pounds for a hundred."—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 6.

1467. DEBTS, Small. Samuel Johnson. [Letter to Joseph Simpson, son of an old friend.] Your debts in the whole are not large, and of the whole but a small part is troublesome. Small debts are like small shot; they are rattling on every side, and can scarcely be escaped without a wound; great debts are like cannon; of loud noise, but little danger. You must, therefore, be enabled to discharge petty debts, that you may have leisure, with security, to struggle with the rest.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 94.

1468. DECEIT, Temptation to. Mahomet. From enthusiasm to imposture the step is perilous and slippery; the demon of Socrates affords a memorable instance how a wise man may deceive himself, how a good man may deceive others, how the conscience may slumber in a mixed and middle state between self-illusion and voluntary fraud. Charity may believe that the original motives of Mahomet were those of pure and genuine benevolence; but a human missionary is incapable of cherishing the obstinate unbelievers who reject his claims, despise his arguments, and persecute his life; he might forgive his personal adversaries, he may lawfully hate the enemies of God; the stern passions of pride and revenge were kindled in the bosom of Mahomet, and he sighed, like the prophet of Nineveh, for the destruction of the rebels whom he had condemned.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50.

1469. DECEIT, A timely. Persian Prince. [Harmozan was captured in the surrender of his country to Omar the Mohammedan.] The Persian complained of intolerable thirst, but discovered some apprehension lest he should be killed while he was drinking a cup of water. "Be of good courage," said the caliph; "your life is safe till you have drunk this water;" the crafty satrap accepted the assurance, and instantly dashed the vase against the ground. Omar would have avenged the deceit, but his companions represented the sanctity of an oath; and the speedy conversion of Harmozan entitled him not only to a free pardon, but even to a stipend of two thousand pieces of gold.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51.

1470. DECEITFULNESS described. Lord Breadalbane. [Lord Breadalbane, a Highland earl] who professed submission to William III., is] described by his contemporary, John Macky, "cunning as a fox; wise as a serpent; but as slippery as an eel."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 9, p. 132.

1471. DECEIVER deceived, The. Rochester. [James II.] did not like to propose directly to his brother-in-law [Lord Rochester, the treasurer] the simple choice, apostasy or dismissal; but three days after the conference Barillon waited on the treasurer, and, with much circumlocution and many expressions of friendly concern, broke the unpleasant truth. "Do you mean," said Rochester, bewildered by the involved and ceremonious phrases in which the intimation was made, "that if I do not turn Catholic the consequence will be that I shall lose my place?" "I say nothing about consequences," answered the wary diplomatist. "I only come as a friend to express a hope that you will take care to keep your place." "But surely," said Rochester, "the plain meaning of all this is, that I must turn Catholic or go out." He put many questions for the purpose of ascertaining whether the communication was made by authority, but could extort only vague and mysterious replies. At last, affecting a confidence which he was far from feeling, he declared that Barillon must have been imposed upon by idle or malicious reports. "I tell you," he said, "that the king will not dismiss me, and I will not resign. I know him; he knows me; and I fear nobody." The Frenchman answered that he was charmed, that he was ravished to hear it, and that his only motive for interfering was a sincere anxiety for the prosperity and dignity of his excellent friend the treasurer. And thus the two statesmen departed, each flattering himself that he had duped the other.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 140.

1472. DECENCY, Regard for. Isaac Newton. His most intimate friend at the university was a foreign chemist of much note and skill. Newton enjoyed his conversation exceedingly, until, one day, the Italian told him "a loose story of a nun," which so much offended his sense of decency that he would never associate with him again.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 256.

1473. DECEPTION betrays itself. Richard I. [When Richard I. returned from the crusade, with but a few attendants, they landed at Ragusa] in the guise of pilgrims; but the lavishness of the king was so little in keeping with his assumed character, that his real rank was soon suspected. [He was soon after incarcerated in prison.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 23, p. 319.

1474. DECEPTION, Day of. Dupes Day. An outrageous scene took place in the king's presence between the queen-mother and Richelieu, at the close of which Louis [XIII.] quitted the palace without saying a word, and took his departure for Versailles. Every one thought the fall of the minister irrevocably certain. . . . The good news was transmitted with precipitate joy to Madrid, Vienna, Brussels, and Turin. But the sound judgment of Louis . . . had conducted him meanwhile to a very different conclusion. A message from the king was despatched to Richelieu. . . . He hurried to Versailles, was welcomed with every mark of confidence and favor, and received an assurance from Louis that he would steadily uphold him against all his adversaries, would listen to no insinuation to his prejudice, and would remove from court all who had it in their power to thwart or injure him. These curious occurrences took place on the 11th of November, 1630, which has remained famous in French history as the "Day of Dupes."—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 19, § 10, p. 398.

1475. DECEPTION justified. Reign of James II. As, however, five years had elapsed since her last pregnancy [Queen Mary's], the people, under the influence of that delusion which leads men to believe what they wish, had ceased to entertain any apprehension that she would give an heir to the throne. On the other hand, nothing seemed more natural and probable than that the Jesuits should have contrived a pious fraud. It was certain that they must consider the accession of the [Protestant] Princess of Orange as one of the greatest calamities which could befall their church. It was equally certain that they would not be very scrupulous about doing whatever might be necessary to save their church from a great calamity. In books written by eminent members of the society, and licensed by its rulers, it was distinctly laid down that means even more shocking to all notions of justice and humanity than the introduction of a spurious heir into a family might lawfully be employed for ends less important than the conversion of a heretical kingdom. It had got abroad that some of the king's advisers, and even the [Roman Catholic] king himself, had meditated schemes for defrauding the Lady Mary [Princess of Orange; her husband was afterward William III.] either wholly or in part of her rightful inheritance.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 287.

1476. DECEPTION, Pleasing. Abraham Lincoln. [Speaking of secession, in one of his messages] occurs the following remark: "With rebellion thus sugar-coated they have drugged the public mind." . . . Mr. Defrees, the government printer, . . . was a good deal disturbed by the use of the term "sugar-coated," and finally went to the President about it [as lacking dignity]. . . . "Defrees," replied Mr. Lincoln, "that word expresses precisely my idea, and I am not going to change it. The time will never come in this country when the people won't know exactly what sugar-coated means!"—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 758.

1477. DECEPTION punished. Demosthenes. [He had been bribed by Harpalus, and a great clamor was raised by the people.] Demosthenes, seemingly with a design to prove his innocence, moved for an order that the affair should be brought before the court of Areopagus, and all persons punished who should be found guilty of taking bribes. In consequence of which he appeared before that court, and was one of the first that were convicted.—PLUTARCH.

1478. DECEPTION of Self. Conspirators. Their oaths [as senators] and their professions were nectar to them. If they were entitled to kill Cæsar, they were entitled equally to deceive him. No stronger evidence is needed of the demoralization of the Roman Senate than the completeness with which they were able to disguise from themselves the baseness of their treachery. One man only they were able to attract into cooperation who had a reputation for honesty, and could be conceived, without absurdity, to be animated by a disinterested purpose. [It was] Marcus Brutus.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 26.

1479. DECEPTION, Superstitious. Sacred Fawn. Spanus, a countryman, . . . happening to fall in with a hind which had newly yeaned, and which was flying from the hunters, failed in his attempt to take her; but charmed with the uncommon color of the fawn, which was a perfect white, he pursued and took it. By good fortune Sertorius had his camp in that neighborhood; and whatever was brought to him taken in hunting, or of the production of the field, he received with pleasure, and returned the civility with interest. The countryman went and offered him the fawn. He received this present like the rest, and at first took no extraordinary notice of it. But in time it became so tractable and fond of him, that it would come when he called, follow him wherever he went, and learned to bear the hurry and tumult of the camp. By little and little he brought the people to believe there was something sacred and mysterious in the affair, giving it out that the fawn was a gift from Diana, and that it discovered to him many important secrets. For he knew the natural power of superstition over the minds of the barbarians. In pursuance of his scheme, when the enemy was making a private irruption into the country under his command, or persuading some city to revolt, he pretended the fawn had appeared to him in a dream, and warned him to have his forces ready. And if he had intelligence of some victory gained by his officers, he used to conceal the messenger, and produced the fawn crowned with flowers for its good tidings, bidding the people rejoice and sacrifice to the gods, on account of some news they would soon hear.—PLUTARCH'S SERTORIUS.

1480. DECISION, Final. Rubicon. When Julius Cæsar arrived at the banks of the Rubicon, which divides Cisalpine Gaul from the rest of Italy, his reflections became more interesting in proportion as the danger grew near. Staggered by the greatness of his attempt, he stopped to weigh within himself its inconveniences; and as he stood revolving in silence the arguments on both sides, he many times changed his opinion. After which he deliberated upon it with such of his friends as were by, among whom was Asinius Pollio; enumerating the calamities which the passage of that river would bring upon the world, and the reflections that might be made upon it by posterity. At last, upon some sudden impulse, bidding adieu to his reasonings, and plunging into the abyss of futurity, in the words of those who embark in doubtful and arduous enterprises, he cried out, "The die is cast!" and immediately passed the river.—PLUTARCH'S CÆSAR.

1481. —. —. Rubicon. The boundary which separates Italy from Cisalpine Gaul is a small river named the Rubicon. The Roman Senate, aware of the designs of Cæsar, had pronounced a decree devoting to the infernal gods whatever general should presume to pass this boundary with an army, a legion, or even a single cohort. Cæsar, who, with all his ambition, inherited a large share of the benevolent affections, did not resolve on the decisive step which he had now taken without some compunction of mind.

Arrived with his army at the border of his province, he hesitated for some time, while he pictured to himself the inevitable miseries of that civil war in which he was now preparing to unsheath the sword. "If I pass this small stream," said he, "in what calamities must I involve my country! Yet if I do not I myself am ruined." The latter consideration was too powerful. Ambition, too, presented allurements which, to a mind like Cæsar's, were irresistible.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 2.

1482. DECISION, Lacking. Charles I. [At the battle of Naseby the king was totally defeated by Fairfax and Cromwell.] On this field the passionate Rupert, as at Marston, supposed that he had won the day, and, thinking the victory all his own, he clove his way back to the spot where the poor helpless king was cheering his dismayed troopers. Indeed, we can almost weep as we hear that cry from the king: "One charge more, gentlemen! One charge more, in the name of God! and the day is ours." He placed himself at the head of the troopers, and a thousand of them prepared to follow him. One of his courtiers snatched his bridle, and turned him from the path of honor to that of despair. "Why," says one writer, "was there no hand to strike that traitor to the ground?" Alas! if the king's own hand could not strike that traitor to the ground, was it possible that another's could? Who would have dared to have taken Cromwell's bridle at such a moment? And so, at the battle of Naseby, the crown fell from the king's head and the sceptre from his hand, and he was henceforth never more in any sense a king. Poor king! "Who will bring me," cried he in despair, "this Cromwell, dead or alive?" Alas! your majesty, who?—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 10, p. 185.

1483. DECORUM in Debate. American Indians. If his eloquence pleased, they esteemed him a god. Decorum was never broken [in Indian assemblies]. There were never two speakers struggling to anticipate each other; they did not express their spleen by blows; they restrained passionate invective; the debate was never disturbed by an uproar; questions of order were unknown.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

1484. DECORUM, Ministerial. Samuel Johnson. Johnson's profound reverence for the hierarchy made him expect from bishops the highest degree of decorum; he was offended even at their going to taverns. "A bishop," said he, "has nothing to do at a tippling-house. It is not indeed immoral in him to go to a tavern; neither would it be immoral in him to whip a top in Grosvenor Square; but if he did, I hope the boys would fall upon him, and apply the whip to him. There are gradations in conduct; there is morality, decency, and propriety. None of these should be violated by a bishop."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 453.

1485. DEDICATION changed. Biblia Polyglotta. It is to his immortal honor that the "Biblia Polyglotta Waltonia," perhaps the most important and valuable biblical book ever issued by the British press, owed the existence of its gigantic volumes to Cromwell. . . . Cromwell assisted in defraying the expenses in publishing it, and admitted five thousand reams of paper free of duty, and so saved the author from loss by its publication. It was published during the Protectorate and dedicated to Cromwell. But its mean and dastardly compiler, upon the return of Charles Stuart, erased the dedication to the man who had so substantially aided him, and inserted that of the king, who cared neither for the project, its scholarship, nor the Bible.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 15, p. 200.

1486. DEDICATION, The true. Church. [Celebrating the anniversary of the consecration of the Castle Church of Wittenberg.] Not long thereafter the same Augustinian monk that had nailed the Latin theses to the church door stood in the pulpit and preached upon the festival text, Luke 19: 1, etc., which records the history of Zaccheus. Reverently did the congregation listen to the simple, calm, and heartfelt sermon of the Augustinian monk. "Christ must become everything to us," he said; "and unto those to whom Christ is something, all else will be nothing. He must be sought with a heart which, with a feeling of its unworthiness, does not dare to invite Him, but which, for that very reason, most urgently implores His presence. Such a request, coming from the heart, God will grant. Thus He would have our hearts. And thus every feast of dedication should not be merely an outward consecration of a church, but rather a consecration of the heart unto God."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 1, p. 8.

1487. DEFAMATION punished. James II. James, a short time before his accession, had instituted a civil suit against Oates [the infamous impostor and traducer] for defamatory words, and a jury had given damages to the enormous amount of £100,000. The defendant had been taken in execution, and was lying in prison as a debtor, without hope of release.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 448.

1488. DEFEAT, Beginning with. Abraham Lincoln. He espoused the cause of Henry Clay . . . and ran as a candidate for the State legislature. . . . Mr. Lincoln was defeated, as he undoubtedly expected to be, although his failure must have been amply compensated by the highly complimentary vote that he received in his own precinct, which gave him two hundred and seventy-seven votes out of two hundred and eighty-four cast; and this, be it remembered, was the first and last time that he was ever beaten by the people.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 1.

1489. DEFEAT, Brilliant. Napoleon I. [He fled to Paris after the defeat at Waterloo.] Throwing himself upon a sofa, he exclaimed, . . . "My most brilliant victories do not shed more glory on the French army than the defeat at Waterloo. Our troops have not been beaten; they have been sacrificed, massacred, by overwhelming numbers. . . . I desire to be alone."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 27.

1490. DEFEAT concealed. Samuel Johnson. Johnson could not brook appearing to be worsted in argument, even when he had taken the wrong side, to show the force and dexterity of his talents. When, therefore, he perceived that his opponent gained ground, he had recourse to some sudden mode of robust sophistry. Once, when I was pressing upon him with visible advantage, he stopped me thus: "My dear Boswell, let's have no more of this; you'll make nothing of it. I'd rather have you whistle a Scotch tune."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 464.

1491. DEFEAT, Difficult. Cæsar. Cæsar was never defeated when personally present, save once at Gergovia, and once at Durazzo; and the failure at Gergovia was caused by the revolt of the Ædui; and the manner in which the failure at Durazzo was retrieved showed Cæsar's greatness more than the most brilliant of his victories. He was rash, but with a calculated rashness, which the event never failed to justify. His greatest successes were due to the rapidity of his movements, which brought him on the enemy before they heard of his approach. He travelled sometimes a hundred miles a day, reading or writing in his carriage, through countries without roads, and crossing rivers without bridges. No obstacles stopped him when he had a definite aim in view.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 28, p. 71.

1492. DEFEAT inspiring. Bunker Hill. The battle of Bunker Hill rather inspired than discouraged the colonists. It was seen that the British soldiers were not invincible. To capture a few more hills would cost General Gage his whole army. The enthusiasm of war spread throughout the country. The news was borne rapidly to the South, and a spirit of determined opposition was everywhere aroused. The people began to speak of the United Colonies of America. At Charlotte, North Carolina, the citizens ran together in a hasty convention, and startled the country by making a declaration of Independence! The British ministers had little dreamed of raising such a storm.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 38, p. 301.

1493. DEFEAT, Instruction by. Peter the Great. Charles [XII. of Sweden] left the defence of Riga to a valiant old Swedish general, who succeeded in holding it, and marched himself to meet the czar with 20,000 troops. Never was victory more sudden, more easy, or more complete than that which these 20,000 Swedes won over the great mob of Russians led by Peter. The czar escaped with but 40,000 men. ["Charles was then only in the seventeenth year of his age."—TYTLER.] From that defeat the military greatness of Russia was born. "I know well," said the czar, as he was in retreat, "that these Swedes will beat us for a long time; but, at last, they will teach us how to conquer." And so it proved; for from that day Peter began the mighty work of drilling his half-savage hordes into soldiers—a work which is still going on, though great progress has been made in it. The Russian people attributed their defeat to sorcery and witchcraft, and we have still the prayer which was addressed to St. Nicholas on this occasion in all their churches.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 436.

1494. DEFEAT, Mortification of. General Montcalm. [He was defeated at Quebec, and mortally wounded.] On hearing from the surgeon that death was certain—"I am glad of it," he cried; "how long shall I survive?" "Ten or twelve hours, perhaps less." "So much the better; I shall not live to see the surrender of Quebec."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 14.

1495. DEFEAT, Overwhelming. Bonaparte. [Bonaparte invaded Russia with an army of more than 600,000 men; he was driven back by the destruction of all supplies and the approach of an early winter. The retreat became a rout.] The artillery and cavalry ceased to exist. The different regiments were all mixed together, the soldiers marching pell-mell, and only seeking to prolong existence. Thousands of wandering men fell into the hands of the Cossacks. The number of the prisoners was very great, but that of the dead exceeded it. During a month there were no rations, and dead horses were the only resource. Of 400,000 Frenchmen who had crossed the Niemen in May, with the persuasion of their invincibility, not 20,000 had returned to the Vistula.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 30, p. 559.

1496. DEFEAT, Service of. Bull Run. The rout [of the Union army] at Bull Run had the effect to quicken the energies of the North, and troops were rapidly hurried to Washington. The aged General Scott . . . retired from active duty, and [young] General McClellan was called from West Virginia to take command of the Army of the Potomac. By the middle of October his forces had increased to 150,000 men.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 65, p. 494.

1497. DEFECTS covered. Pericles. [Pericles, the Athenian statesman, obtained great renown.] His person in other respects was well turned, but his head was disproportionally long. For this reason almost all his statues have the head covered with a helmet, the statuary choosing, I suppose, to hide that defect.—PLUTARCH'S PERICLES.

1499. DEFENCE, Brave. Count Gerontius. Gerontius, abandoned by his own troops, escaped to the confines of Spain, and rescued his name from oblivion by the Roman courage which appeared to animate the last moments of his life. In the middle of the night a great body of his perfidious soldiers surrounded and attacked his house, which he had strongly barricaded. His wife, a valiant friend of the nation of the Alani, and some faithful slaves, were still attached to his person; and he used, with so much skill and resolution, a large magazine of darts and arrows, that above 300 of the assailants lost their lives in the attempt.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31.

1500. DEFENCE declined. Charles I. The act of accusation was read to him, drawn up after the customary formula, in which the words traitor, murderer, and public enemy were, as usual, freely applied by the conquering to the vanquished party. He listened to them unmoved, with the calm superiority of innocence. Determined not to degrade the inviolable majesty of kings, of which he conceived himself the depository and responsible representative, he replied that he would never stoop to justify himself before a self-elected tribunal of his own subjects—a tribunal which the religion as well as the laws of England equally forbade him to acknowledge. "I shall leave to God," said he, in conclusion,

"the care of my defence, lest by answering I should acknowledge in you an authority which has no better foundation than that of robbers and pirates, and thus draw on my memory the reproach of posterity, that I had myself betrayed the constitution of the country, instead of selecting the most estimable and enviable fate of a martyr."—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 42.

1501. DEFENCE, A frail. Waterloo. [At the battle of Waterloo some of the English were protected by a garden-wall enclosing about two acres of ground and including a small house.] It is scarcely an exaggeration to say "this Belgian yeoman's garden-wall was the safeguard of Europe, and the destiny of mankind perhaps turned upon the possession of his house."—LORD DUDLEY, IN KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 2, p. 33.

1502. DEFENCE, Heroic. La Rochelle. The defence of La Rochelle was protracted for fifteen months, and it was not till half the population had perished from hunger, and scarcely a hundred and fifty soldiers of the garrison remained alive, that the survivors consented to capitulate on the 28th of October, 1628.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 19, § 8, p. 396.

1503. DEFENCE, Patriotic. Holland. The national spirit swelled and rose high. The terms offered by the allies were firmly rejected. The dikes were opened. The whole country was one great lake, from which the cities, with their ramparts and steeples, rose like islands. The invaders were forced to save themselves from destruction by a precipitate retreat.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 205.

1504. DEFENCE, A savage. Babylonians. The Babylonians were the first of the provinces which endeavored to shake off the yoke of servitude; but their attempt cost them extremely dear. Darius encircled Babylon with his army so as to cut off all supplies from the adjacent country. The inhabitants exerted a savage resolution. All who were useless for the defence of the city, and served only to consume its provisions—the women, the old men, and the children—were strangled by a public decree, each head of a family being allowed to preserve one of his wives and a maid-servant.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 11.

1505. DEFIANCE, Challenge of. William, Prince of Orange. [About to invade England and mount the throne.] In the evening he arrived at Helvoetsluys, and went on board of a frigate called the Brill. His flag was immediately hoisted. It displayed the arms of Nassau quartered with those of England. The motto, embroidered in letters three feet long, was happily chosen. The house of Orange had long used the elliptical device, "I will maintain." The ellipsis was now filled up with words of high import, "The liberties of England and the Protestant religion."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 438.

1506. DEFORMITY forgotten. Thackeray. When he was in America he met at dinner a literary gentleman of high character, middle-aged, and most dignified deportment. The gentleman was one whose character and acquirements stood very high—deservedly so—but who in society had that air of wrapping his toga around him, which adds, or is supposed to add, many cubits to a man's height. But he had a broken nose

At dinner he talked much of the tender passion, and did so in a manner which stirred up Thackeray's feeling of the ridiculous. "What has the world come to," said Thackeray, out loud to the table, "when two broken-nosed old fogies like you and me sit talking about love to each other!" The gentleman was astounded, and could only sit wrapping his toga in silent dismay for the rest of the evening.—TROLLOPE'S THACKERAY, ch. 2.

1507. DEGENERACY, Athenian. Despised. The Athenians are . . . distinguished by the subtlety and acuteness of their understandings; but these qualities, unless ennobled by freedom and enlightened by study, will degenerate into a low and selfish cunning; and it is a proverbial saying of the country, "From the Jews of Thessalonica, the Turks of Negropont, and the Greeks of Athens, good Lord, deliver us!" By some, who delight in the contrast, the modern language of Athens is represented as the most corrupt and barbarous of the seventy dialects of the vulgar Greek; this picture is too darkly colored; but it would not be easy, in the country of Plato and Demosthenes, to find a reader or a copy of their works. The Athenians walk with supine indifference among the glorious ruins of antiquity; and such is the debasement of their character, that they are incapable of admiring the genius of their predecessors.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 63.

1508. DEGENERACY, National. England. 1775. [Benjamin Franklin left England for his native country in 1775, deprecating any further attempt to restore united interests between the mother country and her colonies. He writes:] When I consider the extreme corruption prevailing among all orders of men in the old rotten state, and the glorious public virtue so predominant in our rising country, I cannot but apprehend more mischief than benefit from a closer union. Here numberless and needless places, enormous salaries, pensions, perquisites, bribes, groundless quarrels, foolish expeditions, false accounts or no accounts, contracts and jobs, devour all revenue, and produce continual necessity in the midst of natural plenty.—KNIGHT'S ENC., vol. 6, ch. 23, p. 353.

1509. DEGRADATION, National. Hungarians. Except the merit and fame of military prowess, all that is valued by mankind appeared vile and contemptible to these barbarians, whose native fierceness was stimulated by the consciousness of numbers and freedom. The tents of the Hungarians were of leather, their garments of fur; they shaved their hair and scarified their faces; in speech they were slow, in action prompt, in treaty perfidious; and they shared the common reproach of barbarians, too ignorant to conceive the importance of truth, too proud to deny or palliate the breach of their most solemn engagements. Their simplicity has been praised, yet they abstained only from the luxury they had never known; whatever they saw they coveted; their desires were insatiate, and their sole industry was the hand of violence and rapine.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 55.

1510. DEGRADATION and Poverty. Ireland. [Young, in his "Tour in Ireland," says:] Mark the Irishman's potato-bowl placed on the floor, the whole family on their hams around it, devouring a quantity almost incredible; the beggar seating himself to it with a hearty welcome; the pig taking his share as readily as the wife; the cocks, hens, turkeys, geese, the cur, the cat—and all partaking of the same dish. [The mud hovel of one room blinds the family with its smoke, and their clothing is so ragged that a stranger is impressed with the idea of universal poverty. Date 1776.]—KNIGHT'S ENC., vol. 7, ch. 2, p. 33.

1511. DEGRADATION, Social. Irish. [In 1593 Spencer described the degradation of the Irish cabin as it continued for two hundred and fifty years after. "Rather swine-sties than houses"—these dwellings of abject poverty being the chiefest cause of the poor cultivator's] beastly manner of life and savage condition, lying and living with his beast, in one house, in one room, in one bed—that is, clean straw or a foul dung-hill.—KNIGHT'S ENC., vol. 3, ch. 18, p. 280.

1512. DEITY, Belief in the. Greeks. From the foregoing brief account of the different sects or schools of philosophy in Greece, I shall draw only two reflections: the one is, that with a very few exceptions, and more particularly that of the sect last mentioned, amid all the errors incident to the mind unenlightened by revealed religion, the reason of mankind has, in all ages, looked up to a supreme, intelligent, and omnipotent Being—the Author of our existence—the Creator and the Governor of the universe—a belief which forces itself upon the most uncultivated understanding, and which the advancement of the intellectual powers tends always to strengthen and confirm. The other reflection is, that from the great variety and opposition of those systems which we have enumerated of the Greek philosophers, we may perceive among that people a liberal spirit of toleration in matters of opinion, which stopped short at absolute irreligion and impiety; and a freedom of judgment in all matters of philosophical speculation, which did honor to their national character and the genius of their legislative systems.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9.

1513. DEITY concealed. Ancient Italians. These gods were termed Patres and Indigetes, but their particular names were concealed with the most anxious caution from the knowledge of the people. It was a very prevalent superstitious belief that no city could be taken or destroyed till its tutelary gods abandoned it. Hence it was the first care of a besieging enemy to evoke the gods of the city or entice them out by ceremonies, by promising them superior temples and festivals, and a more respectful worship than they had hitherto enjoyed; but in order to accomplish this evocation, it was necessary to learn the particular names of the deities, which every people therefore was interested to keep secret.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 1.

1514. DEITY subjugated. Tyrians. [When Alexander the Great besieged the Tyrians] he had a dream, in which he saw Hercules offering him his hand from the wall, and inviting him to enter. And many of the Tyrians dreamed that Apollo declared he would go over to Alexander, because he was displeased with their behavior in the town. Hereupon the Tyrians, as if the god had been a deserter taken in the fact, loaded his statue with chains, and nailed the feet to the pedestal, not scrupling to call him an Alexandrist.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

1515. DEJECTION, Mental. William Pitt. [William Pitt possessed very feeble health in his old age; his mental prostration was very great. His condition is thus described:] Lord Chatham's state of health is certainly the lowest dejection and debility that mind or body can be in. He sits all the day leaning on his hands, which he supports on the table; does not permit any person to remain in the room; knocks when he wants anything; and having made his wants known, gives a signal, without speaking, to the person who answers his call, to retire. [Pitt had greatly damaged his popularity as the "idol of the people" by receiving his title and pension from the king, they being interpreted as the price of his freedom. The "Great Commoner" was also a great sufferer from the gout. Wounded pride and a diseased body threw him into a state of melancholy.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 18, p. 288.

1516. DELAY, Dangerous. Archias. [On the same night in which he was assassinated by conspirators there arrived an express] from Athens with a letter from Archias, high-priest there, to Archias his namesake and particular friend, not filled with vain and groundless surmises, but containing a clear narrative of the whole affair, as was found afterward. The messenger, being admitted to Archias, and now almost intoxicated, as he delivered the letter said: "The person who sent this desired that it might be read immediately, for it contains business of great importance." But Archias receiving it, said, smiling, "Business to-morrow." Then he put it under the bolster of his couch, and resumed the conversation with Philidas. This saying, Business to-morrow, passed into a proverb, and continues so among the Greeks to this day.—PLUTARCH'S PELOPIDAS.

1517. DELAY, Providential. Texas. A great agitation had arisen in the country in regard to the republic of Texas. From 1821 to 1836 this vast territory, lying between Louisiana and Mexico, had been a province of the latter country. For a long time it had been the policy of Spain and Mexico to keep Texas uninhabited, in order that the vigorous race of Americans might not encroach on the Mexican borders. At last, however, a large land-grant was made to Moses Austin, of Connecticut, on condition that he would settle three hundred American families within the limits of his domain. . . . Thus the foundation of Texas was laid by people of the English race.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 56, p. 445.

1518. DELIVERANCE from God. Orleans. [When Attila besieged Orleans] the assaults of the Huns were vigorously repelled by the faithful valor of the soldiers, or citizens, who defended the place. The pastoral diligence of Anianus, a bishop of primitive sanctity and consummate prudence, exhausted every art of religious policy to support their courage till the arrival of the expected succors. After an obstinate siege the walls were shaken by the battering-rams; the Huns had already occupied the suburbs; and the people who were incapable of bearing arms lay prostrate in prayer. Anianus, who anxiously counted the days and hours, despatched a trusty messenger to observe, from the rampart, the face of the distant country. He returned twice, without any intelligence that could inspire hope or comfort; but in his third report he mentioned a small cloud, which he had faintly descried at the extremity of the horizon. "It is the aid of God!" exclaimed the bishop, in a tone of pious confidence; and the whole multitude repeated after him, "It is the aid of God." The remote object, on which every eye was fixed, became each moment larger and more distinct; the Roman and Gothic banners were gradually perceived; and a favorable wind blowing aside the dust, discovered, in deep array, the impatient squadrons of Ætius and Theodoric, who pressed forward to the relief of Orleans.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 35.

1519. DELIVERANCE, Strange. Capt. Cook. It was while sailing about Australia that the Endeavor had a most strange and narrow escape from destruction. She struck a rock one day with great force, but immediately floated off; and although she leaked badly, the crew managed to keep her afloat until they reached a harbor. What was their astonishment, on docking the ship, to find a large rock stuck in the cavity, which alone had kept her from going down.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 382.

1520. DELUSION, Disastrous. Crusaders. [St. Lewis IX. of France fitted out the last crusade.] Unfortunately, in the delirium of a fever, he fancied that he had received a summons from heaven to take up the cross against the infidels; and neither the return of his reason, the entreaties of his queen, nor the remonstrances of his counsellors could divert him from that fatal project. He employed four years in preparing for the expedition, and set out with his queen, his three brothers and their wives, and all the knights of France, with a prodigious number of their vassals and attendants. . . . Half of their immense army perished by sickness, and the other half was defeated by Almoadin, the son of Melecuala. Lewis himself, with two of his brothers, was taken prisoners, and the third was killed in the engagement. Lewis offered 1,000,000 of besants in gold for the ransom of himself and his fellow-prisoners; and such was the uncommon generosity of this infidel prince, that he remitted to him a fifth part of the sum.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 19.

1521. DELUSION, Optical. Island. The people of the Canaries were long under a singular optical delusion. They imagined that, from time to time, they beheld a vast island to the westward, with lofty mountains and deep valleys. Nor was it seen in cloudy and dubious weather, but in those clear days common to tropical climates, and with all the distinctness with which distant objects may be discerned in their pure, transparent atmosphere. The island, it is true, was only seen at intervals, while at other times, and in the clearest weather, not a vestige of it was to be descried. When it did appear, however, it was always in the same place, and under the same form. So persuaded were the inhabitants of the Canaries of its reality, that application was made to the King of Portugal for permission to discover and take possession of it; and it actually became the object of several expeditions.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, ch. 4

1522. DELUSION, Political. Stamp Tax. A.D. 1765. Every agent in England believed the stamp tax would be peaceably levied. Not one "imagined the colonies would think of disputing the matter with Parliament at the point of the sword." "It is our duty to submit" had been the words of Otis. . . . Franklin . . . never doubting that it would go into effect. . . . Still less did the statesmen of England doubt the result.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 11.

1523. DELUSIONS, Popular. Fernando de Soto. It had ever been believed that the depths of the continent at the north concealed cities as magnificent and temples as richly endowed as any which had yet been plundered within the limits of the tropics. Soto desired to rival Cortez in glory, and surpass Pizarro in wealth. . . . He demanded permission to conquer Florida at his own cost; and Charles V. readily conceded.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 2.

1524. DEMAGOGUE, Changeful. Reign of Charles II. [He was a Cabinet minister.] Buckingham was a sated man of pleasure, who had turned to ambition as to a pastime. As he had tried to amuse himself with architecture and music, with writing farces and with seeking for the philosopher's stone, so he now tried to amuse himself with a secret negotiation and a Dutch war. He had already, rather from fickleness and love of novelty than from any deep design, been faithless to every party. At one time he had ranked among the Cavaliers. At another time warrants had been out against him for maintaining a treasonable correspondence with the remains of the Republican party in the city. He was now again a courtier, and was eager to win the favor of the king.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 199.

1525. DEMAGOGUE Class. Rome. Etruria was full of Sylla's disbanded soldiers, who had squandered their allotments, and were hanging about, unoccupied and starving. Catiline sent down Manlius, their old officer, to collect as many as he could of them without attracting notice. He himself, as the election day approached, and Cicero's year of office was drawing to an end, took up the character of an aristocratic demagogue, and asked for the suffrages of the people as the champion of the poor against the rich, as the friend of the wretched and oppressed; and those who thought themselves wretched and oppressed in Rome were so large a body, and so bitterly hostile were they all to the prosperous classes, that his election was anticipated as a certainty. In the Senate the consulship of Catiline was regarded as no less than an impending national calamity.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 11, p. 21.

1526. DEMAGOGUE, The First. Menestheus. Menestheus, the son of Peteus, grandson of Orneus, and great-grandson of Erectheus, is said to be the first of mankind that undertook to be a demagogue, and by his eloquence to ingratiate himself with the people. He endeavored also to exasperate and inspire the nobility with sedition, who had but ill borne with Theseus for some time, reflecting that he had deprived every person of family, of his government and command, and shut them up together in one city, where he used them as his subjects and slaves. Among the common people he sowed disturbance by telling them, that though they pleased themselves with the dream of liberty, in fact they were robbed of their country and religion; and instead of many good and native kings, were lorded over by one man, who was a new-comer and a stranger.—PLUTARCH'S THESEUS.

1527. DEMAGOGUE, Marks of the. Hearers. The love of liberty, or the passion for national freedom, is a noble, a disinterested, and a virtuous feeling. Where this feeling is found to prevail in any great degree, it is a proof that the manners of that community are yet pure and unadulterated; for corruption of manners infallibly extinguishes the patriotic spirit. In a nation confessedly corrupted, there is often found a prevailing cry for liberty, which is heard the loudest among the most profligate of the community; but let us carefully distinguish that spirit from virtuous patriotism. Let us examine the morals, the private manners of the demagogue who preaches forth the love of liberty; remark the character and examine the lives of those who listen with the greatest avidity to his harangues, and re-echo his vociferations; and let this be our criterion to judge of the principle which actuates them.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 6.

1528. DEMONS, Origin of. Semi-Huns. A fabulous origin was assigned, worthy of their form and manners, that the witches of Scythia, who, for their foul and deadly practices, had been driven from society, had copulated in the desert with infernal spirits; and that the Huns were the offspring of this execrable conjunction. The tale, so full of horror and absurdity, was greedily embraced by the credulous hatred of the Goths.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26.

1529. DENUNCIATION, Terrible. Napoleon I. [Having escaped from exile at St. Elba, and been welcomed by the army and people of France, the allied sovereigns declared.] "He has deprived himself of the protection of the laws. . . . Napoleon Bonaparte has thrown himself out of all relations with civilized society; and that as an enemy and disturber of the world, he has rendered himself an object of public vengeance."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 26.

1530. DEPARTURE, Mysterious. Cleomedes. [According to the Grecian fable, Cleomedes] was a man of gigantic size and strength; but behaving in a foolish and frantic manner, he was guilty of many acts of violence. At last he went into a school, where he struck the pillar that supported the roof with his fists, and broke it asunder, so that the roof fell in and destroyed the children. Pursued for this, he took refuge in a great chest, and having shut the lid upon him, he held it down so fast, that many men together could not force it open. When they had cut the chest in pieces, they could not find him either dead or alive. Struck with this strange affair, they sent to consult the oracle at Delphi, and had from the priestess this answer: "The race of heroes ends in Cleomedes."—PLUTARCH'S CLEOMEDES.

1531. DEPENDENCE, Needless. Virginian Colonists. They pretended to fear starvation, and in the latter part of August almost compelled Governor White to return to England for an additional cargo of supplies. It was a great mistake. If White had remained, and the settlers had given themselves to tilling the soil and building houses, no further help would be needed. White set sail. . . . What their fate was has never been ascertained.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 6, p. 83.

1532. DEPRAVITY by Descent. Nero. Though the traditions of cruelty and treachery had been carried on from generation to generation, they seem to have culminated in the father of Nero, who added a tinge of meanness and vulgarity to the brutal manners of his race. His loose morals had been shocking even to a loose age, and men told each other in disgust how he had cheated in his pratorship; how he had killed one of his freedmen only because he had refused to drink as much as he was bidden; how he had purposely driven over a poor boy on the Appian Road; how in a squabble in the Forum he had struck out the eye of a Roman knight; how he had been finally banished for crimes still more shameful. It was a current anecdote of this man, who was "detestable through every period of his life," that when, nine years after his marriage, the birth of his son Nero was announced to him, he answered the congratulations of his friends with the remark, that from himself and Agrippina nothing could have been born but what was hateful, and for the public ruin.—FARZAR'S EARLY DAYS, p. 15.

1533. DEPRAVITY, Evidence of. Samuel Johnson. [In conversation with Boswell, he said:] With respect to original sin, the inquiry is not necessary; for whatever is the cause of human corruption, men are evidently and confessedly so corrupt, that all the laws of heaven and earth are insufficient to restrain them from crimes.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 466.

1534. DEPRECIATION, Financial. Plymouth Colony. At the end of the fourth year there were only one hundred and eighty persons in New England. The managers had expected profitable returns, and were disappointed. They had expended $34,000; there was neither profit nor the hope of any. . . . In November, 1627, eight of the leading men of Plymouth purchased from the Londoners their entire interest, for the sum of $9000.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 13, p. 125.

1535. DEPRECIATION, Foolish. Of Luther. How did the pope act in this violent conflict? [Which began the great Reformation.] Two of his utterances are recorded: "Brother Martin is a very ingenious fellow; but the conflict itself is merely a quarrel between jealous monks." And again: "A drunken German must have written these theses; as soon as he becomes sober he will change his mind." The highest circles of Rome and the immediate attendants upon the pope were guilty of the same depreciative and contemptuous treatment of the Germans and of Luther's theses. In their replies the "obscure German" and his "dog-biting" theses were treated in the most derogatory manner.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 4, p. 49.

1536. DERISION, Public. Reign of James II. [Obadiah Walker had converted Oxford University into a Roman Catholic seminary.] Actors came down to Oxford. . . . Howard's Committee was performed. This play, written soon after the Restoration, exhibited the Puritans in an odious and contemptible light, and had therefore been, during a quarter of a century, a favorite with Oxonian audiences. It was now a greater favorite than ever; for, by a lucky coincidence, one of the most conspicuous characters was an old hypocrite named Obadiah. The audience shouted with delight when, in the last scene, Obadiah was dragged in with a halter round his neck; and the acclamations redoubled when one of the players, departing from the written text of the comedy, proclaimed that Obadiah should be hanged because he had changed his religion. The king was much provoked by this insult.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 262.

1537. DESERTION, Imitated. To William of Orange. [Colonel] Cornbury was soon kept in countenance by a crowd of deserters superior to him in rank and capacity; but during a few days he stood alone in his shame, and was bitterly reviled by many who afterward imitated his example and envied his dishonorable precedence. Among these was his own father. The first outbreak of Clarendon's rage and sorrow was highly pathetic. "O God!" he ejaculated, "that a son of mine should be a rebel!" A fortnight later he made up his mind to be a rebel himself. Yet it would be unjust to pronounce him a mere hypocrite. In revolutions men live fast; the experience of years is crowded into hours; old habits of thought and action are violently broken; novelties, which at first sight inspire dread and disgust, become in a few days familiar, endurable, attractive. Many men of far purer virtue and higher spirit than Clarendon were prepared, before that memorable year ended, to do what they would have pronounced wicked and infamous when it began.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 464.

1538. DESERTION, Shameful. Agathocles. He suffered a signal reverse of fortune. During his absence in Africa the Sicilian States, oppressed by Syracuse, formed a league in defence of their liberties. Agathocles having embarked a part of his troops, with the design of chastising this revolt, the Carthaginians in the mean time reduced the remainder of the Syracusan army to such extremity, that even the return of their leader was insufficient to retrieve their losses. Regarding their situation as desperate, Agathocles, with the meanest treachery, abandoned his army in the night, and escaped back to Sicily in a single vessel, leaving his two sons to the mercy of the Carthaginians, who put them both to death.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 8.

1539. DESIRES, Potential. Swedenborg. Any one in the spiritual world appears to be present if another intensely desires his presence; for from that desire he sees him in thought, and puts himself in his state. Again one person is removed from another in proportion as he holds him in aversion; for all aversion is from contrariety of the affections and disagreement of the thoughts; therefore many who appear together in one place in the spiritual world, so long as they agree, separate as soon as they disagree. Further: when any one goes from one place to another, whether it be in his own city, in the courts, or the gardens, or to others out of his own city, he arrives sooner when he has a strong desire to be there, and later when his desire is less strong ; the way itself being lengthened or shortened according to his desire of arrival. Hence again it is evident that distances, and consequently spaces, exist with the angels altogether according to the state of their minds.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, p. 112.

1540. DESOLATION by Pestilence. London. Looking back upon these times, they seem sad, black, and desolate ; the plague ravaged the metropolis, the deaths averaging about five thousand a week. The city was empty, grass was growing in the street ; and Lily, the astrologer, going to prayers to St. Antholin's, in Watling Street, from a house over the Strand Bridge, between six and seven in a summer morning of the month of July, testifies that so few people were then alive, and the streets so unfrequented he met only three persons in the way.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 3, p. 56.

1541. DESPAIR of the Defeated. American Revolution. [Fort Washington and Fort Lee, near New York, had been captured by the British. Two thousand prisoners and great military stores sorely needed fell into the enemy's hands.] The British pressed forward after the retreating Americans. Washington, with his army now reduced to 3000 men, crossed the Passaic to Newark ; but Cornwallis and Knyphausen came hard after the fugitives. The patriots retreated to Elizabethtown, thence to New Brunswick, thence to Princeton, and finally to Trenton on the Delaware. The British were all the time in close pursuit, and the music of their bands was frequently heard by the rear-guard of the American army. Nothing but the consummate skill of Washington saved the remnant of his forces from destruction. Despair seemed settling on the country like a pall.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 39, p. 314.

1542. DESPAIR, Determination of. Roman Emperor Aurelian. He there experienced that the most absolute power is a weak defence against the effects of despair. He had threatened one of his secretaries who was accused of extortion ; and it was known that he seldom threatened in vain. The last hope which remained for the criminal was to involve some of the principal officers of the army in his danger, or at least in his fears. Artfully counterfeiting his master's hand, he showed them, in a long and bloody list, their own names devoted to death. Without suspecting or examining the fraud, they resolved to secure their lives by the murder of the emperor. [They assassinated him.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 11.

1543. DESPERATION in Battle. Persians. [Khaled, a Mohammedan general, marched with 20,000 men against Harmouz, a vassal of the Persian king.] The battle commenced by a chivalrous duel, in view of both camps, by the two generals. Harmouz, slain in the combat by Khaled, left his army without a general. The Persians, decided either to die or vanquish, had chained themselves to one another by the legs, so as to deprive themselves beforehand of the means of flight. They perished in a body beneath the swords and arrows of the Arabs.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 162.

1544. DESPERATION, Final. Blind King John. The King of Bohemia, who was nearly blind, told his men to lead him so far forward that he might strike one stroke with his sword ; and they all tied the reins of their bridles each to the other, that they should not lose him in the press ; and they were all slain, the king in the midst.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 30, p. 462.

1545. DESPERATION, Scheme in. Monarchical. Thomas Wentworth, successively created Lord Wentworth and Earl of Strafford, a man of great abilities, eloquence, and courage, but of a cruel and imperious nature, was the counsellor most trusted in political and military affairs. He . . . formed a vast and deeply-meditated scheme, which very nearly confounded even the able tactics of the statesmen by whom the House of Commons had been directed. To this scheme, in his confidential correspondence, he gave the expressive name of Thorough. His object was to do in England all, and more than all, that Richelieu was doing in France ; to make Charles a monarch as absolute as any on the Continent ; to put the estates and the personal liberty of the whole people at the disposal of the Crown ; to deprive the courts of law of all independent authority, even in ordinary questions of civil right between man and man, and to punish with merciless rigor all who murmured.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 81.

1546. DESPOTISM, Revival of. Cardinal Wolsey. The ten years which follow the fall of Wolsey are among the most momentous in our history. The monarchy at last realized its power, and the work for which Wolsey had paved the way was carried out with a terrible thoroughness. The one great institution which could still offer resistance to the royal will was struck down. The church became a mere instrument of the central despotism. The people learned their helplessness in rebellions easily suppressed and avenged with ruthless severity. A reign of terror, organized with consummate and merciless skill, held England panic-stricken at Henry's feet. The noblest heads rolled from the block. Virtue and learning could not save Thomas More ; royal descent could not save Lady Salisbury. The putting away of one queen, the execution of another, taught England that nothing was too high for Henry's "courage" or too sacred for his "appetite." Parliament assembled only to sanction arts of unscrupulous tyranny or to build up by its own statutes the fabric of absolute rule. All the constitutional safeguards of English freedom were swept away. Arbitrary taxation, arbitrary legislation, arbitrary imprisonment, were powers claimed without dispute and unsparingly used by the Crown.—ENG. PEOPLE, § 555.

1547. DESTINY, Unavoidable. Napoleon I. [At the battle of Friedland] a cannon ball came over their heads, just above the bayonets of the troops. A young soldier instinctively dodged. Napoleon looked at him, and, smiling, said : "My friend, if that ball were destined for you, though you were to burrow a hundred feet under ground, it would be sure to find you there."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 35.

1548. DESTRUCTION, Difficult. Temple of Jupiter. In Syria the divine and excellent Marcus, as he is styled by Theodoret, a bishop animated with apostolic fervor, resolved to level with the ground the stately temples within the diocese of Apamea. His attack was resisted by the skill and solidity with which the temple of Jupiter had been constructed. The building was seated on an eminence; on each of the four sides the lofty roof was supported by fifteen massy columns, sixteen feet in circumference; and the large stones of which they were composed were firmly cemented with lead and iron. The force of the strongest and sharpest tools had been tried without effect. It was found necessary to undermine the foundations of the columns, which fell down as soon as the temporary wooden props had been consumed with fire.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 28.

1549. DESTRUCTION of Empire. Fall of Rome. The decline and fall of Rome is the greatest event in history. It occupied a larger portion of the earth's surface, it affected the lives and fortunes of a larger number of human beings, than any other revolution on record. For it was essentially one, though it took centuries to consummate, and though it had for its theatre the civilized world. Great evolutions and catastrophes happened before it, and have happened since, but nothing which can compare with it in volume and mere physical size. Nor was it less morally. The destruction of Rome was not only a destruction of an empire, it was the destruction of a phase of human thought, of a system of human beliefs, of morals, politics, civilization, as all these had existed in the world for ages. The drama is so vast, the cataclysm so appalling, that even at this day we are hardly removed from it far enough to take it fully in. The mind is oppressed, the imagination flags under the load imposed upon it. The capture and sack of a town one can fairly conceive: the massacre, outrage, the flaming roofs, the desolation. Even the devastation of a province can be approximately reproduced in thought. But what thought can embrace the devastation and destruction of all the civilized portions of Europe, Africa, and Asia? Who can realize a Thirty Years' War lasting five hundred years?—MORRISON'S GIBBON, ch. 7.

1550. DESTRUCTION, Terrible. Cimbrians. [Caius Marius defeated the Cimbrians, who endeavored to escape by flight.] The Romans drove back the fugitives to their camp, where they found the most shocking spectacle. The women standing in mourning by their carriages killed those that fled; some their husbands, some their brothers, others their fathers. They strangled their little children with their own hands, and threw them under the wheels and horses' feet. Last of all, they killed themselves. They tell us of one that was seen slung from the top of a wagon, with a child hanging at each heel. The men, for want of trees, tied themselves by the neck, some to the horns of oxen, others to their legs, and then pricked them on; that by the starting of the beasts they might be strangled or torn to pieces. But though they were so industrious to destroy themselves, above 60,000 were taken prisoners.—PLUTARCH'S CAIUS MARIUS.

1551. DETAILS, Importance of. Military. There were no stores sent from Italy to supply the daily waste of material. The men had to mend and perhaps make their own clothes and shoes, and repair their own arms. Skill in the use of tools was not enough without the tools themselves. Had the spades and mattocks been supplied by contract, had the axes been of soft iron, fair to the eye and failing to the stroke, not a man in Cæsar's army would have returned to Rome to tell the tale of its destruction. How the legionaries acquired these various arts, whether the Italian peasantry were generally educated in such occupations, or whether on this occasion there was a special selection of the best, of this we have no information.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 14.

1552. DETECTIVE, Harmless. Robert Burns. [He was an excise officer.] Smuggling was then common throughout Scotland, both in the shape of brewing and of selling beer and whiskey without license. Burns took a serious yet humane view of his duty. To the regular smuggler he is said to have been severe; to the country folk, farmers, or cotters, who sometimes transgressed, he tempered justice with mercy. Many stories are told of his leniency to these last. At Thornhill, on a fair day, he was seen to call at the door of a poor woman who for the day was doing a little illicit business on her own account. A nod and a movement of the forefinger brought the woman to the doorway. "Kate, are you mad? Don't you know that the supervisor and I will be in upon you in forty minutes?" Burns at once disappeared among the crowd, and the poor woman was saved a heavy fine.—SHAIRP'S BURNS, ch. 5.

1553. DETECTIVE, A stupid. Colonel Jameson. Major André [the spy] passed the American outposts in safety; but at Tarrytown, twenty-five miles from the city, he was suddenly confronted by three militia men, who stripped him, found his papers, and delivered him to Colonel Jameson at North Castle. Through that officer's amazing stupidity Arnold was at once notified that John Anderson—that being the assumed name of André—had been taken with his passport and some papers "of a very dangerous tendency." Arnold [the American traitor and commandant at West Point] fled to the river and escaped on board the [British vessel, the] Vulture.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 43, p. 345.

1554. DETECTIVE, Useful. Cicero. The ambassadors of the Allobroges having fruitlessly applied to the Roman Senate for a redress of grievances, Publius Lentulus, the prætor, gave them assurance in private of protection and favor, provided they would return to their province, and dispose their countrymen to arm in support of a powerful party, which, he affirmed, would soon have the command of the republic. Of this negotiation Cicero received intelligence. The consul, with infinite prudence, instructed his informant to encourage the correspondence between Lentulus and the ambassadors, and to urge the latter to demand from Lentulus a list of the names of all his partisans, in order to show to their countrymen the number and power of those friends on whose protection they might depend, if they armed in support of this great revolution in the State. Lentulus fell into the snare that was laid for him. He gave a list of the names of all concerned in the conspiracy of Catiline to the ambassadors, who, setting out upon their journey, were waylaid, and their despatches seized by order of the consul. Cicero had now in his hands the most complete evidence against the whole of the conspirators. Assembling the Sen ate, he produced first the written evidence, consisting of letters, under the hands of the chief partisans of Catiline, together with lists of arms, and the places where they were deposited, as well as separate instructions for the ready co-operation of the different leaders in their distinct departments of the plot. The deputies of the Allobroges were produced before the Senate, and made no scruple to confirm the proof arising from those documents.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 1.

1555. DETERMINATION asserted. Sword. We are told that a centurion whom Cæsar had sent to Rome, waiting at the door of the Senate-house for the result of the deliberations, and being informed that the Senate would not give Cæsar a longer term in his commission, laid his hand upon his sword, and said, "But this shall give it."—PLUTARCH'S CÆSAR.

1556. DETERMINATION, Emphatic. Ballot. [When the Persians had invaded Greece, and the allies had evaded a conflict by removing their camp,] Amompharetus, an intrepid man, who had long been eager to engage, and uneasy to see the battle so often put off and delayed, plainly called this decampment a disgraceful flight, and declared he would not quit his post, but remain there with his troops, and stand it out against Mardonius. And when Pausanias represented to him that this measure was taken in pursuance of the counsel and determination of the confederates, he took up a large stone with both his hands, and throwing it at Pausanias' feet, said, "This is my ballot for a battle; and I despise the timid counsels and resolves of others."—PLUTARCH'S ARISTIDES.

1557. DETERMINATION, Fixed. Joan of Arc. It was in vain that her father, when he heard her purpose, swore to drown her ere she should go to the field with men at arms. It was in vain that the priest, the wise people of the village, the captain of Vaucouleurs, doubted and refused to aid her. "I must go to the king," persisted the peasant girl, "even if I wear my limbs to the very knees. I had far rather rest and spin by my mother's side," she pleaded, with a touching pathos, "for this is no work of my choosing; but I must go and do it, for my Lord wills it." "And who," they asked, "is your Lord?" "He is God." Words such as these touched the rough captain at last; he took Jeanne by the hand, and swore to lead her to the king.—ENG. PEOPLE, § 429.

1558. DETERMINATION, Obstinate. Scotch Presbyterians. Persecution, they said, could only kill the body, but the black indulgence was deadly to the soul. Driven from the towns, they assembled on heaths and mountains. Attacked by the civil power, they without scruple repelled force by force. At every conventicle they mustered in arms. They repeatedly broke out into open rebellion. They were easily defeated, and mercilessly punished; but neither defeat nor punishment could subdue their spirit. Hunted down like wild beasts, tortured till their bones were beaten flat, imprisoned by hundreds, hanged by scores, exposed at one time to the license of soldiers from England, abandoned at another time to the mercy of bands of marauders from the Highlands, they still stood at bay in a mood so savage that the boldest and mightiest oppressor could not but dread the audacity of their despair.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 174.

1559. DETERMINATION, Strange. Joan of Arc. Orleans had already been driven by famine to offers of surrender when Jeanne appeared in the French court, and a force was gathering, under the Count of Dunois, at Blois, for a final effort at its relief. It was at the head of this force that Jeanne placed herself. The girl was in her eighteenth year, tall, finely formed, with all the vigor and activity of her peasant rearing, able to stay from dawn till nightfall on horseback without meat or drink. As she mounted her charger, clad in white armor from head to foot, with a great white banner studded with fleur-de-lis waving over her head, she seemed "a thing wholly divine, whether to see or hear." The 10,000 men at arms who followed her from Blois—rough plunderers, whose only prayer was that of La Hire, "Sire Dieu, I pray you to do for La Hire what La Hire would do for you were you captain at arms and he God"—left off their oaths and foul living at her word, and gathered round the altars on their march. . . . The people crowded round her as she rode along, praying her to work miracles, and bringing crosses and chaplets to be blessed by her touch. "Touch them yourself," she said to an old dame, Margaret; "your touch will be just as good as mine." But her faith in her mission remained as firm as ever. "The maid prays and requires you," she wrote to Bedford, "to work no more distraction in France, but to come in her company to rescue the Holy Sepulchre from the Turk." "I bring you," she told Dunois, when he sallied out of Orleans to meet her after her two days' march from Blois—"I bring you the best aid ever sent to any one—the aid of the King of heaven." The besiegers looked on overawed as she entered Orleans, and, riding round the walls, bade the people shake off the fear of the forts which surrounded them.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 430.

1560. DETERMINATION for Success. "Win his Spurs." [At the battle of Cressy, in 1346,] when the battle was at its hottest, a knight came to the king [Edward III.] and said that Warwick and Oxford and the Prince of Wales [the king's son, the Black Prince] were fiercely fought withal, and were sore banded, and they desired aid from him and his men. Then the king asked if his son were dead or hurt, or felled to the earth; and the knight answered, "No." "Say, then, to them that sent you," replied the king, "that they suffer him this day to win his spurs, and ask me not for aid while my son is alive."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 30, p. 461.

1561. DETERMINATION, Vow of. Philip of France. The easy reduction of Normandy on the fall of Château Gaillard at a later time proved Richard's foresight; but foresight and sagacity were mingled in him with a brutal violence and a callous indifference to honor. "I would take it were its walls of iron!" Philip exclaimed in wrath as he saw the fortress rise. "I would hold it were its walls of butter," was the defiant answer of his foe. It was church land, and the Archbishop of Rouen laid Normandy under interdict at its seizure; but the king met the interdict with mockery, and intrigued with Rome till the censure was withdrawn. He was just as defiant of a "rain of blood," whose fall scared his courtiers. "Had an angel from heaven bid him abandon his work," says a cool observer, "he would have answered with a curse."—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 153.

1562. DETERMINATION, Youthful. Alcibiades. One day he was playing at dice with other boys in the street; and when it came to his turn to throw a loaded wagon came up. At first he called to the driver to stop, because he was to throw in the way over which the wagon was to pass. The rustic disregarding him and driving on, the other boys broke away; but Alcibiades threw himself upon his face directly before the wagon, and stretching himself out, bade the fellow drive on if he pleased. Upon this he was so startled that he stopped his horses, while those that saw it ran up to him with terror.—PLUTARCH'S ALCIBIADES.

1563. DETESTATION, Courage under. Cromwell. Numberless little coteries of hissing snakes and slippery eels were wriggling and twisting toward desired eminence. As we have said, Cromwell never was a republican—less so now than ever. Shouts of "Usurper!" "Tyrant!" "Traitor!" "Deceiver!" from other factions; "Detestable wretch!" "Murderer!" were met by the calm lightning of that deep, clear gray eye. "Very likely, gentlemen; just as you please, about all such pleasant epithets. Meantime, distinctly understand that I am here somehow or other. I have some notion that I have been put here by the Eternal God, who raiseth up and casteth down. Noble natures, you will please to understand that I am ruler here to save you from clammy eels or hissing snakes; and you, Messieurs Eels and Snakes, put yourselves into the smallest compass, if you please, or, hy that Eternal God that sent me, so much the worse for you!"—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 18, p. 240.

1564. DETESTATION, Public. Eutrophius. [The eunuch and minister of the Emperor Arcadius, in the last period of Roman history.] Secure as he now imagined himself in the favor of his sovereign, and defended by the terror of his own uncontrolled authority, this base eunuch endeavored to engross the whole power of the government. He caused the weak Arcadius to create him a patrician, to honor him with the title of father to the emperor, and at length to confer on him the consulship. His image, preceded by the fasces, was carried in triumph through all the cities of the East, but was more generally saluted with hissing than with applause.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 5.

1565. DEVELOPMENT, Social. Lombards. So rapid was the influence of climate and example, that the Lombards of the fourth generation surveyed with curiosity and affright the portraits of their savage forefathers. Their heads were shaven behind, but the shaggy locks hung over their eyes and mouth, and a long beard represented the name and character of the nation. Their dress consisted of loose linen garments, after the fashion of the Anglo-Saxons, which were decorated, in their opinion, with broad stripes of variegated colors.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 45.

1566. DEVIL, Casting out the. Bunyan. An ale-house keeper in the neighborhood of Elstow had a son who was half-witted. The favorite amusement, when a party was collected drinking, was for the father to provoke the lad's temper, and for the lad to curse his father and wish the devil had him. The devil at last did have the ale-house keeper, and rent and tore him till he died. "I," says Bunyan, "was eye and ear witness of what I here say. . . . I saw him in one of his fits, and saw his flesh, as it was thought, gathered up in a heap about the bigness of half an egg, to the unutterable torture and affliction of the old man. There was also one Freeman, who was more than an ordinary doctor, sent for to cast out the devil, and I was there when he attempted to do it. The manner whereof was this. They had the possessed in an outroom, and laid him upon his belly upon a form, with his head hanging down over the form's end. Then they bound him down thereto, which done, they set a pan of coals under his mouth, and put something therein which made a great smoke—by this means, as it was said, to fetch out the devil. There they kept the man till he was almost smothered in the smoke, but no devil came out of him, at which Freeman was somewhat abashed.—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 1.

1567. DEVILS tested. Boston Damsel. Cotton Mather . . . invited her to his house; and the artful girl easily imposed on his credulity. The devil would permit her to read in Quaker books, or the Common Prayer, or Popish books; but a prayer from Cotton Mather or a chapter from the Bible would throw her into convulsions. By a series of experiments, in reading aloud passages from the Bible in various languages, the minister satisfied himself, "by trials of their capacity," that devils are well skilled in languages, and understand Latin, and Greek, and even Hebrew, though he fell "upon one inferior Indian language, which the demons did not seem so well to understand." Experiments were made, with unequal success, to see if devils can know the thoughts of others; and the inference was that "all devils are not alike sagacious."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 19.

1568. DEVOTION, Absolute. Mohammedan. [After one of Mahomet's unsuccessful battles,] one of the women encountered the vanquished army returning to Medina. "Where is my father?" asked she of the soldiers. "He is slain," was the reply. "And my husband?" "Slain also." "And my son?" "Slain with them," said they. "But Mahomet?" "Here is he, alive," replied the warriors. "Very well," said she, apostrophizing the prophet, "since thou livest still, all our misfortunes are as nothing!"—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 117.

1569. DEVOTION, Commendable. St. Ambrose. Ambrose had devoted his life and his abilities to the service of the church. Wealth was the object of his contempt; he had renounced his private patrimony; and he sold, without hesitation, the consecrated plate for the redemption of captives. The clergy and people of Milan were attached to their archbishop; and he deserved the esteem, without soliciting the favor, or apprehending the displeasure, of his feeble sovereigns.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 27.

1570. DEVOTION, Entire. Rev. Thomas Coke. The first Protestant bishop in the Western Hem isphere expended his large patrimonial estate on his missions and chapels. He was married twice; both his wives were like-minded with himself, and both had considerable fortunes, which were used like his own. . . . It is doubtful whether any Protestant of his day contributed more from his own property for the spread of the Gospel. . . . Flying, during nearly forty years, over England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland; crossing the Atlantic eighteen times; traversing the United States and the West Indies; the founder of Methodist missions in the West Indies, in Africa, and in Asia; in England, Wales and Ireland; the founder of its first Tract Society; . . . he has been pronounced "the greatest man of the last century," in "labors and services as a minister of Christ." [He died while on his passage to India as a missionary, going at his own expense, at the age of sixty-seven.]—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 3, p. 340.

1571. DEVOTION, Ministerial. Thomas Lee [a Methodist itinerant under Wesley] was initiated at Pateley Bridge into the common lot of Methodist evangelists, and received his first baptism from the clods, clubs, and stones of the mob. His meek and pure spirit was not weak, but displayed during this and later trials a heroism to be admired. "We have done enough," cried the mob—"we have done enough to make an end of him." "I did, indeed," he says, "reel to and fro, and my head was broken with a stone. But I never found my soul more happy, nor was ever more composed in my closet. It was a glorious time, and there are several who date their conversion from that day."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 356.

1572. DEVOTION, Self-sacrificing. Belisarius. In the siege of Osimo the general was nearly transpierced with an arrow, if the mortal stroke had not been intercepted by one of his guards, who lost, in that pious office, the use of his hand. [It was the weapon of a Goth.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41.

1573. DEVOTIONS, Morning. Ancient Romans. The first, second, and third hours were differently employed at Rome by the different ranks of the people; and even by these differently according to their separate inclinations. It was the custom with many to begin the day by visiting the temples, where, according as their ideas of devotion were more or less strict, they either sacrificed, or paid their adoration by simply kissing their hand, or prostrating themselves before their own particular deity. Those who were more rigorously devout made their conscientious circuit to most of the temples in the city, a business which must necessarily have occupied many hours; but the great bulk of the citizens, attached to temporal concerns, and intent on more substantial duties, employed the morning very differently.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 4.

1574. DIARY, Artful. Samuel Johnson. [To Mrs. Thrale.] JOHNSON: "No, madam; a man loves to review his own mind. That is the use of a diary or journal." LORD TRIMLESTOWN: "True, sir. As the ladies love to see themselves in a glass, so a man likes to see himself in his journal." BOSWELL: "A very pretty allusion." JOHNSON: "Yes, indeed." BOSWELL: "And as a lady adjusts her dress before a mirror, a man adjusts his character by looking at his journal."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON.

1575. DICTATION, Simultaneous. Napoleon I. At the four corners of the room tables were set for his secretaries; . . . he was accustomed to dictate simultaneously. He possessed the rare faculty of giving judgment upon almost any number of subjects at the same time. He usually paced the floor with his hat on, and his hands clasped behind his back. . . . To one scribe he would dictate instructions for the manœuvres of the army. Turning to another he would give the decisive opinion on a difficult question of finance or on the administrative government of the empire. To a third he would communicate answers to the ambassadors in foreign countries. A fourth was not unfrequently intrusted with his private correspondence.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 7.

1576. DIET, Simplicity in. John Howard. On one of his tours he had a severe fit of the gout, which led him to resolve that, if ever he recovered, he would never again drink wine or spirits. He kept his resolution, though he continued to provide wine for his guests. Soon after, his health being still impaired, he tried the experiment of living without meat; and, as a vegetable diet seemed to benefit him, he never again partook of animal food. All this was highly serviceable to him in his philanthropic travels, when he was often beyond the reach of any supplies except the most simple. He could live, and often did live, for weeks at a time, upon biscuit, raisins, and tea. Tea, in fact, was his only luxury. He always travelled with a supply of the best tea, and a portable apparatus for preparing it. On arriving at a town he would sit in his carriage and dine upon tea and biscuit, but send his servant to the inn to get a good dinner.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 40.

1577. DIFFICULTIES, Firmness amid. Emperor Claudius. An original letter addressed by Claudius to the Senate and people. . . . "Conscript fathers," says the emperor, "know that 320,000 Goths have invaded the Roman territory. If I vanquish them, your gratitude will reward my services. Should I fall, remember that I am the successor of Gallienus. The whole republic is fatigued and exhausted. We shall fight after Valerian, after Ingenuus, Regillianus, Lollianus, Posthumus, Celsus, and a thousand others, whom a just contempt for Gallienus provoked into rebellion. We are in want of darts, of spears, and of shields. The strength of the empire, Gaul, and Spain are usurped by Tetricus, and we blush to acknowledge that the archers of the East serve under the banners of Zenobia. Whatever we shall perform will be sufficiently great." The melancholy firmness of this epistle announces a hero careless of his fate, conscious of his danger, but still deriving a well-grounded hope from the resources of his own mind. [A great victory followed.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 11.

1578. DIFFICULTIES, Mechanical. Charles Goodyear. The agent of that company, however, had but a sorry tale to tell Charles Goodyear in 1833. He told him that the material had presented unexpected difficulties. Shoes made in winter melted as soon as the summer came. When exposed to the cold, they grew as hard as stone; but a temperature of one hundred degrees reduced a case of shoes to a mass of gum. And, what was worse, no one could tell of the winter-made shoes, whether they would stand the summer heats or not. The company feared to manufacture a large quantity, since the first hot week in June would melt the product of eight months' labor, as readily as a single pair of shoes. In short, the agent said, unless a way could be discovered of hardening or curing this singular substance, and that very soon, the Roxbury Company would be obliged to wind up its affairs from the exhaustion, at once, of its patience and its capital. This catastrophe, in fact, soon after happened, to the ruin of a large number of the people of Massachusetts.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 216.

1579. DIFFICULTIES overcome. Timour. [Invasion of India.] Between the Jihoon and the Indus they crossed one of the ridges of the mountains which are styled by the Arabian geographers the Stony Girdles of the earth. The highland robbers were subdued or extirpated; but great numbers of men and horses perished in the snow; the emperor himself was let down a precipice on a portable scaffold—the ropes were one hundred and fifty cubits in length; and before he could reach the bottom, this dangerous operation was five times repeated.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65.

1580. ——. Napoleon I. [When crossing the Alps with his army] two skilful engineers had been sent to explore the path, and to do whatever could be done in the removal of obstructions. They returned with an appalling recital of the apparently insurmountable difficulties of the way. "Is it possible," inquired Napoleon, "to cross the pass?" "Perhaps," was the hesitating reply; "it is within the limits of possibility." "Forward, then," was the energetic response.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 19.

1581. DIFFICULTIES removed. Gordium Knot. [When Alexander the Great took] Gordium, which is said to have been the seat of the ancient Midas, he found the famous chariot, fastened with cords, made of the bark of the cornel tree, and was informed of a tradition, firmly believed in among the barbarians, that the Fates had decreed the empire of the world to the man who should untie the knot. Most historians say that it was twisted so many private ways, and the ends so artfully concealed within, that Alexander, finding he could not untie it, cut it asunder with his sword, and so made many ends instead of two.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

1582. DIGNITARIES multiplied. Virginia Colony. On the 23d of May, 1609, King James, without consulting the wishes of his American colonists, revoked their constitution, and granted to the London company a new charter. . . . The council was at once organized in accordance with this charter, and the excellent Lord De La Ware chosen governor for life. With him were joined in authority Sir Thomas Gates, lieutenant general; Sir George Somers, admiral; Christopher Newport, vice-admiral; Sir Thomas Dale, high marshal; Sir Ferdinand Wainman, master of horse; and other dignitaries of similar sort. . . . five hundred emigrants . . . sailed for America. [There were about seven hundred colonists in all.]—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 10, p. 105.

1583. DIGNITY compromised. Theodora. [Wife of the Roman Emperor Theophilus.] She deserved the love, but did not escape the severity, of her lord. From the palace garden he beheld a vessel deeply laden, and steering into the port; on the discovery that the precious cargo of Syrian luxury was the property of his wife, he condemned the ship to the flames, with a sharp reproach, that her avarice had degraded the character of an empress into that of a merchant.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 48.

1584. DIGNITY, Cruel. Dejoces. The monarchy of the Medes, the third of those which sprang from the ruins of the first Assyrian empire, appears to have begun later than the other two; Dejoces, its first sovereign . . . is reported to have built the city of Ecbatan, and to have bestowed much pains in polishing and civilizing his people; yet those laws which he is said to have enacted breathed strongly the spirit of despotism. It was common to the Asiatic monarchs very rarely to show themselves to their subjects. Dejoces is said to have carried the haughtiness of his deportment to an unusual height. It was death only to smile in his presence.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 11.

1585. DIGNITY exhibited. Samuel Johnson. That superiority over his fellows, which he maintained with so much dignity in his march through life, was not assumed from vanity and ostentation, but was the natural and constant effect of those extraordinary powers of mind, of which he could not but be conscious by comparison; the intellectual difference, which, in other cases of comparison of characters, is often a matter of undecided contest, being as clear in his case as the superiority of stature in some men above others. Johnson did not strut or stand on tiptoe; he only did not stoop.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 7.

1586. DIGNITY, Ludicrous. Rollo. Rollo of Normandy took the oath of fealty to [Charles, the simple King of France,] in the accustomed form; but on being told that, in order to complete the ceremony, it was necessary that he should kneel and kiss the monarch's foot, he started back, and disdainfully refused to comply. The point of etiquette being insisted on, Rollo at length deputed one of his attendants to perform the duty in his stead. The rude soldier, either intentionally or from awkwardness, lifted the king's foot with so little circumspection, that Charles fell backward from his seat. His comrades could not repress a shout of laughter, which the French were in no condition to resent.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 6, § 10.

1587. DIGNITY offended. Rodolph. Lewis, Duke of Bavaria, named for emperor Rodolph of Hapsburg. It may be conceived that it should be somewhat humiliating to [Ottocarus II.] the King of Bohemia, who was one of the proudest princes of his time, to find the master of his household elevated to the rank of his sovereign, and as such entitled to exact homage from his dominions of Bohemia. When this demand was made by the heralds of the new emperor, [Ottocarus II.] indignantly replied, "Go tell your master that I owe him nothing, for I have paid him his wages." . . . Rodolph instantly declared war against him, and in one campaign deprived him of Austria, Stiria, and Carniola. . . .

He now acquainted the king of Bohemia that his dignity as emperor positively required that he, the king, should perform homage as his vassal. Ottocarus II. was obliged to submit; but he required, as a condition, that the homage should be privately performed in the emperor's tent, and before the officers of the empire alone. On the day appointed, he repaired in his robes of state to the camp of the emperor, who chose on that occasion to be clothed in the plainest apparel. When Ottocarus was on his knees before Rodolph, the curtains of the tent were drawn up, and the King of Bohemia was exhibited in that attitude to the whole imperial army. This provoked the king to the highest pitch of indignation. He immediately renounced his allegiance, and declared war against the emperor, in hopes of recovering his dominions of Austria; but in his first battle he was defeated and slain.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 11.

1588. DIGNITY preserved. Porus. [Alexander invaded India and defeated Porus, one of its princes.] The captive prince being brought into the presence of his conqueror, Alexander generously praised him for the courage and ability he had displayed, and concluded by asking him in what manner he wished and expected to be treated. "As a king," said Porus. Struck with the magnanimity of this answer, Alexander declared he should not be frustrated of his wishes; for from that moment he should regard him as a sovereign prince and think himself honored by his friendship and alliance. . . . He added to the kingdom of Porus some of the adjoining provinces.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4.

1589. DIGNITY. Regard for. George Washington. A.D. 1776. [In July Lord Howe arrived at New York commissioned to pacificate the colonists.] The person with whom he most wished to communicate was the American commander-in-chief. On the second day after his arrival he sent a white flag up the harbor, with a copy of his declaration enclosed in a letter addressed to Washington as a private man. But Washington declined to receive the communication. Lord Howe was grieved at the rebuff; in the judgment of Congress, Washington "acted with dignity becoming his station."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 1.

1590. ——. Lucullus. [Once when Lucullus was to] sup alone, and saw but one table and a very moderate provision, he called the servant who had the care of these matters, and expressed his dissatisfaction. The servant said he thought, as nobody was invited, his master would not want an expensive supper. "What," said he, "didst thou not know that this evening Lucullus sups with Lucullus?"—PLUTARCH'S LUCULLUS.

1591. DILEMMA decided. Marcia. Commodus fought as a common gladiator in the circus, and his favorite epithet was that of the Roman Hercules, which is still to be seen upon his coins and medals. His whole conduct was equally odious and contemptible, and the public measures of his reign consist of nothing but the detection of some conspiracies which the hatred of his subjects and his own cruelty and inhumanity could not fail to excite. One conspiracy, at length, delivered the empire of its tyrant. His concubine Marcia, his chamberlain, and the commander of his guard had ventured to remonstrate with him on the indecency of an emperor displaying himself as a combatant in the public games. This was an offence which could not be forgiven, and he accordingly determined their immediate destruction. Marcia found the list of his intended victims written in his own hand. She made haste to anticipate his purpose, and caused this worthless and inglorious wretch to be strangled, in the thirty-second year of his age and the thirteenth of his reign.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 2.

1592. DINNER. Bad. Samuel Johnson. At the inn where we stopped he was exceedingly dissatisfied with some roast mutton which he had for dinner. The ladies, I saw, wondered to see the great philosopher, whose wisdom and wit they had been admiring all the way, get into ill-humor from such a cause. He scolded the waiter, saying, "It is as bad as bad can be; it is ill-fed, ill-killed, ill-kept, and ill-dressed."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 519.

1593. DINNER. Waiting. Samuel Johnson. One of the company not being come at the appointed hour, I proposed, as usual upon such occasions, to order dinner to be served, adding, "Ought six people to be kept waiting for one?" "Why, yes," answered Johnson, with a delicate humanity, "if the one will suffer more by your sitting down than the six will do by waiting."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 163.

1594. DIPLOMACY. Effect of. Reign of Charles II. Sunderland was Secretary of State. In this man the political immorality of his age was personified in the most lively manner. Nature had given him a keen understanding, a restless and mischievous temper, a cold heart, and an abject spirit. His mind had undergone a training by which all his vices had been nursed up to the rankest maturity. At his entrance into public life he had passed several years in diplomatic posts abroad, and had been, during some time, minister in France. Every calling has its peculiar temptations. There is no injustice in saying that diplomatists, as a class, have always been more distinguished by their address, by the art with which they win the confidence of those with whom they have to deal, and by the ease with which they catch the tone of every society into which they are admitted, than by generous enthusiasm or austere rectitude; and the relations between Charles and Louis were such that no English nobleman could long reside in France as envoy and retain any patriotic or honorable sentiment. Sunderland came forth from the bad school in which he had been brought up, cunning, supple, shameless, free from all prejudices, and destitute of all principles.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2.

1595. DIPLOMACY. Expensive. British. [In 1862] the ports of the Southern States were . . . so closely blockaded that war-vessels could no longer be sent abroad. In this emergency the Confederates turned to the ship-yards of Great Britain, and from that vantage-ground began to build and equip their cruisers. In spite of the remonstrances of the United States, the British Government connived at this proceeding; and here was laid the foundation of a difficulty which afterward cost the treasury of England $15,000,000. [The award of a court of arbitration for damages to American commerce.]—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 66, p. 533.

1596. DIPLOMACY of Falsehood. Queen Elizabeth. Had Elizabeth written the story of her reign she would have prided herself, not on the triumph of England or the ruin of Spain, but on the skill with which she had hoodwinked and outwitted every statesman in Europe during fifty years. Nothing is more revolting, but nothing is more characteristic, of the queen than her shameless mendacity. It was an age of political lying; but in the profusion and recklessness of her lies Elizabeth stood without a peer in Christendom. A falsehood was to her simply an intellectual means of meeting a difficulty; and the ease with which she asserted or denied whatever suited her purpose was only equalled by the cynical indifference with which she met the exposure of her lies as soon as their purpose was answered. Her trickery, in fact, had its political value. Ignoble and wearisome as the queen's diplomacy seems to us now, tracking it as we do through a thousand despatches, it succeeded in its main end, for it gained time, and every year that was gained doubled Elizabeth's strength.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 716.

1597. DIPLOMACY, Game of. Concealment. [In 1697 Boufflers, one of the marshals of France, asked his sovereign's permission to meet Portland, the confidential friend and adviser of William III., at a point midway between the two armies of Britain and France, for private conversation respecting the possibility of a peace. Louis consented, adding this suggestion,] "He was to speak as little as possible, and to draw from Portland all he could."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 13, p. 198.

1598. DIPLOMACY, Inscrutable. Bismarck. When he was ambassador at Frankfort . . . he saw, with the clearness of an honest mind, all the humbug of what is called diplomacy. He gives a humorous account of the manner in which he and his fellow-diplomatists "worried themselves with their important nothings." "Nobody," he wrote, "not even the most malicious sceptic of a Democrat, believes what quackery and self-importance there is in this diplomatizing. . . . I am making enormous progress in the art of saying nothing in a great many words. I write reports of many sheets, which read as tersely and roundly as leading articles; and if the minister can say what there is in them, after he has read them, he can do more than I can."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 634.

1599. DIPLOMACY, Revengeful. French. The French king [Louis XV.] would never have agreed to the treaty of 1763, by which Canada was ceded to Great Britain, had it not been with the hope of securing American independence. It was the theory of France that by giving up Canada on the north the English colonies would become so strong as to renounce their allegiance to the Crown. England feared such a result. More than once it was proposed in Parliament to re-cede Canada to France in order to check the growth of the American States. "There now," said a French statesman, when the treaty of 1763 was signed, "we have arranged matters for an American rebellion, in which England will lose her empire in the West."—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 37, p. 286.

1600. DIPLOMACY, Trained to. John Quincy Adams. The new President was inaugurated on the 4th of March, 1825. He was a man of the highest attainments in literature and statesmanship. At the age of eleven years he accompanied his father, John Adams, to Europe. At Paris, at Amsterdam, and St. Petersburg the son continued his studies, and at the same time became acquainted with the manners and politics of the old world. The vast opportunities of his youth were improved to the fullest extent. In his riper years he served his country as ambassador to the Netherlands, Portugal, Prussia, Russia, and England. Such were his abilities in the field of diplomacy as to elicit from Washington the extraordinary praise of being the ablest minister of which America could boast. His life from 1794 till 1817 was devoted almost wholly to diplomatic services at various European capitals. At that critical period, when the relations of the United States with foreign nations were as yet not well established, his genius secured the adoption of treaty after treaty, in which the interests of his country were guarded with patriotic vigilance. . . . To the Presidential chair he brought the wisdom of mature years, great experience, and unusual ability.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 53, p. 423.

1601. DIRECTNESS commanded. Emperor of Russia. The railroad between St. Petersburg and Moscow was built by two American engineers named Winans and Wilson. They laid it out first as they would one in this country, so as to take in the principal places on the way, for the purpose of benefiting the people and increasing the traffic. But when the plan was shown the emperor he drew a straight line between the two cities, and said: "Lay out the road on that line," and they did so. Cuts and chasms and hills were of no account to the imperial will. This single anecdote illustrates the difference between a republic and a despotism. In the former a road is built to accommodate the people; in the latter to please the monarch.—GENERAL GRANT'S TRAVELS, p. 248.

1602. DISAPPOINTMENT, Bitter. Inventor's. In 1803 the first steamboat of Livingston and Fulton was built in France upon the Seine. When she was almost ready for the experimental trip a misfortune befell her which would have dampened the ardor of a man less determined than Fulton. Rising one morning after a sleepless night, a messenger from the boat, with horror and despair written upon his countenance, burst into his presence, exclaiming: "O sir! the boat has broken in pieces and gone to the bottom!" For a moment Fulton was utterly overwhelmed. Never in his whole life, he used to say, was he so near despairing as then. Hastening to the river, he found, indeed, that the weight of the machinery had broken the framework of the vessel, and she lay on the bottom of the river, in plain sight, a mass of timber and iron. Instantly, with his own hands, he began the work of raising her, and kept at it, without food or rest, for twenty-four hours—an exertion which permanently injured his health. His death in the prime of life was, in all probability, remotely caused by the excitement, exposure, and toil of that terrible day and night.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 156.

1603. DISAPPOINTMENT, Fatal. Cicero.

When Cicero stood for the prætorship he had many competitors who were persons of distinction, and yet he was returned first. As a president in the courts of justice he acted with great integrity and honor. Licinius Macer, who had great interest of his own, and was supported, beside, with that of Crassus, was accused before him of some default with respect to money. He had so much confidence in his own influence and the activity of his friends, that when the judges were going to decide the cause, it is said he went home, cut his hair, and put on a white habit, as if he had gained the victory, and was about to return so equipped to the forum. But Crassus met him in his court-yard, and told him that all the judges had given a verdict against him; which affected him in such a manner that he turned in again, took to his bed, and died.—PLUTARCH'S CICERO.

1604. DISAPPOINTMENT overruled. George Müller.

[He had collected funds for building his large Orphan House, and, as usual, he begun to pray for Providence to open the way for the purchase of a plot of ground.] After waiting upon him for thirteen weeks, he heard one morning that a suitable piece of ground might be purchased on Ashley Down. At seven o'clock in the evening, therefore, of the same day he called upon the owner of the property, a merchant, who—he was told—would at that hour be at home; but not finding him at his own house, as was expected, he proceeded—directed by the servants—to his counting-house, where, they said, he would be sure to meet with him. Upon arriving there, however, he was informed that the gentleman had just left his counting-house and had returned to his own residence. “Now,” thought Mr. Müller, “shall I go again to him, or—as the hand of God surely is in this—shall I wait until to-morrow? but as I was told that he would certainly be found either at home or at his counting-house, and at both places I have failed to meet him, it may be better to wait until to-morrow.” Accordingly, the next morning, at nine o'clock, he called upon the merchant, who said to him at once: “I have heard about your visit, and of your desire to purchase land in order to build an Orphan House upon it. For three hours last night I lay awake, and during that time kept on thinking: If this gentleman comes again, I must sell the ground to him for £120 instead of £200 an acre; and now I am willing to let you have it at that price.” This kind proposal was immediately accepted, and in less than ten minutes a contract was signed for the purchase of seven acres.—LIFE OF GEORGE MÜLLER, p. 35.

1605. DISAPPOINTMENT, Trial by. Columbus.

While Columbus, his pilot, and several of his experienced mariners were studying the map, and endeavoring to make out from it their actual position, they heard a shout from the Pinta, and looking up, beheld Martin Alonso Pinzon mounted on the stern of his vessel crying, “Land! land! Señor, I claim my reward!” He pointed at the same time to the south-west, where there was indeed an appearance of land at about twenty-five leagues' distance. Upon this Columbus threw himself on his knees and returned thanks to God; and Martin Alonso repeated the Gloria in excel- sis, in which he was joined by his own crew and that of the admiral. The seamen now mounted to the masthead or climbed about the rigging, straining their eyes in the direction pointed . . . out. The morning light, however, put an end to all their hopes, as to a dream. The fancied land proved to be nothing but an evening cloud, and had vanished in the night.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 3, ch. 4.

1606. DISAPPOINTMENT with Victory. Richard I. [Richard the Lion-hearted. Third Crusade.]

The English monarch went on from victory to victory. The most remarkable of his battles was that near to Ascalon, where he engaged and defeated Saladin [King of Jerusalem], the most renowned of the Saracen monarchs, and left 40,000 of the enemy dead on the field. Ascalon surrendered, as did several other cities, to the victorious Richard, who now prepared for the siege of Jerusalem [the capture of which was the object of this great enterprise]; but at the most important crisis, which if fortunate—as everything seemed to promise—would have terminated the expedition in the most glorious manner, the King of England, on a review of his army, found them so wasted with famine, with fatigue, and even with victory, that with the utmost mortification of heart he was obliged to entirely abandon the enterprise. The war was finished by a truce with Saladin.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 8.

1607. DISAPPOINTMENTS in Life. Fountain of Youth.

Many Spaniards were killed; the survivors were forced to hurry to their ships; Ponce de Leon himself, mortally wounded by an arrow, returned to Cuba to die. So ended the adventurer who had coveted immense wealth, and had hoped for perpetual youth.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., ch. 2.

1608. DISASTER concealed. General Nash of North Carolina.

[At the battle of Germantown] a round shot from the British artillery . . . passing through his horse shattered the general's thigh on the opposite side. The fall of the animal hurled its unfortunate rider with considerable force to the ground. With surpassing courage and presence of mind General Nash, covering his wound with both hands, gayly called to his men, “Never mind me; I've had a devil of a tumble; rush on, my boys—rush on the enemy; I'll be after you presently.” [In a few days he died.]—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 4.

1609. DISASTER, Energy by. Romans.

[At the battle of Cannæ, with Hannibal and his Carthaginians,] the Roman army was entirely cut to pieces. Forty thousand were left dead on the field . . . almost the whole body of the Roman knights. . . . The Romans, amid the consternation of so great disaster, displayed a magnanimity truly heroic. The Senate, on the first report of the fate of their army, ordered the gates of the city to be shut, lest the exaggerated intelligence of those who fled from the fight should add to the general alarm. The women were forbidden to stir out of their houses, lest their cries and lamentations should dispirit those who had their country to defend; and the senators exerted themselves in every quarter to dispel the fears of the people. Varro, from the wreck of the army, was able to collect 10,000 men; with these he repaired to Rome to defend the city, in case Hannibal, as was expected, should immediately attack it. This measure was undoubtedly his wisest policy, and he was strongly urged to it by Maherbal, one of his ablest officers. It appeared, however, to Hannibal a doubtful enterprise; and while he deliberated the opportunity was lost. Varro, whose temerity was the cause of this great disaster, on approaching Rome with the shattered remains of the army, whom he had with much pains collected, was met by the Senate, and received their solemn thanks, because he had not despaired of the republic. The effect of this spirited conduct was wonderful. The citizens thronged to carry their money to the public treasury. All above the age of seventeen, of whatever rank, enrolled themselves, and formed an army of four legions and 10,000 horse. Eight thousand of the slaves voluntarily offered their services, and with the consent of their masters were embodied and armed. [A.D. 214. Hannibal failed in his enterprise.]—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 9.

1610. DISCHARGE, An honored. Reign of Charles II. Halifax . . . openly accused Rochester of malversation. An inquiry took place. It appeared that £40,000 had been lost to the public by the mismanagement of the first lord of the treasury. In consequence of this discovery, he was not only forced to relinquish his hopes of the white staff, but was removed from the direction of the finances to the more dignified but less lucrative and important post of Lord-President. "I have seen people kicked down-stairs before," said Halifax, "but my Lord Rochester is the first person that I ever saw kicked up-stairs."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 259.

1611. DISCIPLESHIP, Honor of. Constantine. The bishops whom he summoned, in his last illness, to the palace of Nicomedia, were edified by the fervor with which he requested and received the sacrament of baptism, by the solemn protestation that the remainder of his life should be worthy of a disciple of Christ, and by his humble refusal to wear the imperial purple after he had been clothed in the white garment of a neophyte.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 20, p. 273.

1612. DISCIPLINARIAN, Valued. Baron Steuben. Baron Steuben, a veteran soldier and disciplinarian from the army of Frederick the Great . . . repaired to York, where Congress was in session. From that body he received a commission, and at once joined Washington at Valley Forge. His accession to the American army was an event of great importance. He received the appointment of Inspector-General, and from the day in which he entered upon the discharge of his duties there was a marked improvement in the condition and discipline of the soldiers. The American regulars were never again beaten when confronted by the British in equal numbers.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 41, p. 328.

Commodus, exacted and obtained the minister's death, as the only redress of their grievances. This presumption of a distant army, and their discovery of the weakness of government, was a sure presage of the most dreadful convulsions.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4, p. 107.

1614. ———. Constantine's Army. The most flourishing cities were oppressed by the intolerable weight of quarters. The soldiers insensibly forgot the virtues of their profession, and contracted only the vices of civil life. They were either degraded by the industry of mechanic trades or enervated by the luxury of baths and theatres. They soon became careless of their martial exercises, curious in their diet and apparel; and while they inspired terror to the subjects of the empire, they trembled at the hostile approach of the barbarians.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 17, p. 127.

1615. DISCIPLINE, Impossible. Reign of Charles II. [The Earl of Mulgrave, not three months afloat,] was appointed captain of a ship of eighty-four guns, reputed the finest in the navy. . . . The same interest [avarice] which had placed him in a post for which he was unfit maintained him there. No admiral, bearded by these corrupt and dissolute minions of the palace, dared to do more than mutter something about a court-martial. If any officer showed a higher sense of duty than his fellows, he soon found that he lost money without acquiring honor. One captain, who, by strictly obeying the orders of the Admiralty, missed a cargo [offered for safe conveyance on board a man-of-war] which would have been worth £4000 to him, was told by Charles [II.], with ignoble levity, that he was a great fool for his pains.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 282.

1616. DISCIPLINE, Military. Belisarius. [The Roman general] was endeared to the husbandmen by the peace and plenty which they enjoyed under the shadow of his standard. Instead of being injured, the country was enriched by the march of the Roman armies; and such was the rigid discipline of their camp, that not [a complaint was made against the presence of his army].—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41, p. 183.

1617. ———. Roman. [Roman Emperor Aurelian.] His military regulations are contained in a very concise epistle to one of his inferior officers, who is commanded to enforce them, as he wishes to become a tribune or as he is desirous to live. Gaming, drinking, and the arts of divination were severely prohibited. Aurelian expected that his soldiers should be modest, frugal, and laborious; that their armor should be constantly kept bright, their weapons sharp, their clothing and horses ready for immediate service; that they should live in their quarters with chastity and sobriety, without damaging the cornfields, without stealing even a sheep, a fowl, or a bunch of grapes, without exacting from their landlords either salt, or oil, or wood. "The public allowance," continues the emperor, "is sufficient for their support; their wealth should be collected from the spoils of the enemy, not from the tears of the provincials."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 11, p. 340.

1618. DISCIPLINE resented. Athalaric. [The young Emperor of Rome.] On a solemn festival, when the Goths were assembled in the palace of Ravenna, the royal youth escaped from his mother's apartment, and, with tears of pride and anger, complained of a blow which his stubborn disobedience had provoked her to inflict. The barbarians resented the indignity which had been offered to their king; accused the regent of conspiring against his life and crown; and imperiously demanded that the grandson of Theodoric should be rescued from the dastardly discipline of women and pedants, and educated, like a valiant Goth, in the society of his equals and the glorious ignorance of his ancestors. . . . The King of Italy was abandoned to wine, to women, and to rustic sports. . . . At the age of sixteen was consumed by premature intemperance.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41, p. 148.

1620. ——. Henry VI. [The boy Henry (Henry VI.), in accordance with the will of his dying father, was placed under the tutelage of the Earl of Warwick.] The system of education . . . pursued might not have been the best fitted for a sensitive boy. The tutor applied to the council for powers, which were granted, to hold the pupil under the strictest discipline, even after he had been crowned king in 1429 [Henry being nine years old]. He was not to be spoken to unless in the presence of Warwick and of the four knights appointed to be about his person, "as the king, by the speech of others private, has been stirred from his learning, and spoken to of divers matters not behooveful." The council promised that they would firmly assist the earl in chastising the king for his defaults.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 5, p. 79.

1621. ——. Cromwell. An interesting incident illustrates Cromwell's strict severity in exacting compliance from his own army, with its articles. When information was laid before him by the vanquished that they had been plundered by some of his soldiers on leaving the city, contrary to the terms granted to them, he ordered the offenders to be tried by a court-martial, at which they were sentenced to death. Whereupon he ordered the unfortunate men, who were six in number, to cast lots for the first sufferer; and after his execution sent the remaining five, with a suitable explanation, to Sir Thomas Glenham, Governor of Oxford, requesting him to deal with them as he thought fit; a piece of conduct which so charmed the Royalist officer, that he immediately returned the men to Cromwell, with a grateful compliment, and expression of much respect.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 10, p. 139.

1622. DISCIPLINE, Value of. The Aarii. In the Lygian nation the Aarii held the first rank by their numbers and fierceness. "The Aarii"

(it is thus that they are described by the energy of Tacitus) "study to improve by art and circumstances the innate terrors of their barbarism. Their shields are black, their bodies are painted black. They choose for the combat the darkest hour of the night. Their host advances, covered as it were with a funeral shade; nor do they often find an enemy capable of sustaining so strange and infernal an aspect. Of all our senses, the eyes are the first vanquished in battle." Yet the arms and discipline of the Romans easily discomfited these horrid phantoms.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12, p. 380.

1623. DISCIPLINE, Want of. Military. [Julian, who bought the office of Emperor of Rome at auction, was endangered by the approach of Severus with his legions.] Fear and shame prevented the guards from deserting his standard; but they trembled at the name of the Pannonian legions, commanded by an experienced general, and accustomed to vanquish the barbarians on the frozen Danube. They quitted with a sigh the pleasures of the baths and theatres, to put on arms, whose use they had almost forgotten, and beneath the weight of which they were oppressed. The unpractised elephants, whose uncouth appearance, it was hoped, would strike terror into the army of the north, threw their unskilful riders; and the awkward evolutions of the marines, drawn from the fleet of Misenum, were an object of ridicule to the populace; while the Senate enjoyed, with secret pleasure, the distress and weakness of the usurper.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 5, p. 136.

1625. DISCORD, Perverted by. Crusaders. [About 200,000 crusaders joined the second attempt to rescue the Holy Sepulchre in A.D. 1146.] The Turks cut them entirely to pieces, and Hugh, their leader, died helpless and abandoned in Asia. The situation of Jerusalem at this time was extremely weak; the numbers of the garrison were greatly reduced. Even the monks, who were at first instituted to serve the sick and wounded, were obliged to arm in the common defence, and they associated themselves into a military society called Templars and Hospitalers. This was the origin of these two orders of knights, who afterward signalized themselves by their exploits, and becoming rivals, fought against each other with as much keenness as ever they had done against the infidels.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 9, p. 158.

1626. DISCORD, Shameful. Emperors. [Caracalla and Geta, the sons of Servius, were both chosen by the army to succeed their deceased father.] Such a divided form of government would have proved a source of discord between the most affectionate brothers. It was impossible that it could long subsist between two implacable enemies, who neither desired nor could trust a reconciliation. It was visible that one only could reign, and that the other must fall; and each of them, judging of his rival's designs by his own, guarded his life with the most jealous vigilance from the repeated attacks of poison or the sword. Their rapid journey through Gaul and Italy, during which they never ate at the same table or slept in the same house, displayed to the provinces the odious spectacle of fraternal discord. On their arrival at Rome they immediately divided the vast extent of the imperial palace. No communication was allowed between their apartments; the doors and passages were diligently fortified, and guards posted and relieved with the same strictness as in a besieged place. The emperors met only in public, in the presence of their afflicted mother, and each surrounded by a numerous train of armed followers. Even on these occasions of ceremony the dissimulation of courts could ill disguise the rancor of their hearts.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6, p. 155.

1627. DISCOURAGEMENT difficult. Pilgrims' Petition to the London Company. "We are well weaned," added Robinson and Brewster, "from the delicate milk of our mother country, and inured to the difficulties of a strange land; the people are industrious and frugal. We are knit together as a body in a most sacred covenant of the Lord, of the violation whereof we make great conscience, and by virtue whereof we hold ourselves straitly tied to all care of each other's good, and of the whole. It is not with us as with men whom small things can discourage."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 8.

1628. DISCOURAGEMENT, Discontent of. Besiegement of New York. A.D. 1776. Howe and forty-five ships, or more, laden with troops, had arrived off Sandy Hook, and the whole fleet [was] expected in a day or two. . . . [Washington wrote to Congress:] I am hopeful. . . . Reed, the new adjutant-general, quailed before the inequality of the British and American force, and thus in private described the state of the American camp: "With an army of force before and a secret one behind, we stand on a point of land with 6000 old troops—if a year's service of about half can entitle them to the name—and about 1500 new levies of this [New York] province, many disaffected and more doubtful; every man, from the general to the private, acquainted with our true situation is exceedingly discouraged; had I known the true posture of affairs, no consideration would have tempted me to have taken an active part in this scene; and this sentiment is universal."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 69.

1629. DISCOURAGEMENT, Superior to. Samuel Adams. Difficulties could not discourage his decision, nor danger appall his fortitude. . . . Of despondency he knew nothing; trials only nerved him for superior struggles; his sublime and unflinching hope had a cast of solemnity, and was as much a part of his nature as if his confidence sprung from insight into the divine decrees, and was as firm as a sincere Calvinist's assurance of his election.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 10.

1630. DISCOURAGEMENTS, Ministerial. Ma-homet. One evening, after passing all the day in the city engaged in preaching to deaf ears the convictions which he was so full of, and which he deemed it duty to cast abroad at any hazard, even on the rock, he returned home without having met, said he, a single being, man or woman, free or slave, who had not flouted him as an impostor, or who had been willing to pay a moment's attention to his preaching.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 79.

1631. DISCOVERIES, Accumulative. Isaac Newton. With his noble modesty, he said: "If I have seen farther than Descartes it is by standing on the shoulders of giants." In a corporeal sense he was seated in his mother's orchard, but it was from the height which Copernicus and Galileo had brought the science of astronomy that he contemplated the fall of the apples. The grand mystery that remained to be elucidated was, What is the force that retains the planets and moons in their spheres? Why does not the moon fly off into space?—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 251.

1632. DISCOVERY, Age of. Age of Galileo. The age of Kepler and Galileo was the era of great discoveries in the arts and sciences. The invention of the telescope gave rise to a thousand experiments by means of glasses; and the science of optics received great improvements. The new discoveries in astronomy led to improvements in navigation; and geometry, of course, made rapid advances toward perfection. The science of algebra, which Europe is said to have owed to the Arabians, as well as the numeral ciphers, contributed greatly to abridge the labor of calculation, as did still more the invention of logarithms, discovered in the year 1614, by Napier of Merchiston. The improvement of mechanics kept pace with the advancement of geometry; and the science of natural philosophy was successfully cultivated in all its branches. The Torricellian experiment, made about the year 1640, determined the height of the atmosphere. Experiments upon the oscillations of pendulums, which were found always to preserve an equal time, though the spaces described were unequal, suggested the idea of applying the pendulum to regulate the motions of a clock; and the observation that adding to its weight adds nothing to the celerity of its motion led to the conclusion that the velocity with which a body gravitates to the centre is not in proportion to its weight. Galileo had discovered the laws which determine this velocity. The ardor of prosecuting discoveries extended itself through the whole of the sciences. In the year 1616 Dr. Harvey made the great discovery of the circulation of the blood.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 36.

1633. DISCOVERY, Ambition for. Prince Henry. Prince Henry, the son of John, King of Portugal, was a young man of great talents, possessed of that ardor which is fitted to patronize and promote every beneficial design, and that enthusiasm which the dangers and difficulties of an enterprise rather inflame than relax. Struck with the success of this first attempt of his countrymen, he endeavored to engage in his service all who were eminent for their skill in navigation, both Portuguese and foreigners. His first effort, however, was with a single ship, which was despatched with instructions to attempt, if possible, the doubling of Cape Boyador. The mariners, as usual, were afraid to quit the coasts, and consequently encountered numberless difficulties. A squall of wind, however, driving them out to sea, landed them on a small island to the north of Madeira, which they named Porto Santo; thence they returned to Portugal to give an account of their discovery. Three ships were fitted out by Prince Henry the subsequent year, which, passing Porto Santo, discovered the island which they denominated Madeira, from its being covered with wood. Here they fixed a small colony, and planted slips of the Cyprus vine, and of the sugar-cane from Sicily, for both which productions the island was remarkably favorable. I have formerly observed that it was from this island that the sugar-cane was transplanted to the West Indies, of which it is not a native.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 18.

1634. DISCOVERY, Heart-breaking. Henry II. [His two sons, Geoffrey and Richard, joined Philip, King of France, in the invasion and plundering of their father's continental dominions. He agreed to a treaty with mortifying concessions. He agreed] . . . to give a free pardon to all his rebellious lords and vassals. A list was presented to him of their names, among whom he saw that of his son John, his favorite child, whom he had till that moment believed faithful to his duty. The unhappy father broke out in expressions of the utmost despair; cursed the day on which he had received his miserable being, and bestowed on his ungrateful children a malediction, which he could never be prevailed on to retract; a lingering fever, caused by a broken heart, soon after terminated his life. Richard, it is said, came to view the body of his father, and, struck with remorse, accused himself in the deepest terms with having contributed by his unnatural conduct to bring his parent to the grave. Thus died Henry, in the fifty-eighth year of his age, an ornament to the English throne and a monarch surpassing all his contemporaries in the valuable qualities of a sovereign.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 8.

1635. DISCOVERY, A simple. Charles Good-year. In the fifth year of his investigations a glorious success rewarded him. He made one of the simplest and yet one of the most useful discoveries which has ever been made in the United States. It was this: take a piece of common, sticky india rubber, sprinkle upon it powdered sulphur, put it into an oven heated to two hundred and seventy-five degrees, bake it a short time, and it comes out a new material, which has all the good properties of india rubber, without that liability to harden in cold weather and dissolve in warm, which had hitherto baffled all his endeavors to turn it to useful account. . . . By varying the proportions of heat he could make it as soft or as hard as he pleased.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 218.

1636. DISCOVERY unappreciated. Potato. [Columbus and his men were searching for gold and spices in the West Indies.] In the course of their researches in the vegetable kingdom, in quest of the luxuries of commerce, they met with the potato, a humble root, little valued at the time, but a more precious acquisition to man than all the spices of the East.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 4, ch. 4.

1637. DISCRETION better than Valor. Charles V. [When the English invaded France in 1378] Charles strictly charged his generals to adhere to the plan of cautious defensive warfare, and never to accept a great battle. "Let the storm rage," said he; "retire before it; it will soon exhaust itself." [Such was the result.]—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 10, § 17.

1638. DISEASE, Destructive. Army. Among the cities which the barbarians ruined, Genoa, not yet constructed of marble, is particularly enumerated; and the deaths of thousands, according to the regular practice of war, appear to have excited less horror than some idolatrous sacrifices of women and children, which were performed with impunity in the camp of the most Christian king. If it were not a melancholy truth, that the first and most cruel sufferings must be the lot of the innocent and helpless, history might exult in the misery of the conquerors, who, in the midst of riches, were left destitute of bread or wine, reduced to drink the waters of the Po, and to feed on the flesh of distempered cattle. The dysentery swept away one third of their army.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41, p. 177.

1639. DISEASE, "Literary." Leigh Hunt. [He aided his brother in conducting a London paper.] In the midst of his labors he fell into ill-health and melancholy; palpitations, hypochondria, dyspepsia—in other words, the "literary disease" had attacked him. He recovered by ceasing his occupation for a time and taking exercise.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 305.

1640. DISEASE, Peculiarities of. Sir Walter Scott. Twelve days before the final failure—which was announced to him on the 17th of January, 1826—he enters in his diary: "Much alarmed. I had walked till twelve with Skene and Russell, and then sat down to my work. To my horror and surprise I could neither write nor spell, but put down one word for another, and wrote nonsense. I was much overpowered at the same time, and could not conceive the reason. I fell asleep, however, in my chair, and slept for two hours. On my waking my head was clearer, and I began to recollect that last night I had taken the anodyne left for the purpose by Clarkson, and being disturbed in the course of the night, I had not slept it off." In fact, the hyoscyamus had, combined with his anxieties, given him a slight attack of what is now called aphasia, that brain disease the most striking symptom of which is that one word is mistaken for another.—HUTTON'S SCOTT, ch. 15.

1641. DISEASE, Preventable. Cromwell. A slow intermittent fever seized him. He struggled with the first attack so successfully, that no one about him suspected he was seriously ill. The fever became tertian and more acute; his strength was rapidly giving way. The physicians summoned from London attributed the disease to the bad air engendered by the marshy and ill-drained banks of the Thames, which joined the gardens of Hampton Court. He was brought back to Whitehall, as if Providence had decreed that he should die before the same window of the same palace, in front of which he had ordered to be constructed, ten years before, the scaffold of his royal victim [Charles I.].—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 77.

1642. DISEASE, Protection from. Ohio Settlement. A contagious disease invaded the mixed population [of Canadians and Indians]; the Indians, with extravagant ceremonies, sacrificed forty dogs to appease their manitou; and when they began to apprehend that the manitou of the French was more powerful than their own, the medicine men would walk round the fort in circles, crying out, "We are dead; gently, manitou of the French, strike gently, do not kill us all. Good manitou, master of life and death, leave death within thy coffer; give life." . . . The dreadful mortality broke up the settlement.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 21.

1643. DISEASE in Religion. Mahomet. He affected a solitary life; bestowed a great deal in charity; retired at times to the desert, and pretended that he held conferences with the angel Gabriel. The epilepsy, a disease to which he was subject, was, he pretended, a divine ecstasy, or rapture, in which he was admitted to the contemplation of Paradise. He made his wife an accomplice in the cheat, and she published his visions and revelries to all the neighborhood. In a short time the whole city of Mecca talked of nothing but Mahomet.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 1.

1644. DISEASE, Survival of. Sir Walter Scott. In the second year of Scott's apprenticeship, at about the age of sixteen, he had an attack of hemorrhage, no recurrence of which took place for some forty years, but which was then the beginning of the end. During this illness silence was absolutely imposed upon him—two old ladies putting their fingers on their lips whenever he offered to speak.—HUTTON'S LIFE OF SIR WALTER SCOTT, ch. 2.

1645. DISGRACE, Humiliating. General Lee. At Monmouth [N. J.] . . . the British were over-taken. . . . General Lee was ordered to attack the enemy. The first onset was made by the American cavalry, under Lafayette, but they were driven back by Cornwallis and Clinton. Lee, who had opposed the battle, and was not anxious for victory, ordered his line to fall back to a stronger position; but the troops mistook the order, and began a retreat, the British charging after them. Washington met the fugitives, rallied them, administered a severe rebuke to Lee, and ordered him to the rear. [The Americans succeeded, and the British withdrew in the night.]—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 41, p. 331.

1646. DISGRACE, Unsupportable. Clotilda. [Clotilda was one of the early queens of France.]

By a base artifice Childebert and Clotaire decoyed their nephews into their power, and then sent a messenger to Clotilda with a pair of scissors and a naked sword, bidding her decide whether the royal youths should be shaven, and thus made incapable of reigning, or be put to death outright. The queen, almost beside herself with horror, exclaimed that she would rather see them dead than degraded. Clotaire, on receiving this reply, murdered the two elder princes with his own hand.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 4, § 10, p. 41.

1647. DISGRACE, Punishment by. In Denmark. Criminals were still executed by beheading, and, not unfrequently, by breaking on the wheel. Petty thefts were punished by inserting the head of the thief in the head of a barrel, so that the barrel covered him like a cloak, and in this costume he was marched about the streets, attended by a guard. No penalty, he says, was so much dreaded by petty criminals as this. [Time of John Howard.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 65.

1648. DISGRACE, Unmerited. Columbus. No sooner did Bobadilla hear of his arrival than he gave orders to put him in irons and confine him in the fortress. This outrage to a person of such dignified and venerable appearance and such eminent merit seemed for the time to shock even his enemies. When the irons were brought, every one present shrank from the task of putting them on him, either from a sentiment of compassion at so great a reverse of fortune, or out of habitual reverence for his person. To fill the measure of ingratitude meted out to him, it was one of his own domestics, "a graceless and shameless cook." . . . He, with his brothers, was put in irons and confined on board of a caravel. They were kept separate from each other, and no communication permitted between them. Bobadilla did not see them himself, nor did he allow others to visit them, but kept them in ignorance of the cause of their imprisonment, the crimes with which they were charged, and the process that was going on against them. [Bobadilla exceeded his authority. Columbus was for a time a victim to false representations.]—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 13, ch. 4.

1649. DISGUISE betrayed. Ex-Queen Mary. [In 1568 Mary, ex-queen of Scots, made her escape from captivity at Lochleven, in the disguise of a laundress.] Mary had put on the hood of her laundress, and had covered her face with a muffler or veil; and so, with a bundle of clothes, she entered a boat that was about to cross the Loch. After some space one of them that rowed said merrily, "Let us see what manner of dame this is," and therewith offered to pull down her muffler, which to defend she put up her hands, which they espied to be very fair and white. [The boatmen carried her back to the castle.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 10, p. 154.

1650. DISGUISE, Clerical. Bunyan. It may be doubted whether any English Dissenter had suffered more severely under the penal laws than John Bunyan. Of the twenty-seven years which had elapsed since the Restoration, he had passed twelve in confinement. He still persisted in preaching; but, that he might preach, he was under the necessity of disguising himself like a carter. He was often introduced into meetings through back doors, with a smock frock on his back and a whip in his hand.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 210.

1651. DISGUISE, Dangerous. Longchamp. [William de Longchamp, the extortionate chancellor of Richard I., attempted to escape the popular fury at Dover.] He was lame, and walked down from the heights of the castle to the beach, disguised in a woman's green gown of inconvenient length, having some brown cloth in his hand, as if for sale, and carrying a measuring rod. He sits upon a rock on the shore, and a fisherman is rude to the supposed lady. A woman comes up and asks the price of an ell of cloth, to which the unhappy chancellor can give no answer, for he understands not a word of English. Other women gather about him, and having pulled off his hood, beheld a swarthy man recently shaved. He is then rabbled and dragged through the town, the men and women crying, "Come, let us stone this monster; he is a disgrace to either sex."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 22, p. 316.

1652. DISGUISE detected. Clodius Pulcher. He was bold, clever, unprincipled, and unscrupulous, with a slender, diminutive figure, and a delicate woman's face. His name was Clodius Pulcher. Cicero played upon it, and called him Pulchellus Puer, "the pretty boy." Between this promising young man and Cæsar's wife Pompeia there had sprung up an acquaintance, which Clodius was anxious to press to further extremes. Pompeia was difficult of access, her mother-in-law Aurelia keeping a strict watch over her; and Clodius, who was afraid of nothing, took advantage of the Bona Dea festival to make his way into Cæsar's house dressed as a woman. Unfortunately for him, his disguise was detected. The insulted Vestals and the other ladies who were present flew upon him like the dogs of Actæon, tore his borrowed garments from him, and drove him into the street naked and wounded. [See result at No. 1942.]—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 12, p. 24.

1653. DISGUISE, Difficult. Charles I. Sometimes the [fugitive] king was "Will Jones," a woodman; then he was changed into "Will Jackson," a groom, clad in gray cloth. Once he had to take Jane Lane's horse to a smithy; it had cast a shoe, and the smith begun wailing the non-capture of [King] Charles Stuart [now before him in disguise]; and the king chimed in that if that rogue could only be taken, he deserved hanging more than all the rest, for bringing in the Scots. Once, close to Stratford, "Will Jackson," in pursuance of his disguise, was sent into the kitchen, where the cook-maid, who was providing supper, desired him to wind up the jack; he was obedient, but he did not do it in the right way, which led the maid with some passion to ask, "What countryman are you, that you know not how to wind up a jack?" "Will Jackson" appears to have answered very satisfactorily: "I am a poor tenant's son of Colonel Lane, in Staffordshire; we seldom have roast meat, and when we have, we don't make use of a jack," and so the maid's anger was appeased.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 13, p. 172.

1654. DISGUISE, Successful. Majorian. [The Emperor Majorian possessed a courage which exceeded his prudence.] Anxious to explore, with his own eyes, the state of the Vandals, he ventured, after disguising the color of his hair, to visit Carthage, in the character of his own ambassador; and Genseric was afterward mortified by the discovery that he had entertained and dismissed the emperor of the Romans. Such an anecdote may be rejected as an improbable fiction; but it is a fiction which would not have been imagined unless in the life of a hero.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 36, p. 481.

1655. DISHONESTY, General. Reign of James II. [He was his own minister of marine.] It would have been easy to find an abler minister of marine than James, but it would not have been easy to find, among the public men of that age, any minister of marine, except James, who would not have embezzled stores, taken bribes from contractors, and charged the Crown with the cost of repairs which had never been made. The king was, in truth, almost the only person who could be trusted not to rob the king. There had, therefore, been during the last three years much less waste and pilfering in the dockyards than formerly. Ships had been built which were fit to go to sea.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 426.

1656. DISHONOR, Insensible to. Exiled Princes of Spain. Without firing a gun, he [Napoleon] overturned the monarchy of Spain. A proud and powerful dynasty he removed from the throne of their ancestors. He sent them into exile. He placed his own brother upon their throne. And yet these exiled princes thanked him for the deed, and were never weary of proclaiming his praises.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 1.

1657. DISHONOR, Posthumous. Admiral Blake. When Charles II. returned to his country, the purely national glory which surrounded the memory of this great English hero did not exempt his body from the indecent and inhuman indignities which were heaped upon the remains of the great Republicans. By the king's command the remains of this, perhaps the greatest English admiral that ever walked a deck, were torn from the tomb and cast into a pit in St. Margaret's churchyard.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 16, p. 209.

1658. DISHONOR recompensed. Cicero. His great acquisition of fame had now sensibly obscured the glory of Pompey, whose influence was visibly on the decline. To strengthen himself by the interest and by the talents of Cicero, whom he had before so meanly abandoned, he now procured the recall of that illustrious exile, and the repeal of the sentence of confiscation which had deprived him of his whole property. Cicero returned to his country after an absence of sixteen months. His journey from Brundisium to Rome was a triumphal procession. All Italy, as he said himself, seemed to flock together to hail his auspicious return; that single day made his glory immortal. He was loaded with honors; and his houses and villas, which had been razed to the ground, were rebuilt with increased magnificence at the expense of the public.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 1.

1659. DISLIKE, Natural. Wife of James II. Arabella Churchill had, more than twenty years before, borne him a son, afterward widely renowned as one of the most skilful captains of Europe. The youth, named James Fitzjames, had as yet given no promise of the eminence which he afterward attained; but his manners were so gentle and inoffensive that he had no enemy except Mary of Modena, who had long hated the child of the concubine with the bitter hatred of a childless wife. [Queen Mary.] A small part of the Jesuitical faction had, before the pregnancy of the queen was announced, seriously thought of setting him up as a competitor of the Princess of Orange.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 305.

1660. DISLOYALTY detested. Revolutionary War. Threats and promises were used to induce captive American sailors to enlist in the British service. "Hang me if you will to the yard-arm of your ship, but do not ask me to become a traitor to my country," was the answer of Nathan Coffin.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 18.

1661. DISMISSAL, Humiliating. Reign of James II. [Lord Castlemaine was English minister to Rome.] He positively declared that the rule which excluded Jesuits from ecclesiastical preferment should not be relaxed in favor of Father Petre. Castlemaine, much provoked, threatened to leave Rome. Innocent [XIII.] replied, with a meek impertinence, which was the more provoking because it could scarcely be distinguished from simplicity, that his excellency might go if he liked. "But if we must lose him," added the venerable pontiff, "I hope that he will take care of his health on the road. English people do not know how dangerous it is in this country to travel in the heat of the day. The best way is to start before dawn, and to take some rest at noon." With this salutary advice, and with a string of beads, the unfortunate ambassador was dismissed: In a few months appeared, both in the Italian and in the English tongue, a pompous history of the mission, magnificently printed in folio, and illustrated with plates. The frontispiece, to the great scandal of all Protestants, represented Castlemaine in the robes of a peer, with his coronet in his hand, kissing the toe of Innocent.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 248.

1662. DISOBEDIENCE atoned. Dr. Johnson. [Dr. Samuel Johnson's father had a book-stand at Lichfield and surrounding towns every market day. Being sick, he directed his son to attend in his place, which he refused to do because of his pride. Fifty years later,] on a rainy day, somewhere about 1780, a man of advanced age stood bareheaded in the market of Uttoxeter, making strange contortions of visage, while he remained for an hour in front of a particular stall. It was Dr. Samuel Johnson, who had gone from Lichfield to this small market town, to subject himself to the penance of rough weather and mocking bystanders, for expiation of an act of filial disobedience which he had committed fifty years before.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 5, p. 83.

1663. DISOBEDIENCE necessary. Mary Bosanquet. [She became one of the most useful and devoted of the early Methodists; was the accomplished daughter of wealthy and fashionable parents, who were greatly displeased with her religious zeal.] One day her father said to her: "There is a particular promise which I require of you—that is, that you will never, on any occasion, neither now nor hereafter, attempt to make your brothers what you call a Christian." "I answered," she writes, "looking to the Lord, I think, sir, I dare not consent to that." He replied: "Then you force me to put you out of my house." "Yes, sir," she answered, "according to your views of things, I acknowledge it; and if I may but have your approval, no situation will be disagreeable." [She removed a short distance from her father's house.]—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 2, p. 266.

1664. DISPARAGEMENT, Intellectual. Oliver Goldsmith. On a certain occasion, when he was conversing in company with great vivacity, and apparently to the satisfaction of those around him, an honest Swiss, who sat near, one George Michael Moser, keeper of the Royal Academy, perceiving Dr. Johnson rolling himself as if about to speak, exclaimed, "Stay, stay! Doctor Shonson is going to say something." "And are you sure, sir," replied Goldsmith, sharply, "that you can comprehend what he says?"—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 41, p. 233.

1665. DISPATCH demanded. Napoleon I. [When preparing for his Egyptian expedition, he said to one of his assistants:] Now, sir, use dispatch. Remember that the world was created in six days. Ask me for whatever you please, except time; that is the only thing which is beyond my power.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 10.

1666. DISPLAY, Confusing. Charlemagne. [Seeking a treaty of alliance, the] ambassadors of Nicephorus found Charlemagne in his camp, on the banks of the river Sala; and he affected to confound their vanity by displaying, in a Franconian village, the pomp, or at least the pride, of the Byzantine palace. The Greeks were successively led through four halls of audience; in the first they were ready to fall prostrate before a splendid personage in a chair of state, till he informed them that he was only a servant, the constable, or master of the horse, of the emperor. The same mistake and the same answer were repeated in the apartments of the count palatine, the steward, and the chamberlain; and their impatience was gradually heightened, till the doors of the presence-chamber were thrown open, and they beheld the genuine monarch, on his throne, enriched with the foreign luxury which he despised, and encircled with the love and reverence of his victorious chiefs.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 49, p. 57.

1667. DISPLAY, Distasteful. Julian. [Soon after the Emperor Julian's entrance into the palace of Constantinople, he had occasion for the service of a barber. An officer, magnificently dressed, immediately presented himself. "It is a barber," exclaimed the prince, with affected surprise, "that I want, and not a receiver-general of the finances!"—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 22, p. 396.

1668. DISPOSITION, Alarming. Wordsworth. [The poet's mother died when he was eight years old.] An intimate friend of hers told me that she once said to her that the only one of her five children about whose future life she was anxious was William; and he, she said, would be remarkable, either for good or for evil. The cause of this was that I was of a stiff, and moody, violent temper; so much so that I remember going once into the attics of my grandfather's house at Penrith, upon some indignity having been put upon me, with an intention of destroying myself with one of the foils which I knew was kept there. I took the foil in my hand, but my heart failed. Upon another occasion, while I was at my grandfather's house at Penrith, along with my eldest brother, Richard, we were whipping tops together in the large drawing-room, on which the carpet was only laid down upon particular occasions. The walls were hung round with family pictures, and I said to my brother, "Dare you strike your whip through that old lady's petticoat?" He replied, "No, I won't." "Then," said I, "here goes!" and I struck my lash through her hooped petticoat; for which, no doubt, though I have forgotten it, I was properly punished. But, possibly from some want of judgment in punishments inflicted, I had become perverse and obstinate in defying chastisement, and rather proud of it than otherwise.—MEYER'S WORDSWORTH, ch. 1.

1669. DISPOSITION, An evil. Charles the Bad. Charles the Bad, King of Navarre, was a singular instance of the combination of great mental endowments with the worst dispositions, by which all his gifts were perverted into instruments of evil. He had received from nature talents of a high order; he possessed a remarkable power of eloquence, keen penetration, popular, insinuating manners; but beneath this attractive exterior he concealed a malicious, treacherous, revengeful heart, capable of the most atrocious crimes; nor was he ever known to hesitate at any sacrifice to his ambition, hatred, or other dominant passion.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 10, § 10.

1670. DISPOSITION, Gloomy. Dr. Young. I . . . informed Dr. Johnson that Mr. Young, son of Dr. Young, the author of "Night Thoughts," whom I had just left, desired to have the honor of seeing him at the house where his father lived. I said to Mr. Young that I had been told his father was cheerful. "Sir," said he, "he was too well bred a man not to be cheerful in company; but he was gloomy when alone. He never was cheerful after my mother's death, and he had met with many disappointments." Dr. Johnson observed to me afterward "that this was no favorable account of Dr. Young; for it is not becoming in a man to have so little acquiescence in the ways of Providence."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 467.

1671. DISPOSITION, Quarrelsome. Louis XIV. Louis gave a proof of his haughty and imperious temper on the occasion of a quarrel between his ambassador in England, the Count D'Estrades, and the Spanish envoy at the same court, who had insisted on taking precedence of the representative of France at a diplomatic reception. Louis recalled his ambassador from Madrid, demanded full and immediate reparation, and threatened war in case of refusal. Philip IV. made an unqualified submission, and in the presence of the whole diplomatic body assembled at Fontainebleau, his ambassador declared that the Spanish agents would no longer contest the pretensions of the crown of France.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 21, § 3.

1672. DISPOSITION, Savage. Frederick William. The nature of Frederick William was hard and bad, and the habit of exercising arbitrary power had made him frightfully savage. His rage constantly vented itself to right and left in curses and blows. When his Majesty took a walk, every human being fled before him, as if a tiger had broken loose from a menagerie. If he met a lady in the street he gave her a kick, and told her to go home and mind her brats. If he saw a clergyman staring at the soldiers, he admonished the reverend gentleman to betake himself to study and prayer, and enforced this pious advice by a sound caning, administered on the spot.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 10.

1673. DISPOSITION, Variable. Alexander. Portraits of the same person, taken at different periods of life, though they differ greatly from each other, retain a resemblance upon the whole. And so it is in general with the characters of men. But Alexander seems to be an exception; for nothing can admit of greater dissimilarity than that which entered into his disposition at different times and in different circumstances. He was brave and pusillanimous, merciful and cruel, modest and vain, abstemious and luxurious, rational and superstitious, polite and overbearing, politic and imprudent. Nor were these changes casual or temporal; the style of his character underwent a total revolution, and he passed from virtue to vice in a regular and progressive manner. Munificence and pride were the only characteristics that never forsook him. If there were any vice of which he was incapable, it was avarice; if any virtue, it was humility.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER, LANGHORNE'S NOTE.

1674. DISPUTATION rewarded. Oliver Goldsmith. He had acquired, as has been shown, a habit of shifting along and living by expedients, and a new one presented itself in Italy. "My skill in music," says he, in the "Philosophic Vagabond," "could avail me nothing in a country where every peasant was a better musician than I; but by this time I had acquired another talent, which answered my purpose as well, and this was a skill in disputation. In all the foreign universities and convents there are, upon certain days, philosophical theses maintained against every adventitious disputant; for which, if the champion opposes with any dexterity, he can claim a gratuity in money, a dinner, and a bed for one night."—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 7, p. 50.

1675. DISSEMBLING, Successful. Faustina. Faustina . . . has been as much celebrated for her gallantries as for her beauty. . . . The Cupid of the ancients was, in general, a very sensual deity; and the amours of an empress, as they exact on her side the plainest advances, are seldom susceptible of much sentimental delicacy. Marcus was the only man in the empire who seemed ignorant or insensible of the irregularities of Faustina; which, according to the prejudices of every age, reflected some disgrace on the injured husband. He promoted several of her lovers to posts of honor and profit, and during a connection of thirty years invariably gave her proofs of the most tender confidence, and of a respect which ended not with her life. In his "Meditations" he thanks the gods, who had bestowed on him a wife so faithful, so gentle, and of such a wonderful simplicity of manners. The obsequious Senate, at his earnest request, declared her a goddess. She was represented in her temples with the attributes of Juno, Vesta, and Ceres; and it was decreed that, on the day of their nuptials, the youth of either sex should pay their vows before the altar of their chaste patroness.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2, p. 102.

1676. DISSEMBLING, Unsuccessful. Charles I. A prince, therefore, who is habitually a deceiver when at the height of power, is not likely to learn frankness in the midst of embarrassments and distresses. Charles was not only a most unscrupulous, but a most unlucky dissembler. There never was a politician to whom so many frauds and falsehoods were brought home by undeniable evidence. He publicly recognized the houses at Westminster as a legal Parliament, and, at the same time, made a private minute in council declaring the recognition null. He publicly disclaimed all thought of calling in foreign aid against his people; he privately solicited aid from France, from Denmark, and from Lorraine. He publicly denied that he employed papists; at the same time he privately sent to his generals directions to employ every papist that would serve. He publicly took the sacrament at Oxford as a pledge that he never would even connive at popery; he privately assured his wife that he intended to tolerate popery in England, and he authorized Lord Glamorgan to promise that popery should be established in Ireland. Then he attempted to clear himself at his agent's expense. Glamorgan received, in the royal handwriting, reprimands intended to be read by others, and eulogies which were to be seen only by himself. To such an extent, indeed, had insincerity now tainted the king's whole nature, that his most devoted friends could not refrain from complaining to each other, with bitter grief and shame, of his crooked politics. His defeats, they said, gave them less pain than his intrigues.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 118.

1677. DISSIMULATION, Dangers of. Charles I. [While a prisoner in the hands of his Parliament.] The three leading parties were the army, the Parliament, and the Scotch. Cromwell and his son-in-law, Ireton, were confident in their personal influence over the king; an accident deceived them. The king, having written a private letter to his wife, charged one of his confidential servants to conceal this letter in his horse's saddle, and convey it to Dover, where the fishing-boats served to transmit his correspondence to the Continent. . . . [The letter was taken by Cromwell, who says:] We read the king's letter to his wife. He told her that each faction was anxious that he should join them, but he thought he ought to conclude with the Scotch in preference to any other. We returned to the camp, and seeing that our cause had nothing to expect from the king, from that moment we resolved on his destruction.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 39.

1678. DISSIMULATION, Polite. Courtiers. Burnet, describing the general character of Charles [II.], says: "He was affable and easy, and loved to be made so by all about him. The great art of keeping him long was the being easy, and the making every thing easy to him." The modern phrase is "to make things pleasant;" and both phrases mean that there shall be a large ingredient of falsehood in human affairs.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 14, p. 237.

1679. DISSIMULATION, Political. Duke of Newcastle. [The Duke of Newcastle was the Secretary of the Treasury under George II.;] his thirst for power was insatiable. Jealous of every man of ability to whom it was necessary to entrust some share of authority, he was always in terror that his subalterns might be called to command, although ever professing his anxiety for their promotion. Always seeking the doubtful support of "troops of friends," he never offended any man by a plain "No," and was often "under the same engagements to at least ten competitors."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 13, p. 198.

1680. ———. Turks. When Sir Dudley North was pressed [by the tools of James II. to favor the abolition of the Test Act] he remembered an old Turkish saying—viz., that a man is to say "no" only to the devil.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 26, p. 418.

1681. DISSIMULATION, Religious. Roman Emperor Julian. His sentiments were changed; but as it would have been dangerous to have avowed his sentiments, his conduct still continued the same. Very different from the ass in Æsop, who disguised himself with a lion's hide, our lion was obliged to conceal himself under the skin of an ass; and, while he embraced the dictates of reason, to obey the laws of prudence and necessity. The dissimulation of Julian lasted about ten years, from his secret initiation at Ephesus to the beginning of the civil war, when he declared himself at once the implacable enemy of Christ and of Constantius.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 23, p. 420.

1682. DISSIMULATION, Royal. George III. [He was on a morning ride when a messenger reached him with a note, bearing a private mark, which indicated the death of George II. and his own elevation to royal authority.] Saying his horse was lame, he turned back to Kew, and dismounting, said to his groom: "I have said this horse is lame; I forbid you to say to the contrary." Walpole comments: "The first moment of the new reign affords a symptom of the prince's character; of that cool dissimulation in which he had been so well initiated by his mother, and which comprehended almost the whole of what she had taught him."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 12, p. 241.

1683. DISSIMULATION, Philosopher's. Samuel Johnson. One night, when Beauclerk and Langton had supped at a tavern in London, and sat till about three in the morning, it came into their heads to go and knock up Johnson, and see if they could prevail on him to join them in a ramble. They rapped violently at the doors of his chambers in the Temple, till at last he appeared in his shirt, with his little black wig on the top of his head instead of a nightcap, and a poker in his hand, imagining, probably, that some ruffians were coming to attack him. When he discovered who they were, and was told their errand, he smiled, and with great good-humor agreed to their proposal: "What, is it you, you dogs! I'll have a frisk with you." He was soon dressed, and they sallied forth together. . . . Garrick being told of this ramble, said to him, smartly, "I heard of your frolic t'other night. You'll be in the Chronicle." Upon which Johnson afterward observed, "He durst not do such a thing. His wife would not let him!"—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 65.

1684. DISSIPATION, Youthful. Edgar Allan Poe. [He was awarded the prize for the best story and the best poem by the Baltimore Visitor.] The author was sent for. . . . He was in the utmost state of destitution, pale, ghastly, filthy. His seedy frock coat, buttoned up to his throat, concealed the absence of a shirt, and his dilapidated boots disclosed the want of stockings.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 338.

1685. DISSUASION impossible. Cortez. [He set out for the conquest of Mexico.] The ambassadors [of Montezuma] tried in vain to dissuade the terrible Spaniard [from advancing on their capital]. They made him costly presents, and then hastened back to their alarmed sovereign. Montezuma immediately despatched them a second time with presents still more valuable, and with urgent appeals to Cortez to proceed no farther. . . . The Mexican emperor, by his messengers, forbade their approach to his city; still they pressed on.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 4, p. 58.

1686. DISTINCTION, Military. Belisarius. Whenever he appeared in the streets and public places of Constantinople Belisarius attracted and satisfied the eyes of the people. His lofty stature and majestic countenance fulfilled their expectations of a hero; the meanest of his fellow-citizens were emboldened by his gentle and gracious demeanor; and the martial train which attended his footsteps left his person more accessible than in a day of battle. Seven thousand horsemen, matchless for beauty and valor, were maintained in the service, and at the private expense, of the general. Their prowess was always conspicuous in single combats, or in the foremost ranks; and both parties confessed that in the siege of Rome the guards of Belisarius had alone vanquished the barbarian host.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41, p. 182.

1687. DISTRUST concealed. Romans. It was dangerous to trust the sincerity of Augustus; to seem to distrust it was still more dangerous. The respective advantages of monarchy and a republic have often divided speculative inquirers; the present greatness of the Roman State, the corruption of manners, and the license of the soldiers supplied new arguments to the advocates of monarchy; and these general views of government were again warped by the hopes and fears of each individual. Amid this confusion of sentiments the answer of the Senate was unanimous and decisive. They refused to accept the resignation of Augustus; they conjured him not to desert the republic, which he had saved. After a decent resistance the crafty tyrant submitted to the orders of the Senate, and consented to receive the government of the provinces, and the general command of the Roman armies, under the well-known names of Proconsul and Imperator.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 3, p. 75.

1688. DISUNION, Weakness of. Samuel Johnson. BOSWELL: "So, sir, you laugh at schemes of political improvement." JOHNSON: "Why, sir, most schemes of political improvement are very laughable things." He observed: "Providence has wisely ordered that the more numerous men are, the more difficult it is for them to agree in anything, and so they are governed. There is no doubt that if the poor should reason, 'We'll be the poor no longer, we'll make the rich take their turn,' they could easily do it, were it not that they can't agree. So the common soldiers, though so much more numerous than their officers, are governed by them for the same reason."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 168.

1689. DIVERSION, Mental. Dangerous. Artemidorus . . . had got intelligence of [the conspiracy to assassinate Cæsar, and he] approached Cæsar with a paper, explaining what he had to discover. Observing that he gave the papers, as fast as he received them, to his officers, he got up as close as possible, and said: "Cæsar, read this to yourself, and quickly; for it contains matters of great consequence, and of the last concern to you." He took it, and attempted several times to read it, but was always prevented by one application or other. He therefore kept that paper, and that only, in his hand, when he entered the house.—PLUTARCH'S CÆSAR.

1690. DIVERSITY of Interests. Society. [About 1593 Sidney writes in his "Arcadia" concerning the popular temper of his times:] When they begin to talk of their griefs, never bees made such confused humming. The town-dwellers demand putting down of imposths, the country fellows laying out of commons; some would have the prince to keep his court in one place, some in another; all cried out to have new counsellors; but when they should think of any new counsellors, they liked them as well as any that they could remember; . . . the artisans they would have corn and wine set at a lower price; . . . the plough-men, vine-laborers, and farmers would have none of that. The peasants would have all the gentlemen destroyed; the citizens, specially the cooks, barbers, and those other that lived most on gentlemen would but have them reformed.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 17, p. 262.

1691. DIVINITY, Proof of. Fernando de Soto. He attempted to overawe a tribe of Indians near Natchez, by claiming a supernatural birth and demanding obedience and tribute. "You say you are the child of the sun," replied the undaunted chief; "dry up the river, and I will believe you. You desire to see me? visit the town where I dwell. If you come in peace, I will receive you with special good-will; if in war, I will not shrink one foot back."—BAN CROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 2.

1692. DIVISION, Helpless by. Roman Emperor Aurelian. The emperor was almost at the same time informed of the irruption and of the retreat of the barbarians. Collecting an active body of troops, he marched with silence and celerity along the skirts of the Hyrcanian forest; and the Alemanni, laden with the spoils of Italy, arrived at the Danube, without suspecting that on the opposite bank, and in an advantageous post, a Roman army lay concealed and prepared to intercept their return. Aurelian indulged the fatal security of the barbarians, and permitted about half their forces to pass the river without disturbance and without precaution. Their situation and astonishment gave him an easy victory.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 11, p. 343.

1693. DIVISION necessary. *Barbarian Allies. Among the useful conditions of peace imposed by Probus [the emperor] on the vanquished nations of Germany was the obligation of supplying the Roman army with 16,000 recruits, the bravest and most robust of their youth. The emperor dispersed them through all the provinces, and distributed this dangerous re-enforcement, in small bands of fifty or sixty each, among the national troops, judiciously observing that the aid which the republic derived from the barbarians should be felt but not seen.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12, p. 383.

1694. DIVISION, Partisan. *Reign of Charles II. His object was not to destroy our [English] Constitution, but to keep the various elements of which it was composed in a perpetual state of conflict, and to set irreconcilable enmity between those who had the power of the purse and those who had the power of the sword. With this view he bribed and stimulated both parties in turn, pensioned at once the ministers of the Crown and the chiefs of the Opposition, encouraged the court to withstand the seditious encroachments of the Parliament, and conveyed to the Parliament intimations of the arbitrary designs of the court. [Charles sought aid of Louis XIV. to make him independent of Parliament.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 195.

1695. DIVISION, Ruinous. *Roman Empire. The decay of Rome has been frequently ascribed to the translation of the seat of empire; but this history has already shown that the powers of government were divided rather than removed. The throne of Constantinople was erected in the East, while the West was still possessed by a series of emperors who held their residence in Italy, and claimed their equal inheritance of the legions and provinces. This dangerous novelty impaired the strength and fomented the vices of a double reign; the instruments of an oppressive and arbitrary system were multiplied.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 38, p. 635.

1696. DIVISION by Civil War. *Reign of Charles I. Soon the two straggling parties were locked in deadly conflict, and the spot became memorable for ages for the blood shed in a skirmish which could not be dignified by the name of a battle. Throughout the land family ties were severed; everywhere "a man's foes were of his own household." "Old armor came down from a thousand old walls, and clanked upon the anvil of every village smithy;" "boot and saddle!" was the order of the day and night; every buff coat and every piece of steel that could turn or deal a blow became of value. Even the long-bow, the brown bill, and cross-bow resumed their almost forgotten use; rude spears and common staves and Danish clubs assumed the rank of weapons. The trumpets of the Cavaliers rang out fearlessly through the half of England, and thrilled the spirits of the people with the cries of loyalty; responded to by the thrill blast of the Roundhead and the cry of liberty. "Those," says Carlyle, "were the most confused months England ever saw;" in every shire, in every parish, in court-houses, ale-houses, churches, and markets, wheresoever men were gathered together. England was, with sorrowful confusion in every fibre, tearing itself into hostile halves, to carry on the voting by pike and bullet henceforth. The spirit of war stalked forth; many times we find the record of men who slew an enemy, and found a parent in the corpse they were about to spoil.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 6, p. 96.

1697. DIVISION, Weakness by. *Germans. [Ancient] Germany was divided into more than forty independent states; and even in each state the union of the several tribes was extremely loose and precarious. The barbarians were easily provoked; they knew not how to forgive an injury, much less an insult; their resentments were bloody and implacable. The casual disputes that so frequently happened in their tumultuous parties of hunting or drinking were sufficient to inflame the minds of whole nations; the private feuds of any considerable chieftains diffused itself among their followers and allies.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 275.

1698. DIVORCE advocated. *John Milton. The suggestion, which I believe was first made by a writer in the Athenæum, is that Milton's young wife refused him the consummation of the marriage. The supposition is founded upon a certain passage in Milton's pamphlet. . . . If the "Doctrine and Discipline" [of divorce] was in the hands of the public on August 1; if Milton was brooding over this seething agony of passion all through July, with the young bride, to whom he had been barely wedded a month, in the house where he was writing, then the only apology for this outrage upon the charities, not to say decencies of home, is that which is suggested by the passage referred to. Then the pamphlet, however imprudent, becomes pardonable. It is a passionate cry from the depths of a great despair.—MILTON, BY M. PATTISON, ch. 5.

1699. DIVORCE, Agonizing. *Napoleon I. [After a dinner in painful silence] he took her hand, and placed it upon his heart, and with a faltering voice said: "Josephine, my own good Josephine, you know how I have loved you! It is to you alone that I owe the only few moments' happiness I have known in the world. Josephine, my destiny is stronger than my will. My dearest affections must yield to the welfare of France." The cruel blow, all expected as it was, pierced that loving heart. Josephine fell lifeless to the floor. Napoleon alarmed rushed to the door and called for assistance. [They] . . . conveyed the Empress Josephine up a flight of stairs to her apartment. She murmured, as they bore her along, "Oh, no, no! you cannot do it! You surely would not kill me." Napoleon was intensely agitated. . . . He paced the floor in anguish until the dawn of the morning, . . . trembling with emotion and his eyes filled with tears, . . . articulating with difficulty. [He declared the interest of France made a divorce his painful duty. It was consummated on December 15, 1809.]—ABBOTT'S NAPOLÉON B., vol. 2, ch. 10.

1700. DIVORCE, Causes of. *Confucius. He permits divorce for any one of seven reasons: "When a woman cannot live in peace with her father-in-law or mother-in-law; when she cannot bear children; when she is unfaithful; when, by the utterance of calumnies or indiscreet words, she disturbs the peace of the house; when her husband has for her an unconquerable repugnance; when she is an inveterate scold; when she steals anything from her husband's house;" in any of these cases her husband may put her away.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 418.

1701. DIVORCE, Convenient. Carinus. In the Gallic war he discovered some degree of personal courage; but from the moment of his arrival at Rome he abandoned himself to the luxury of the capital and to the abuse of his fortune. He was soft, yet cruel; devoted to pleasure, but destitute of taste; and though exquisitely susceptible of vanity, indifferent to the public esteem. In the course of a few months he successively married and divorced nine wives, most of whom he left pregnant; and notwithstanding this legal inconstancy, found time to indulge such a variety of irregular appetites as brought dishonor on himself and on the noblest houses of Rome. He beheld with inveterate hatred all those who might remember his former obscurity, or censure his present conduct. He banished or put to death the friends and counsellors whom his father [Emperor Carus] had placed about him, to guide his inexperienced youth; and he persecuted with meanest revenge his school-fellows and companions, who had not sufficiently respected the latent majesty of the emperor. . . . From the dregs of that populace he selected his favorites, and even his ministers. The palace and even the Imperial table were filled with singers, dancers, prostitutes, and all the various retinue of vice and folly.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 11, p. 364.

1702. DIVORCE, Demoralized by. Romans. When the Roman matrons became the equal and voluntary companions of their lords, a new jurisprudence was introduced, that marriage, like other partnerships, might be dissolved by the abdication of one of the associates. In three centuries of prosperity and corruption this principle was enlarged to frequent practice and pernicious abuse. Passion, interest, or caprice suggested daily motives for the dissolution of marriage; a word, a sign, a message, a letter, the mandate of a freedman, declared the separation; the most tender of human connections was degraded to a transient society of profit or pleasure. According to the various conditions of life, both sexes alternately felt the disgrace and injury; an inconstant spouse transferred her wealth to a new family, abandoning a numerous, perhaps a spurious, progeny to the paternal authority and care of her late husband; a beautiful virgin might be dismissed to the world, old, indigent, and friendless.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 349.

1703. DIVORCE disallowed. Puritans of New England. Of divorce I have found no example. . . . Divorce from bed and board, the separate maintenance without the dissolution of the marriage contract—an anomaly in Protestant legislation, that punishes the innocent more than the guilty—was utterly abhorrent from their principles. . . . the sanctity of the marriage-bed is the safeguard of families; . . . its purity was protected by the penalty of death—a penalty which was inexorably enforced against the guilty wife and her paramour.—BANCROFT'S U. S., ch. 10, vol. 1.

1704. DIVORCE, First. Roman. Time bears witness to the conjugal modesty, tenderness, and fidelity which he established; for during two hundred and thirty years no man attempted to leave his wife, nor any woman her husband. And as the very curious among the Greeks can tell you who was the first person that killed his father and mother, so all the Romans know that Spurius Carvilius was the first that divorced his wife, alleging her barrenness.—PLUTARCH'S ROMULUS AND THESEUS.

1706. DIVORCE, One-sided. Roman. The causes of the dissolution of matrimony have varied among the Romans; but the most solemn sacrament, the confarreation itself, might always be done away by rites of a contrary tendency. In the first ages the father of a family might sell his children, and his wife was reckoned in the number of his children; the domestic judge might pronounce the death of the offender, or his mercy might expel her from his bed and house; but the slavery of the wretched female was hopeless and perpetual, unless he asserted for his own convenience the manly prerogative of divorce.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 43, p. 248.

1707. DIVORCE permissible. Roman Law. In the most rigorous laws a wife was condemned to support a gamester, a drunkard, or a libertine, unless he were guilty of homicide, poison, or sacrilege, in which cases the marriage, as it should seem, might have been dissolved by the hand of the executioner. But the sacred right of the husband was invariably maintained, to deliver his name and family from the disgrace of adultery; the list of mortal sins, either male or female, was curtailed and enlarged by successive regulations, and the obstacles of incurable impotence, long absence, and monastic profession were allowed to rescind the matrimonial obligation.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 349.

1708. DIVORCE regulated. Emperor Augustus. Augustus, who united the powers of both magistrates, adopted their different modes of repressing or chastising the license of divorce. The presence of seven Roman witnesses was required for the validity of this solemn and deliberate act; if any adequate provocation had been given by the husband, instead of the delay of two years, he was compelled to refund immediately, or in the space of six months; but if he could arraign the manners of his wife, her guilt or levity was expiated by the loss of the sixth or eighth part of her marriage portion.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 350.

1709. DIVORCE, Views of. Reformers. [The early English Reformers, as represented by Cranmer,] did not regard marriage as indissoluble. Divorce for adultery might be pronounced by the ecclesiastical courts, with liberty to marry again by the party sinned against, and not sinning. Divorce was also held lawful in cases of mortal enmities, the desertion of a husband, his lasting cruelty, or his prolonged absence.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 3, p. 40.

1710. DOMINION, Boundless. Roman. The slave of Imperial despotism . . . expected his fate in silent despair. To resist was fatal, and it was impossible to fly. On every side he was encompassed with a vast extent of sea and land, which he could never hope to traverse without being discovered, seized, and restored to his irritated master. Beyond the frontiers his anxious view could discover nothing, except the ocean, inhospitable deserts, hostile tribes of barbarians, of fierce manners and unknown language, or dependent kings, who would gladly purchase the emperor's protection by the sacrifice of an obnoxious fugitive. "Wherever you are," said Cicero to the exiled Marcellus, "remember that you are equally within the power of the conqueror."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 3, p. 100.

1711. DOMINION, Proofs of. Water. Dinon informs us that the kings of Persia used to have water fetched from the Nile and the Danube, and put among their treasures, as a proof of the extent of their dominions, and their being masters of the world.—PLUTARCH.

1712. DOUBT expressed. Marcus Crassus. He was drawing his troops out of winter quarters when ambassadors came from Arsaces, and addressed him in this short speech: "If this army was sent against the Parthians by the Roman people, that people has nothing to expect but perpetual war and enmity irreconcilable. But if Crassus, against the inclinations of his country (which they were informed was the case), to gratify his own avarice, has undertaken this war, and invaded one of the Parthian provinces, Arsaces will act with more moderation. He will take compassion on Crassus's age, and let the Romans go, though in fact he considers them rather as in prison than in garrison." To this Crassus made no return but a rhodomontade; he said he would give them his answer at Seleucia. Upon which Vagises, the oldest of the ambassadors, laughed; and turning up the palm of his hand, replied, "Crassus, here will hair grow before thou shalt see Seleucia."—PLUTARCH'S CRASSUS.

1713. DOUBT, Philosophic, Academics. Next to the Epicurean system the doctrines most prevalent at that time were those of the new Academy, very different from those of the old Academy, founded by Plato. The new Academics asserted the impossibility of arriving at truth, and held it entirely a matter of doubt whether vice or virtue were preferable. These opinions evidently struck at the foundation not only of religion, but of morality.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 4.

1714. DOUBTS overcome. George Fox, the Quaker. A.D. 1648. One morning as Fox sat silently by the fire a cloud came over his mind; a baser instinct seemed to say, "All things come by nature;" and the elements and the stars oppressed his imagination with the vision of pantheism. But as he continued musing, a true voice arose within him and said, "There is a God." At once the clouds of scepticism rolled away . . . his soul enjoyed the sweetness of repose . . . the paradise of contemplation.—BANCROFT'S U. S., ch. 16, vol. 2.

1715. DRAINAGE, Scheme of. Charles I. In those days some millions of acres of the finest plains in the counties of Cambridge, Huntingdon, Northampton, and Lincoln lay undrained. Several years before the period to which we now refer the Earl of Oxford and other noblemen of that day had proposed to drain large portions of them, and in fact had done so. The Bedford Level, containing nearly 400,000 acres, had been completed, when it was found necessary to call in other aid; and a proposition was made to the Crown, offering a fair proportion of the land for its assistance and authority in the completion of the whole. Until now all had gone on well; but hungry Charles saw here an opportunity of gratifying his cupidity. A number of commissioners came from the king to Huntingdon; they, instructed by the king's own letter, proceeded to lay claim under various pretexts, such as corrupt and servile ministers know how to use, to 95,000 acres of land already drained. Cromwell stepped upon the stage of action, and the draining of the fens was entirely stopped.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 4, p. 78.

1716. DRAINAGE, Success by. Romans. The lake of Alba increased prodigiously, and deputies were sent to inquire what the gods meant by that extraordinary phenomenon. The deputies brought back word that the conquest of Veii depended on draining the lake, and that particular care should be taken to convey the waters to the sea (a most wise and salutary advice, in a season of contagious disease). The work was immediately begun; and that fine canal was cut, which subsists at this day, and conveys the waters of the lake Albano, by Castel-Gondolfo, to the sea. This was likewise an instance in which the faith of the people in the veracity of the prediction might have greatly aided its accomplishment.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 6.

1717. DRAMA, Indecent. Twelfth Century. In one of them, which is entitled a Play of the Old and New Testament, Adam and Eve are introduced upon the stage naked, and conversing in very strange terms about their nakedness. Mr. Warton has given a curious account of this play in his "History of English Poetry." In some of the first scenes of this play God is represented creating the world; He breathes life into Adam, leads him into Paradise, and opens his side while sleeping. Adam and Eve appear naked in the garden, and not ashamed, and the Old Serpent enters, lamenting his fall. He converses with Eve; she eats of the forbidden fruit; they are cursed by God; the Serpent exits hissing; they are driven from Paradise by the Cherubim, with a flaming sword, and Adam then appears digging the ground, and Eve spinning.—NOTE IN TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 16.

1718. DRAMA, Literature of the. Greece. We see from this short review of the origin of literature among the Romans, that its earliest efforts were exclusively confined to dramatic composition. The Romans, in a word, borrowed their literature from Greece, and first attempted the species of literature then most popular in Greece; if, indeed, their Plautus and Terence, and the rest, did more than translate or adapt the then most popular pieces of the Greek stage. It was not until the golden age of Augustus that, by the revolutions which then took place in the public taste, the other high departments of literature were introduced at Rome.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 3.

1719. DRAMA, Origin of the. Rome. About the 390th year of Rome the city had been reduced to extreme distress by a pestilence, and an uncommon method was adopted to appease the wrath of the gods, in sending into Etruria for drolls or stage-dancers. The dances of these Etrurians, according to Livy, were not ungraceful, and the Roman youth readily learned to imitate their performances, adding to them their own fescennine ballads, which they recited to the sound of music, with appropriate gestures. Here evidently was the first rise of dramatic performances among the Romans; but, as yet, all was rude and imperfect, and they were altogether ignorant of the regular structure of a dramatic composition. This they acquired the first idea of from the Greeks. Euripides and Sophocles had flourished nearly one hundred and sixty years, and Menander above fifty years, before this period. The dramatic poem was at this time in the highest celebrity in Greece, and was at length, about the year of Rome 514, introduced into that commonwealth by Livius Andronicus, a Greek slave.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 3.

1720. DRAMA, Religious. Churches. The first dramatic representations known in Europe were devotional pieces, acted by the monks, in the churches of their convents, representative of the life and actions of our Saviour and of His apostles. In England these representations were termed mysteries, and sometimes miracles and moralities. They were brought into use about the twelfth century, and continued to be performed in England even to the sixteenth century. There is, in the reign of Henry VIII., a prohibition, by the bishop of London, against the performance of any plays or interludes in churches or chapels. Perhaps at this time profane stories had begun to take the place of the sacred mysteries; it is certain, at least, that these sacred mysteries themselves often contained great absurdities and very gross indecency. [See No. 1717.]—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 16.

1721. DREAM, Directed by a. Constantine. He affirms, with the most perfect confidence, that in the night which preceded the last battle against Maxentius, Constantine was admonished in a dream to inscribe the shields of his soldiers with the celestial sign of God, the sacred monogram of the name of Christ; that he executed the commands of heaven, and that his valor and obedience were rewarded by the decisive victory of the Milvian Bridge.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 20, p. 263.

1722. DREAM realized. Cicero's. Cicero, it seems, had a dream, in which he thought he called some boys, the sons of senators, up to the Capitol, because Jupiter designed to pitch upon one of them for sovereign of Rome. The citizens ran with all the eagerness of expectation, and placed themselves about the temple; and the boys in their prætextæ sat silent. The doors suddenly opening, the boys rose up one by one, and, in their order, passed round the god, who reviewed them all and sent them away disappointed; but when Octavius approached, he stretched out his hand to him and said, "Romans, this is the person who, when he comes to be your prince, will put an end to your civil wars." This vision, they tell us, made such an impression upon Cicero, that he perfectly retained the figure and countenance of the boy, though he did not yet know him. Next day he went down to the Campus Martius, when the boys were just returning from their exercises; and the first who struck his eye was the lad in the very form that he had seen in his dream. Astonished at the discovery, Cicero asked him who were his parents; and he proved to be the son of Octavius, a person not much distinguished in life, and of Attia, sister to Cæsar. As he was so near a relation, and Cæsar had no children of his own, he adopted him, and, by will, left him his estate. Cicero, after his dream, whenever he met young Octavius, is said to have treated him with particular regard, and he received those marks of his friendship with great satisfaction. Beside, he happened to be born the same year that Cicero was consul.—PLUTARCH'S CICERO.

1723. DREAMS, Regard for. American Indians. Dreams are to the wild man the avenue to the invisible world; he reveres them as divine revelations, and believes he shall die unless they are carried into effect. The capricious visions in a feverish sleep are obeyed by the village or the tribe; the whole nation would contribute its harvest, its costly furs, . . . rather than fail in their fulfilment, . . . even if it required the surrender of women to public embrace.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

1724. DREAMS verified. Rev. Richard Boardman. [On his way to Parkgate, his journey took him across the sands, where the tide returning, and a blinding snow concealing his course, his condition became extremely perilous. A wall of perpendicular rocks on one side, the sea on the other, left him little hope of escape, till he observed two men running down a hill on the opposite side of the water, who pushed out a boat, and came to take him off from his horse, just as the sea had reached his knees as he sat in the saddle.] While we were in the boat, one of the men said, "Surely, God is with you." I answered, "I trust He is." The man replied, "I know He is; last night I dreamed that I must go to the top of such a hill. When I awoke the dream made such an impression that I could not rest. I went and called upon this man to accompany me, . . . and there we saw your distressed condition."—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 1, p. 96.

1725. DREAMS, Visionary. Napoleon I. [At St. Helena, in his last illness, one morning.] Napoleon started up and exclaimed, in dreamy delirium, "I have just seen my good Josephine, but she would not embrace me. She disappeared at the moment when I was about to take her in my arms. She was seated there. . . . She is not changed. She is still the same, full of devotion to me. She told me we were about to see each other again, never more to part. Did you see her?"—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 34.

1726. DRESS, Criminal. Joan of Arc. She feared in fact among the soldiery those outrages to her honor, to guard against which she had from the first assumed the dress of a man. In the eyes of the church her dress was a crime, and she abandoned it; but a renewed affront forced her to resume the one safeguard left her, and the return to it was treated as a relapse into heresy, which doomed her to death. At the close of May, 1431, a great pile was raised in the marketplace of Rouen, where her statue stands now. Even the brutal soldiers who snatched the hated "witch" from the hands of the clergy and hurried her to her doom were hushed as she reached the stake. One indeed passed to her a rough cross he had made from a stick he held, and she clasped it to her bosom. As her eyes ranged over the city from the lofty scaffold, she was heard to murmur, "O Rouen, Rouen, I have great fear lest you suffer for my death!" "Yes, my voices were of God!" she suddenly cried as the last moment came; "they have never deceived me!" Soon the flames reached her, the girl's head sank on her breast, there was one cry of "Jesus!" "We are lost," an English soldier muttered as the crowd broke up; "we have burnt a saint!"—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 433.

1727. DRESS exchanged. Joan of Arc. To travel at such a time with five or six men-at-arms was enough to alarm a young girl. An English woman or a German would never have risked such a step; the indelicacy of the proceeding would have horrified her. Jeanne was nothing moved by it; she was too pure to entertain any fears of the kind. She wore a man's dress—a dress she wore to the last; this close and closely fastened dress was her best safeguard. Yet was she young and beautiful. But there was around her, even to those who were most with her, a barrier raised by religion and fear.—MICHELET'S JOAN OF ARC, p. 8.

1728. DRESS, Extravagance in. By Example. [The period of proud Henry VIII. and the ostentatious Cardinal Wolsey] was an age of display, when the king set the example to his court of the most extravagant splendor, which many of the nobles ruined themselves to imitate.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 17, p. 278.

1729. ———. Middle Ages. [From 1450 to 1485 was a most luxurious period.] It has been truly said [by Sir N. H. Nichols] that extravagance in dress "was a peculiar characteristic of the middle ages throughout Europe." The handsome Edward IV. and the misshapen Richard III. were equally careful of the splendor of their array. Lewis XI. of France . . . in his last days his gowns were all crimson satin lined with rich martins' furs.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 7, p. 103.

1730. ———. Romans. It was a complaint worthy of the gravity of the Senate, that, in the purchase of female ornaments, the wealth of the State was irrecoverably given away to foreign and hostile nations. The annual loss is computed, by a writer of an inquisitive but censorious temper, at upward of £800,000 sterling.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2, p. 69.

1731. DRESS, Impressed by. Luther. On Sunday morning early Luther sent for his barber. When he had arrived he asked Luther, "Doctor, how comes it that you desire to be shaved at so early an hour?" Luther replied, "I am called to meet the ambassador of his Holy Father, the Pope; hence I must prepare and adorn myself to appear before him as if I were young; then the legate will think, 'The deuce! if Luther in his youth has done us so much mischief, what may he not do hereafter?'"—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 22, p. 177.

1732. DRESS, Investment in. Samuel Johnson. A gentleman told him he had bought a suit of lace for his lady; he said: "Well, sir, you have done a good thing and a wise thing." "I have done a good thing," said the gentleman, "but I do not know that I have done a wise thing." JOHNSON: "Yes, sir; no money is better spent than what is laid out for domestic satisfaction. A man is pleased that his wife is dressed as well as other people; and a wife is pleased that she is dressed."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 248.

1733. DRESS, Legislation on. England. [The statute of 1463 declares] the squire and gentleman having £40 a year may indulge in damask or satin, forbidden to their less wealthy neighbors. Mayors, sheriffs, and aldermen have special exemptions. Below the class of esquire and gentleman are those who have obtained position by their wealth; and those who have £40 of yearly value may rejoice in furs and gilt girdles. The men possessed of less than £40 yearly are debarred from furs and fustian and scarlet cloth. The yeomen and the persons under this degree are to have no stuffing in their doublets. Lastly, the servants in husbandry and artificers are to wear no clothing of which the cloth shall cost more than two shillings the broad yard. The second statute of 1483 prescribes what peculiar cloth of gold or silk shall be forbidden to all below the royal rank; what to those below a duke; what to those below a lord, of whom the knight only shall wear velvet in his doublet. By a comprehensive clause, no man under the estate of a lord should wear cloth of foreign manufacture; and the old price of cloth is again fixed for laborers and artificers.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 7, p. 101.

1734. ———. Sumptuary. [In 1593 the sumptuary laws of Henry VIII. were not repealed, but could not be enforced.] Those who were winning wealth by industry would no longer submit, if they ever did submit, to be told by statute what they were not to wear, according to a scale of income varying from £200 to £5. They utterly despised the reason set forth for such arbitrary regulation—namely, to prevent "the subversion of good and politic order in knowledge and distinction of people, according to their estates, pre-eminences, dignities, and degrees." A statute of Philip and Mary was directed against the wearing of silk, except by certain privileged classes. . . . By statute of 1562-63 . . . "foreign stuff or wares" . . . if sold to any person not possessing £3000 a year, in lands or fees, not being paid for in ready money, the seller was debarred of any legal remedy for the recovery of the debt. By a statute of 1566 velvet hats or caps were prohibited to all persons under the degree of a knight; and by that of 1571 every person, except ladies, lords, knights, and gentlemen having twenty marks by the year in land, was to wear upon his head, on Sundays and holidays, a home-made cap of wool, very decent and comely for all states and degrees. If Stubbes is to be relied upon, all states and degrees rejected the statutory notion of what was decent and comely. They wore hats "perking up like the spear or shaft of a temple;" or hats "flat and broad and flat on the crown, like the battlements of a house;" or "round crowns," with bands of every color. They wore hats of silk, velvet, taffety, sarsenet, wool, and of "fine hair, which they called beaver." . . . He was in no estimation among them who had not a velvet or taffety hat ; " and so common a thing it is, that every serving-man, country-man, or other, even all indifferently, do wear of these hats."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16, p. 246.

1735. ——. Henry VIII. In 1536 Henry VIII. writeth to his "well beloved" of the town of Galway, straightly charging and commanding that they should perpetually observe certain articles set forth for their weal and profit : "Item, That every inhabitant, as well within the said town as the suburbs of the same, do shave their over [upper] lips, called crompeaulis ; and suffer the hair of their heads to grow till it cover their ears ; and that every of them wear English caps. Item, That no man nor manchild do wear mantles in the streets, but cloaks or gowns, coats, doublets, hose, shapen after the English fashion, of the country cloth, or any other cloth shall please them to buy." . . . In the reign of Elizabeth . . . "the ancient dress" was still worn. The mantle was still "a fit house for an outlaw, a neat bed for rebel, and an apt cloak for a thief."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 24, p. 396.

1736. ——. England. [In 1351 a statute was passed to] restrain the outrageous and excessive apparel of divers people against their estate and degree. "Servants, artificers, . . . tradesmen . . . and their wives are to wear cloth of a certain low price, with no gold, or silver, or silk, or embroidery. . . . Laborers in husbandry, . . . if they had not forty shillings of goods or chattels, they were to wear only a blanket and russet, and girdles of linen, according to their estate. In these two classes must have been comprised the bulk of the population."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 31, p. 479.

1737. DRESS an Obstacle. Oliver Goldsmith. We have stated his great objection to clerical life, the obligation to wear a black coat ; and, whimsical as it may appear, dress seemed in fact to have formed an obstacle to his entrance into the church. He had ever a passion for clothing his sturdy but awkward little person in gay colors ; and on this solemn occasion, when it was to be supposed his garb would be of suitable gravity, he appeared luminously arrayed in scarlet breeches ! He was rejected by the bishop.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 3, p. 30.

1738. DRESS, Preaching against. Bishop of London. [Queen Elizabeth carried her love of foreign dress almost into a mania. It was the only expenditure of which she was profuse. Sir John Harrington says :] On Sunday my lord of London preached to the Queen's Majesty, and seemed to touch the vanity of decking the body too finely. Her Majesty told the ladies that "if the bishop held more discourse on such matters, she would fit him for heaven, but he should walk thither without a staff, and leave his mantle behind him."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16, p. 247.

1739. DRESS, Sinful. Joan of Arc. What illustrates the time, the uninformed mind of these doctors, and their blind attachment to the letter without regard to the spirit, is, that no point seemed graver to them than the sin of having assumed male attire. They represented to her that, according to the canons, those who thus change the habit of their sex are abominable in the sight of God. At first she would not give a direct answer, and begged for a respite till the next day ; but her judges insisting on her discarding the dress, she replied that she was not empowered to say when she could quit it.—MICHELET'S JOAN, p. 43.

1740. DRINKING, Ancient. England. They were hard drinkers, no doubt, as they were hard toilers, and the "ale-feast" was the centre of their social life. But coarse as the revel might seem to modern eyes, the scene within the timbered hall, which rose in the midst of their villages, was often Homeric in its simplicity and dignity. Queen or earl's wife, with a train of maidens, bore ale-bowl or mead-bowl round the hall, from the high settle of king or ealdorman in the midst to the mead benches ranged around its walls, while the gleeman sang the hero-songs of his race.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 19.

1741. DRINKING, Art in. Samuel Johnson. Talking of the effects of drinking, he said : "Drinking may be practised with great prudence ; a man who exposes himself when he is intoxicated has not the art of getting drunk ; a sober man, who happens occasionally to get drunk, readily enough goes into a new company, which a man who has been drinking should never do. Such a man will undertake anything ; he is without skill in inebriation. I used to slink home when I had drunk too much. A man accustomed to self-examination will be conscious when he is drunk, though an habitual drunkard will not be conscious of it. I knew a physician who for twenty years was not sober ; yet in a pamphlet, which he wrote upon fevers, he appealed to Garrick and me for his vindication from a charge of drunkenness. A bookseller (naming him) who got a large fortune by trade was so habitually and equally drunk, that his most intimate friends never perceived that he was more sober at one time than another."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 411.

1742. DRINKING, Effects of. Samuel Johnson. I dined with him at Sir Joshua Reynolds'. I have not marked what company was there. Johnson harangued upon the qualities of different liquors, and spoke with great contempt of claret, as so weak that "a man would be drowned by it before it made him drunk." He was persuaded to drink one glass of it, that he might judge, not from recollection, which might be dim, but from immediate sensation. He shook his head, and said : "Poor stuff ! No, sir ; claret is the liquor for boys ; port for men ; but he who aspires to be a hero (smiling) must drink brandy. In the first place, the flavor of brandy is most grateful to the palate ; and then brandy will do soonest for a man what drinking can do for him."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 409.

1743. ——. Samuel Johnson. We discussed the question whether drinking improved conversation and benevolence. Sir Joshua maintained it did. JOHNSON : "No, sir ; before dinner men meet with great inequality of understanding ; and those who are conscious of their inferiority have the modesty not to talk. When they have drunk wine every man feels himself happy, and loses that modesty, and grows impudent and vociferous ; but he is not improved ; he is only not sensible of his defects. I admit that the spirits are raised by drinking, as by the common participation of any pleasure; cock-fighting or bear-baiting will raise the spirits of a company, as drinking does, though surely they will not improve conversation. I also admit that there are some sluggish men who are improved by drinking, as there are fruits which are not good till they are rotten. There are such men, but they are meddlers. Indeed allow that there have been a very few men of talents who were improved by drinking."—BOSWELL'S JOHN-SON, p. 299.

1744. DRUNKENNESS, Melancholy. Alexander. [During a drunken carousal offence was given to Alexander the Great by one of his officers. An opportunity being presented,] Alexandersnatched a spear from one of his guards, and meeting Clitus, as he was putting by the curtain, ran him through the body. He fell immediately to the ground, and with a dismal groan expired. Alexander's rage subsided in a moment; he came to himself; and seeing his friends standing in silent astonishment by him, he hastily drew the spear out of the dead body, and was applying it to his own throat, when his guards seized his hands, and carried him by force into his chamber. He passed that night and the next day in anguish inexpressible; and when he had wasted himself with tears and lamentations, he lay in speechless grief, uttering only now and then a groan. His friends, alarmed at this melancholy silence, forced themselves into the room, and attempted to console him.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

1745. DRUNKENNESS punished. Drunkard's Cloak. [In 1793 there were punishments for low debauchery, such as the drunkard's cloak, consisting of a barrel minus the lower head, having an opening in the upper part for the projection of the head of the wearer, whose body was enclosed by it; small openings on the sides permitted the extension of the hands, which could not reach the mouth.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16.

1746. DUEL, Combat by. Alexander. Alexander having subdued all on this side the Euphrates, began his march against Darius, who had taken the field with 1,000,000 men. During this march one of his friends mentioned to him, as a matter that might divert him, that the servants of the army had divided themselves into two bands, and that each had chosen a chief, one of which they called Alexander, and the other Darius. They began to skirmish with clods, and afterward fought with their fists; and at last, heated with a desire of victory, many of them came to stones and sticks, insomuch that they could hardly be parted. The king, upon this report, ordered the two chiefs to fight in single combat, and armed Alexander with his own hands, while Philotas did the same for Darius. The whole army stood and looked on, considering the event of this combat as a presage of the issue of the war. The two champions fought with great fury; but he who bore the name of Alexander proved victorious. He was rewarded with a present of twelve villages, and allowed to wear a Persian robe, as Eratosthenes tells the story.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

1747. DUEL, Murder by. Alexander Hamilton. In the summer of 1804 the country was shocked by the intelligence that Vice-President

Burr had killed Alexander Hamilton in a duel. [Burr was ambitious to secure the Presidential chair after Mr. Jefferson's second term. To this end he became a candidate for the governor's office in New York.] But Hamilton's powerful influence in New York prevented Burr's election, and his Presidential ambition received a stunning blow. From that day he determined to kill the man whom he pretended to regard as the destroyer of his hopes. He accordingly sought a quarrel with Hamilton; challenged him; met him at Weehawken, opposite New York, on the morning of the 11th of July, and deliberately murdered him; for Hamilton had tried to avoid the challenge, and when face to face with his antagonist refused to fire. Thus, under the savage and abominable custom of duelling, was put out the brightest intellect in America.—RID-PATH'S U. S., ch. 48, p. 382.

1748. DUEL, Naval. Paul Jones. Dr. Franklin succeeded in getting him another ship, the ever famous Bon Homme Richard, thus named by Captain Jones in honor of the venerable editor of Poor Richard's Almanac. She was a large, slow, rotten old ship, carrying forty guns, and manned by three hundred and eighty sailors and landmen of all nations—French, Irish, Scotch, Portuguese, Malays, Maltese, and a sprinkling of Americans. It was in this ship that the indomitable Jones fought the Serapis, a new British ship of forty-four guns, one of the stoutest vessels in the English navy. This was perhaps the most desperate and bloody contest that ever took place between single ships. It was fought in the evening of September 23d, 1778, so near the Yorkshire coast that the battle was witnessed by hundreds of spectators on the shore. . . . At half-past ten in the evening, the British ship being on fire in many places, her captain struck his colors. The Bon Homme Richard was so completely knocked to pieces that she could not be kept afloat. She sank the next day, and Captain Jones went into port in the captured ship, with 700 prisoners. This great victory raised his fame to the highest point. The King of France gave him a magnificent diamond hilted sword, and Congress voted him a gold medal.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 337.

1749. DUEL proposed. Monarchs. The French army had passed the Alps, when Charles V. set out from Rome, and obliged them again to retreat across the mountains, and entering Provence, advanced as far as Marseilles, and laid siege to Arles, while another army ravaged Champagne and Picardy. It was on this occasion of the enterprise against the Milanese that Francis [I.] took it into his head to send Charles a challenge to engage him in single combat, staking as a prize Milan on the one part, and Burgundy on the other. The challenge was accepted, but it may be believed that this extraordinary duel was never fought.—TYR-LLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 19.

1750. DUEL, Religious. Wellington. [On the 21st of March, 1829, the Duke of Wellington had a hostile meeting in Battersea fields with the Earl of Winchelsea, occasioned by an insinuation respecting the duke's sincere attachment to Protestantism.] The Duke of Wellington fired without effect; the Earl of Winchelsea discharged his pistol in the air, and then tendered a written apology.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 12, p. 240.

1751. DUELS, Inequality in. Josiah Quincy. His ardor in debate would have led to frequent challenges and duels if he had not from the first made up his mind never to be bullied into an acquiescence with so barbarous a custom. In conversation with Southern members on the subject, he would say: "We do not stand upon equal grounds in this matter. If we fight and you kill me, it is a feather in your cap, and your constituents will think all the better of you for it. If I should kill you, it would ruin me with mine, and they would never send me to Congress again."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 752.

1752. DUPLICITY, National. Treachorous. An amount of duplicity and treachery, happily unparalleled in the future conduct of our country, [was practised by the ministry of Queen Anne toward the allies, with whom she was bound, by special treaties, to resist France]. The ministry were afraid of some brilliant success in Flanders that might derange their plans; and to prevent such a calamity, they gave secret information to the enemy of the military projects of the allies, and at the most critical moment of the campaign they withdrew their troops from the contest. [Their general was commanded to keep up the pretence of co-operation, but to prevent any engagement before he was ordered home with his army.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 25, p. 392.

1753. DUTIES, High. Salt. [During the reign of William III. the duty on salt was raised to forty times the value of the article taxed.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 2, p. 22.

1754. DWELLINGS, Plainness in. Lycurgus the Lavagiver. He issued an ordinance which levelled against magnificence and expense, directed that the ceilings of houses should be wrought with no tool but the axe, and the doors with nothing but the saw. For Epaminondas is reported to have said, afterward . . . such a house admits of no luxury and needless splendor. Indeed, no man could be so absurd as to bring into a dwelling so homely and simple, bedsteads with silver feet, purple coverlets, golden cups, and a train of expense that follows these, but all would necessarily have the bed suitable to the room, the coverlet of the bed and the rest of their utensils and furniture to that.—PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

1755. EARNESTNESS, Eloquence of. Peter the Hermit. [He instigated the Crusades.] When he painted the sufferings of the natives and pilgrims of Palestine, every heart was melted to compassion; every breast glowed with indignation when he challenged the warriors of the age to defend their brethren and rescue their Saviour; his ignorance of art and language was compensated by sighs and tears and ejaculations; and Peter supplied the deficiency of reason by loud and frequent appeals to Christ and His mother, to the saints and angels of paradise, with whom he had personally conversed. The most perfect orator of Athens might have envied the success of his eloquence; the rustic enthusiast inspired the passions which he felt, and Christendom expected with impatience the counsels and decrees of the supreme pontiff.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58, p. 538.

1756. EARNESTNESS vs. Humor. Abraham Lincoln. A radical member of . . . Congress . . . during the dark days of 1862 . . . called upon the President. Mr. Lincoln commenced telling some trifling incident, which the Congressman was in no mood to hear. He rose to his feet, and said, "Mr. President, I did not come here this morning to hear stories; it is too serious a time." Instantly the smile disappeared from Mr. Lincoln's face, who exclaimed, "A—, sit down! I respect you as an earnest and sincere man. You cannot be more anxious than I am constantly, and I say to you now, that were it not for this occasional vent, I should die!"—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 726.

1757. EARNESTNESS, Success by. Wooden Sword. Abd-el-Mourad, a dervish and a favorite warrior of Orkhan, made a vow never to employ in battle but a sabre made of the wood of the plane-tree. The vigor of his arm gave, it is said, to this weapon the weight and the edge of one of iron. Orkhan, at the death of Abd-el-Mourad, caused the weapon to be treasured in the archives of the empire.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 220.

1758. EARTHQUAKE, Destructive. Ancient. In the second year of the reign of Valentinian and Valens, on the morning of the twenty-first day of July, the greatest part of the Roman world was shaken by a violent and destructive earthquake. The impression was communicated to the waters; the shores of the Mediterranean were left dry by the sudden retreat of the sea; great quantities of fish were caught with the hand; large vessels were stranded on the mud; and a curious spectator amused his eye, or rather his fancy, by contemplating the various appearance of valleys and mountains, which had never, since the formation of the globe, been exposed to the sun. But the tide soon returned, with the weight of an immense and irresistible deluge, which was severely felt on the coasts of Sicily, of Dalmatia, of Greece, and of Egypt; large boats were transported and lodged on the roofs of houses, or at the distance of two miles from the shore; the people, with their habitations, were swept away by the waters; and the city of Alexandria annually commemorated the fatal day on which fifty thousand persons had lost their lives in the inundation.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26.

1759. EARTHQUAKES, Period of. Ancient. [The historian observes] that this fever of the earth raged with uncommon violence during the reign of Justinian. Each year is marked by the repetition of earthquakes, of such duration that Constantinople has been shaken above forty days; of such extent, that the shock has been communicated to the whole surface of the globe, or at least of the Roman empire. An impulsive or vibratory motion was felt; enormous chasms were opened, huge and heavy bodies were discharged into the air, the sea alternately advanced and retreated beyond its ordinary bounds, and a mountain was torn from Libanus and cast into the waves, where it protected, as a mole, the new harbor of Botrys in Phœnicia. The stroke that agitates an ant-hill may crush the insect-myriads in the dust; yet truth must extort confession that man has industriously labored for his own destruction. The institution of great cities, which include a nation within the limits of a wall, almost realizes the wish of Caligula, that the Roman people had but one neck. Two hundred and fifty thousand persons are said to have perished in the earthquake of Antioch, whose domestic multitudes were swelled by the conflux of strangers to the festival of the Ascension.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 43.

1760. EASE, Irreligious. Samuel Johnson. In his "Meditations" he thus accuses himself: "Good Friday, April 20, 1764. I have made no reformation; I have lived totally useless, more sensual in thought, and more addicted to wine and meat." And next morning he thus feelingly complains: "My indolence, since my last reception of the sacrament, has sunk into grosser sluggishness, and my dissipation spread into wilder negligence. My thoughts have been clouded with sensuality; and except that from the beginning of this year I have, in some measure, forborne excess of strong drink, my appetites have predominated over my reason. A kind of strange oblivion has overspread me, so that I know not what has become of the last year; and perceive that incidents and intelligence pass over me without leaving any impression." He then solemnly says: "This is not the life to which heaven is promised;" and he earnestly resolves an amendment.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 134.

1761. EATING, Custom in. Manchester. The social condition of Manchester at the end of the seventeenth century was very primitive. Its manufactures were carried on by small masters, who had apprentices residing in their houses. The master and his young men breakfasted together upon "water pottage boiled thick," and a bowl of milk stood upon the table, into which all dipped their spoons.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 2, p. 24.

1762. ———. Roman. The custom of reclining on couches came not into use till the end of the sixth century, and for some time after it was adopted by the men the Roman ladies, from motives of decency, continued to sit upright at table; but these scruples were soon removed, and all promiscuously adopted the recumbent posture, except the youth who had not yet attained the age of putting on the manly robe. They sat in a respectful posture at the bottom of the couch. These couches were ranged along three sides of a square table, which was then called triclinium, as was likewise the chamber itself in which they supped. The fourth side of the table remained open for the servants to place and remove the dishes. Above was a large canopy of cloth suspended by the corners, to prevent the company being incommoded with dust. It was this custom that enables Horace to introduce a ludicrous accident, which he describes as occurring at a supper given by the niggardly but ostentatious Nasidienus to Mæcenas, and some other courtiers. While the landlord is enlarging on the praises of a favorite dish, and discussing the merits of the component ingredients of the sauce, the canopy falls down and involves everything—host, guest, supper and dishes—in a cloud of dust and darkness.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 4.

1763. ECONOMY, Habit of. Treasure. For their relief [the people], as often as they had suffered by natural or hostile calamities, he was impatient to remit the arrears of the past, or the demands of future taxes; he sternly rejected the servile offerings of his ministers, which were compensated by tenfold oppression; and the wise and equitable laws of Tiberius excited the praise and regret of succeeding times. Constantinople believed that the emperor had discovered a treasure; but his genuine treasure consisted in the practice of liberal economy, and the contempt of all vain and superfluous expense. The Romans of the East would have been happy, if the best gift of Heaven, a patriot king, had been confirmed as a proper and permanent blessing. [Tiberius was emperor of the Eastern Empire.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 45, p. 404.

1764. ECONOMY misrepresented. Meanness. [It is common to impute blame to Elizabeth for parsimony, as she was not accustomed to spend her revenues for her own luxurious gratification. She used them to pay the crown debt of four millions, and to repair her decayed navy. She consumed little or nothing in her pleasures.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 15, p. 238.

1765. ECONOMY, National. Frederick the Great. [Every seventh man in the vigor of life was a soldier—army expenses enormous.] In order that it might not be utterly ruinous, it was necessary that every other expense should be cut down to the lowest possible point. Accordingly, Frederick, though his dominions bordered on the sea, had no navy. He neither had nor wished to have colonies. His judges, his fiscal officers, were meanly paid. His ministers at foreign courts walked on foot, or drove shabby old carriages till the axletrees gave way. Even to his highest diplomatic agents, who resided at London and Paris, he allowed less than £1000 sterling a year. The royal household was managed with a frugality unusual in the establishments of opulent subjects—unexampled in any other palace. The king loved good eating and drinking, and during a great part of his life took pleasure in seeing his table surrounded by guests; yet the whole charge of his kitchen was brought within the sum of £2000 sterling a year. He examined every extraordinary item with a care which might be thought to suit the mistress of a boarding-house better than a great prince.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 46.

1766. ECONOMY and Thrift. Imperial. [John Ducas Vataces, ruler of the Eastern Empire in 1222, rescued the provinces from national and foreign usurpers.] The calamities of the times had wasted the numbers and the substance of the Greeks; the motives and the means of agriculture were extirpated; and the most fertile lands were left without cultivation or inhabitants. A portion of this vacant property was occupied and improved by the command, and for the benefit, of the emperor; a powerful hand and a vigilant eye supplied and surpassed, by a skilful management, the minute diligence of a private farmer; the royal domain became the garden and granary of Asia; and without impoverishing the people, the sovereign acquired a fund of innocent and productive wealth. According to the nature of the soil, his lands were sown with corn or planted with vines; the pastures were filled with horses and oxen, with sheep and hogs; and when Vataces presented to the empress a crown of diamonds and pearls, he informed her, with a smile, that this precious ornament arose from the sale of the eggs of his innumerable poultry. The produce of his domain was applied to the maintenance of his palace and hospitals, the calls of dignity and benevolence; the lesson was still more useful than the revenue; the plough was restored to its ancient security and honor; and the nobles were taught to seek a sure and independent revenue from their estates, instead of adorning their splendid beggary by the oppression of the people, or (what is almost the same) by the favors of the court.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 42.

1767. ECONOMY, Wise. William Penn. A.D. 1682. [When about to leave his family for America,] his wife, who was the love of his youth, was reminded of his impoverishment because of his public spirit, and recommended economy. "Live low and sparingly till my debts be paid." Yet for his children he adds: "Let their learning be liberal; spare no cost, for by such parsimony all is lost that is saved."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 16.

1768. ECSTASY, Religious. Bunyan. The suffering was over now, and he felt that it had been infinitely beneficial to him. He understood better the glory of God and of His Son. The Scriptures had opened their secrets to him, and he had seen them to be in very truth the keys of the kingdom of heaven. Never so clearly as after this "temptation" had he perceived "the heights of grace and love and mercy." Two or three times "he had such strange apprehensions of the grace of God as had amazed him." The impression was so overpowering, that if it had continued long "it would have rendered him incapable for business."—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 4.

1769. EDIFICE, Monumental. Pericles. The orators of Thucydides' party raised a clamor against Pericles, asserting that he wasted the public treasure, and brought the revenue to nothing. Pericles, in his defence, asked the people in full assembly whether they thought he had expended too much. Upon their answering in the affirmative, "Then be it," said he, "charged to my account, not yours; only let the new edifice be inscribed with my name, not that of the people of Athens." Whether it was that they admired the greatness of his spirit, or were ambitious to share the glory of such magnificent works, they cried out that he might spend as much as he pleased of the public treasure, without sparing it in the least.—PLUTARCH'S PERICLES.

1770. EDUCATION, Ancient. Persians. Yet amid this wantonness of Asiatic magnificence, the care which those princes bestowed on the education of their children merited the highest praise. They were, almost as soon as born, removed from the palace, and committed to the charge of eunuchs of approved fidelity and discretion. At seven years of age they learned the exercise of riding, and went daily to the chase, to inure them betimes to fatigue and intrepidity. At the age of fourteen they were put under the care of four preceptors eminently distinguished by their wisdom and abilities. The first opened to them the doctrines of the magi; the second impressed them with a veneration for truth; the third exercised them in the habits of fortitude and magnanimity; and the fourth inculcated the most difficult of all lessons, especially to the great—the perfect command and government of their passions.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 11.

1771. — — — Popular. The Persians in general, above every other nation, were noted for their extreme attention to the education of youth. Before the age of five the children were exclusively under the tuition of the mother and assistant females. After that age they were committed to the charge of the magi, an order of men whose proper function was that of priests or ministers of the national religion, but who spent their lives in the pursuit of wisdom and the practice of the strictest morality. By their precepts and their example, the Persian youth were early trained to virtue and good morals. They were taught the most sacred regard to truth, the highest veneration for their parents and superiors, the most perfect submission to the laws of their country, and respect for its magistrates. Nor was the culture of the body neglected. The youth were trained to every manly exercise—a preparative to their admission into the body of the king's guards, in which they were enrolled at the age of seventeen. The general system of education among the Persians is thus laconically described by Herodotus: "From the age of five to that of twenty they teach their children three things alone—to manage a horse, to use the bow with dexterity, and to speak truth."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 11.

1772. EDUCATION, Anti-Classical. Frederick the Great. The Latin was positively interdicted. "My son," his Majesty wrote, "shall not learn Latin; and, more than that, I will not suffer anybody even to mention such a thing to me." One of the preceptors ventured to read the Golden Bull in the original with the Prince Royal. Frederick William entered the room, and broke out in his usual kingly style. "Rascal, what are you at there?" "Please, your Majesty," answered the preceptor, "I was explaining the Golden Bull to his royal Highness." "I'll Golden Bull you, you rascal," roared the majesty of Prussia. Up went the king's cane, away ran the terrified instructor, and Frederick's classical education was ended.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 16.

1773. EDUCATION, Apportionment for. Massachusetts Colony. The governor assigned for the support of the [Harvard] college the profits of the ferry over the Charles River, and the people were called upon to make an annual contribution to it, of at least one peck of corn! For many, many years, however, the college was a heavy charge upon the people, and the tutors and president were most scantily and precariously maintained. . . . Nine years after their winter march through the wilderness the Connecticut colonists began to contribute a little toward the support of Harvard College, each family being requested by the legislature to give one peck of wheat per annum.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., pp. 584, 591.

1774. EDUCATION appreciated. Ancient Romans. Plutarch, in his comparison between Numa and Lycurgus, has bestowed a severe censure on the Roman lawgiver, for his neglecting to establish a system, or to institute any fixed rules for the education of the Roman youth. But the truth is, that although the laws prescribed no such system, or general plan of discipline, like those of Sparta, yet there never existed a people who bestowed more attention on the education of their youth. In the dialogue, "De Oratoribus," attributed by some authors to Tacitus, by others to Quintilian, there is a fine passage which shows in a remarkable manner that extreme care bestowed, even in the earliest infancy, to form the manners and disposition of the Roman children. From this passage we learn, that in the earlier ages of the Roman commonwealth, such was that anxious care bestowed on their children by the Roman matrons—such that jealousy of their receiving any of their earliest impressions from slaves or domestics—that they not only educated their own children, but accounted it an honorable employment to superintend and assist in educating the children of their relations.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 3.

1775. ———. Richard Arkwright. [Richard Arkwright, the inventor of the spinning-machine, was, after a severe struggle, raised from poverty to wealth.] As he rose into rank and importance, he felt the necessity of correcting the defects of his early education; and after his fiftieth year he applied two hours of each day, snatched from sleep, to improve himself in grammar, orthography, and writing.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 3, p. 49.

1776. ———. Sir William Jones. There was a little boy who some years back entered Harrow School, and was put into a class beyond his years, wherein all the other boys had the advantage of previous instruction. His master used to reprove his dulness, but all his efforts could not raise him from the lowest place in the form. But the boy, nothing daunted, procured the grammar and other elementary books which the others had previously studied; he devoted the hours of play, and not a few of the hours of sleep, to the mastery of these, till, in a few weeks, he began gradually to rise, and it was not long before he shot far ahead of his companions, and became not only the leader of his class but the pride of Harrow. The statue of that boy, who thus zealously began his career, is in St Paul's Cathedral; for he lived to be the greatest Oriental scholar in modern Europe.

1777. ———. Robert Stephenson's Father. When Robert was a little boy, I saw how deficient I was in education, and I made up my mind that he should not labor under the same defect, but that I would put him to a good school, and give him a liberal training. I was, however, a poor man. . . . I betook myself to mending my neighbors' clocks.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 56.

1778. EDUCATION, Athletic. Roman. The exercises of the body were . . . particularly attended to. Wrestling, running, boxing, swimming, using the bow and javelin, managing the horse, and, in short, whatever might harden the body and increase its strength and activity, were all reckoned necessary parts of education.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 3.

1779. EDUCATION, Beginning in. Colony of Massachusetts. It was ever the custom, and it soon became a law, in Puritan New England, that "none of the brethren should suffer so much barbarism in their families as not to teach their children and apprentices so much learning as may enable them perfectly to read the English tongue."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 10.

1780. EDUCATION, Christian. England, 1510. John Colet . . . seized the opportunity to commence the work of educational reform by devoting, in 1510, his private fortune to the foundation of a grammar school beside St. Paul's. The bent of its founder's mind was shown by the image of the child Jesus over the master's chair, with the words "Hear ye Him" graven beneath it. "Lift up your little white hands for me," wrote the dean to his scholars in words which prove the tenderness that lay beneath the stern outer seeming of a man—"for me which prayeth for you to God." All the educational designs of the reformers were carried out in the new foundation. The old methods of instruction were superseded by fresh grammars composed by Erasmus and other scholars for its use. Lily, an Oxford student who had studied Greek in the East, was placed at its head. The injunctions of the founder aimed at the union of rational religion with sound learning, at the exclusion of the scholastic logic, and at the steady diffusion of the two classical literatures.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 509.

1781. EDUCATION, Civilization by. Ancient Germans. The Germans, in the age of Tacitus, were unacquainted with the use of letters; and the use of letters is the principal circumstance that distinguishes a civilized people from a herd of savages incapable of knowledge or reflection. Without that artificial help, the human memory soon dissipates or corrupts the ideas intrusted to her charge; and the nobler faculties of the mind, no longer supplied with models or with materials, gradually forget their powers; the judgment becomes feeble and lethargic, the imagination languid or irregular. Fully to apprehend this important truth let us attempt, in an improved society, to calculate the immense distance between the man of learning and the illiterate peasant. The former, by reading and reflection, multiplies his own experience, and lives in distant ages and remote countries; while the latter, rooted to a single spot, and confined to a few years of existence, surpasses but very little his fellow-laborer, the ox, in the exercise of his mental faculties. The same, and even a greater difference, will be found between nations than between individuals; and we may safely pronounce without some species of writing, no people . . . has ever made any considerable progress in the abstract sciences, or ever possessed in any tolerable degree of perfection the useful and agreeable arts of life.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 258.

1782. EDUCATION, Collegiate. Southey. Of all the months of his life, those passed at Oxford, Southey declared, were the most unprofitable. "All I learnt was a little swimming . . . and a little boating. . . . I never remember to have dreamt of Oxford—a sure proof how little it entered into my moral being; of school, on the contrary, I dream perpetually." The miscellaneous society of workers, idlers, dunces, bucks, men of muscle and men of money, did not please him; he lacked what Wordsworth calls "the congregating temper that pervades our unripe years."—DOWDEN'S SOUTHEY, ch. 2.

1783. EDUCATION, Contributions for. Yale College. "I give these books for the founding of a college in this colony." Such were the words of ten ministers who, in the year 1700, assembled at the village of Branford, a few miles east of New Haven. Each of the worthy fathers deposited a few books on the table around which they were sitting; such was the founding of Yale College. . . . One of the most liberal patrons was Elihu Yale.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 21, p. 192.

1784. EDUCATION, Deficiency in. George Washington. The son of a widow . . . born . . . beneath the roof of a Westmoreland farmer; almost from infancy his lot had been the lot of an orphan. No academy had welcomed him to its shades, no college crowned him with its honors; to read, to write, to cipher—these had been his degrees in knowledge.—BANCROFT'S U. S., ch. 24, vol. 3.

1785. EDUCATION, Deprived of. Peter Cooper, LL.D. From his delicacy of constitution chiefly, he was never able to endure the confinement of school; in fact, he never attended school more than one year, and then only a portion of the time for a part of the day. Owing to this cause, more than to the poverty of his father, he was deprived of all school training. But this turned out in after years a blessing, although he could never so regard it; for one of the deepest influences that shaped his character and acts was the high estimate he put upon knowledge, which he was not able to obtain in his boyhood, and to this fact we owe the existence of the Cooper Institute. He often said to his friends that he was determined, as far as in him lay, to save as many young people as he could from what he called his misfortune—the lack of early education. This is one of the instances in which some of the greatest gifts of fortune turn out to have been blessings in disguise . . . he persisted to the last in regarding “the lack of schooling” as the great misfortune of his life. “If I could have had such advantages as we can give the poorest boy now, how much more could I have done!” These words often fell from his lips.—LESTER'S LIFE OF PETER COOPER, p. 11.

1786. EDUCATION, Devoted to. Confucius. Returning to his native country after his journey in search of wisdom, he entered seriously upon the great work of his life, which was to record all that he had himself learned and thought, as well as all which he considered worthy of preservation in the works of the ancients. His object was to gather and to arrange the whole wisdom of his country so that it could be conveniently communicated to his people and their descendants forever. To this labor he devoted all the leisure of the rest of his life, and he produced a series of works upon which the soul of China has ever since subsisted, and which do really contain a very pure and exalted system of morals.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 411.

1787. EDUCATION difficult. Abraham Lincoln. During the twelve years that the family remained in Indiana, Abraham's father encouraged him to improve all the opportunities offered for mental development. How scanty these privileges were may be inferred from the fact that the entire number of days that he was able to attend school hardly exceeded one year.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 1, p. 21.

1788. ——. George Washington. At eleven years old left an orphan to the care of

. . . an unlettered mother, he grew up without learning. Of arithmetic and geometry he acquired just knowledge enough to be able to practise measuring land; but all his instruction at school taught him not so much as the orthography or rules of grammar of his own tongue. His culture was altogether his own work, and he was in the strictest sense a self-made man; yet from his early life he never seemed uneducated.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 37.

1789. EDUCATION disparaged. Abraham Lincoln. [His mother] had instructed him in the rudiments of writing, and Mr. Lincoln, in spite of the disparaging remarks of his neighbors, who regarded the accomplishment as entirely unnecessary, encouraged his son to persevere. . . . One of the very first efforts of his faltering pen was writing a letter to an old friend of his mother's, a travelling preacher, urging him to come and deliver a sermon over her grave. . . . Abraham's pen thereafter found frequent employment in writing letters for the same neighbors who had before pretended to esteem lightly the accomplishment.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 1, p. 21.

1790. Education, Distinction by. Relative. Our estimate of personal merit is relative to the common faculties of mankind. The aspiring efforts of genius or virtue, either in active or speculative life, are measured not so much by their real elevation as by the height to which they ascend above the level of their age or country; and the same stature which in a people of giants would pass unnoticed must appear conspicuous in a race of pygmies. Leonidas and his three hundred companions devoted their lives at Thermopylæ; but the education of the infant, the boy, and the man had prepared and almost insured this memorable sacrifice; and each Spartan would approve rather than admire an act of duty of which himself and eight thousand of his fellow-citizens were equally capable.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 42, p. 190.

1791. EDUCATION, Donations to. Harvard College. Some of the early donations were very simple and curious. A clergyman, for example, having neither money nor lands to bestow, gave the college two cows, valued at £9. A gentleman presented nine shillings' worth of cotton cloth. Another contributed forty shillings a year for ten years; and a farmer, who lived in Hartford, bequeathed £100 to be paid in corn and meal, the college to defray the cost of transportation. One of the Bahama Islands, for which at a time of famine collections had been made in New England, now in its turn made a collection for the college, “out of their poverty,” as they said, and sent £124.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 583.

1792. EDUCATION, End of. Cooper Institute. The corner-stone of the Union was laid. Within that stone was placed a scroll which bore this inscription: “The great object that I desire to accomplish by the erection of this institution, is to open the avenues of scientific knowledge to the youth of our city and country, and so unfold the volume of nature, that the young may see the beauties of creation, enjoy its blessings, and learn to love the Author from whom cometh every good and perfect gift.”—LESTER'S LIFE OF PETER COOPER, p. 34.

1793. EDUCATION, Errors in. Luther's. In Mansfield he received his first instruction, being sent to school at a very early age. . . . The discipline was so severe that Luther never forgot it. He tells of severe tortures with declensions and conjugations. "The schoolmasters in my days," says he, "were tyrants and executioners; the schools were jails and hells! And in spite of fear and misery, floggings and tremblings, nothing was learned. The young people were treated altogether too severely, so that they might well have been called martyrs. Time was wasted over many useless things, and thus many an able mind was ruined." He himself was innocently lashed fifteen times in the course of a single morning because he did not know what had not been taught him.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 2, p. 21.

1794. EDUCATION, General. New England. In matters of education New England took the lead. Her system of free schools extended everywhere, from the Hudson to the Penobscot. Every village furnished the facilities for acquiring knowledge. So complete and universal were the means of acquiring instruction, that in the times preceding the Revolution there was not to be found in all New England an adult, born in the country, who could not read and write. Splendid achievement of Puritanism!—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 36, p. 282.

1795. EDUCATION guarded. Books. [Ordinances for the daily conduct of the Prince of Wales were drawn up by his father, just before his death,] which prescribed his morning attendance at mass, his occupation "at his school," his meals, and his sports. No man is to sit at his board but such as Earl Rivers shall allow; and at this hour of meat it is ordered "that there be read before him noble stories, as behooveth a prince to understand; and that the communication at all times, in his presence, be of virtue, honor, cunning [knowledge], wisdom, and deeds of worship, and of nothing that shall move him to vice." . . . [The prince was twelve years old at the time of his father's death, in 1483.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 11, p. 176.

1796. EDUCATION, Helps to. Robert Burns. He appears not only as a true British poet, but as one of the most considerable British men of the eighteenth century. Let it not be objected that he did little; he did much, if we consider where and how. If the work performed was small, we must remember that he had his very materials to discover; for the metal he worked in lay hid under the desert, where no eye but his had guessed its existence; and we may almost say, that with his own hand he had to construct the tools for fashioning it. For he found himself in deepest obscurity, without help, without instruction, without models, or with models only of the meanest sort. An educated man stands, as it were, in the midst of a boundless arsenal and magazine, filled with all the weapons and engines which man's skill has been able to devise from the earliest time; and he works, accordingly, with a strength borrowed from all past ages. How different is his state who stands on the outside of that storehouse, and feels that its gates must be stormed, or remain forever shut against him? His means are the commonest and rudest; the mere work done is no measure of his strength. A dwarf behind his steam-engine may remove mountains; but no dwarf will hew them down with the pickaxe; and he must be a Titan that hurls them abroad with his arms.—CARLYLE'S BURNS, p. 15.

1797. EDUCATION, Higher Life by. Aristotle. Those who have not forgotten their Greek Reader remember the list of Aristotle's wise sayings given in that work. Being asked in what the educated differ from the uneducated, he said, "As the living differ from the dead."—CYC. OF BIOG., p. 558.

1798. EDUCATION, Imperfect. Washington. Washington . . . before he became a public man was a bad speller. People were not so particular then in such matters as they are now, and, besides, there really was no settled system of spelling a hundred years ago. When the general wrote for a "rheam of paper," a beaver "hatt," a suit of "cloaths," and a pair of "sattin shoes," there was no Webster unabridged to keep people's spelling within bounds.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 9.

1799. EDUCATION imperilled. Reign of James II. Soon after the acquittal of the bishops, the venerable Ormond, the most illustrious of the cavaliers of the great civil war, sank under his infirmities. The intelligence of his death was conveyed with speed to Oxford. Instantly the university, of which he had long been chancellor, met to name a successor. One party was for the eloquent and accomplished Halifax; another for the grave and orthodox Nottingham. Some mentioned the Earl of Abingdon, who resided near them, and had recently been turned out of the lieutenancy of the county for refusing to join with the king against the established religion. But the majority, consisting of a hundred and eighty graduates, voted for the young Duke of Ormond, grandson of their late head, and son of the gallant Ossory. The speed with which they came to this resolution was caused by their apprehension that, if there were a delay even of a day, the king would attempt to force on them some chief who would betray their rights. The apprehension was reasonable; for only two hours after they had separated came a mandate from Whitehall requiring them to choose Jeffreys [the infamous and brutal chief-justice]. Happily, the election of young Ormond was already complete and irrevocable.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 389.

1800. EDUCATION, Indecision in. Samuel Johnson. We talked of the education of children; and I asked him what he thought was best to teach them first. JOHNSON: "Sir, it is no matter what you teach them first, any more than what leg you shall put into your breeches first. Sir, you may stand disputing which is best to put in first, but in the mean time your breach is bare. Sir, while you are considering which of two things you should teach your child first, another boy has learnt them both."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 125.

1801. EDUCATION, Independent. Gibbon. I spent fourteen months at Magdalen College; they proved the most idle and unprofitable of my whole life. . . . Oxford and Cambridge for nearly a century have been turning out crowds of thorough-paced scholars of the orthodox pattern. It is odd that the two greatest historians who have been scholars as well—Gibbon and Grote—were not university-bred men. . . . As if to prove by experiment where the fault lay, in "the school or the scholar," Gibbon had no sooner left Oxford for the long vacation than his taste for study returned, and, not content with reading, he attempted original composition. —MORRISON'S GIBBON, ch. 1.

1802. EDUCATION vs. Legislation. Lycurgus. [Lycurgus, the lawgiver,] resolved the whole business of legislation into the bringing up of youth. And this, as we have observed, was the reason why one of his ordinances forbade them to have any written laws. —PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

1803. EDUCATION vs. Licentiousness. Reign of Charles II. Ladies highly born, highly bred, and naturally quick-witted, were unable to write a line in their mother-tongue without solecisms and faults of spelling such as a charity girl would now be ashamed to commit. . . . The explanation may easily be found. Extravagant licentiousness, the natural effect of extravagant austerity, was now the mode; and licentiousness had produced its ordinary effect, the moral and intellectual degradation of women. To their personal beauty it was the fashion to pay rude and impudent homage. But the admiration and desire which they inspired were seldom mingled with respect, with affection, or with any chivalrous sentiment. The qualities which fit them to be companions, advisers, confidential friends, rather repelled than attracted the libertines of Whitehall. In that court a maid of honor who dressed in such a manner as to do full justice to a white bosom, who ogled significantly, who danced voluptuously, who excelled in pert repartee, who was not ashamed to romp with lords of the bed-chamber and captains of the guards, to sing sly verses, with sly expression, or to put on a page's dress for a frolic, was more likely to be followed and admired, more likely to be honored with royal attentions, more likely to win a rich and noble husband than Jane Grey or Lucy Hutchinson would have been. . . . The standard of female attainments was necessarily low, and it was more dangerous to be above that standard than to be beneath it. —MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 366.

1804. EDUCATION, Ministerial. Benevolent. Lady Huntingdon opened a school in a dilapidated castle of the twelfth century, at Trevecca, for the education of young men for the ministry, who, without regard to their denominational preference, were welcomed, and provided, at the countess's expense, with board, tuition, and a yearly suit of clothes. —STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 170.

1805. EDUCATION misdirected. Accomplishments. [The children of the nobility in the beginning of the eighteenth century were] taught dancing, fencing, and riding. It looks like a satire when Burnet recommends that the sons of the nobility should be instructed in geography and history. —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 6, p. 57.

1806. EDUCATION, Necessary. Alfred the Great. This excellent prince wisely considered the cultivation of letters as the most effectual means of thoroughly eradicating barbarous dispositions. The ravages of the Danes had totally extinguished any small sparks of learning, by the dispersion of the monks, and the burning their monasteries and libraries. To repair these misfortunes, Alfred, like Charlemagne, invited learned men from all quarters of Europe to reside in his dominions. He established schools, and enjoined every freeholder possessed of two ploughs to send his children there for instruction. He is said to have founded, or, at least, to have liberally endowed the illustrious seminary afterward known as the University of Oxford. —TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 5.

1807. EDUCATION neglected. Ireland. During the vain struggle which two generations of Milesian princes maintained against the Tudors, religious enthusiasm and national enthusiasm became inseparably blended in the minds of the vanquished race. The new feud of Protestant and papist inflamed the old feud of Saxon and Celt. The English conquerors, meanwhile, neglected all legitimate means of conversion. No pains were taken to provide the conquered nation with instructors capable of making themselves understood. No translation of the Bible was put forth in the Erse language. The government contented itself with setting up a vast hierarchy of Protestant archbishops, bishops, and rectors, who did nothing, and who, for doing nothing, were paid out of the spoils of a Church loved and revered by the great body of the people. —MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 64.

1808. — — — Reign of Charles II. Many lords of manors had received an education differing little from that of their menial servants. The heir of an estate often passed his boyhood and youth at the seat of his family, with no better tutors than grooms and gamekeepers, and scarce attained learning enough to sign his name to a mittimus. If he went to school and to college, he generally returned before he was twenty to the seclusion of the old hall, and there, unless his mind was very happily constituted by nature, soon forgot his academical pursuits in rural business and pleasures. His chief serious employment was the care of his property. He examined samples of grain, handled pigs, and on market days made bargains over a tankard with drovers and hop-merchants. His chief pleasures were commonly derived from field-sports and from an unrefined sensuality. —MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 298.

1809. — — — Sam Houston. What were the means of education offered to this Virginia boy. We have learned that he never could get into a schoolhouse till he was eight years old, nor that he ever accomplished much, in a literary way, after he did enter. Virginia, which has never become very famous for her common schools, had still less to boast of eighty years ago. The State made little or no provision, by law, for the education of its children, and each neighborhood was obliged to take care of its rising population. —LESTER'S HOUSTON, p. 13.

1810. EDUCATION opposed. Colonial Governor of Virginia, 1671. "The ministers," continued Sir William [Berkeley,] " . . . should pray oftener and preach less. But I thank God there are no free schools nor printing; and I hope we shall not have these hundred years; for learning has brought disobedience and heresy and sects into the world, and printing has divulged them, and libels against the best government. God keep us from both!"—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 14.

1811. EDUCATION, Patron of. *Luther's. Martin Luther was obliged to help himself, since his parents could not provide a complete support. But good-fortune awaited him. For, because of his singing and heartfelt praying, he won the favor of Ursula Cotta, who invited him to a seat at her table. She was of the family of Schalbe, and the wife of Conrad Cotta, one of the foremost citizens of the town.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 2, p. 23.

1812. EDUCATION, Philanthropic. *Smithsonian Institute. [In 1824] an eminent English chemist and philanthropist, named James Smithson, . . . died at Genoa, bequeathing, on certain conditions, a large sum of money to the United States. In the fall of 1838, by the death of Smithson's nephew, the proceeds of the estate, amounting to $515,000, were secured by the agent of the national government and deposited in the mint. It had been provided in the will that the bequest should be used for the establishment at Washington of an institution for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 56, p. 460.

1813. EDUCATION, Political. *Alexander. Alexander was in the twentieth year of his age when he succeeded, by the death of Philip, to the throne of Macedonia. This prince possessed all the military abilities of his father, inherited a soul more truly noble, and an ambition yet more unbounded. . . . Under the tutelage of the philosopher Aristotle, he received not only a taste for learning and the sciences, but those excellent lessons of politics of which that great teacher was qualified, beyond all his contemporaries, to instruct him.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4.

1814. EDUCATION, Power of. *Reign of Charles II. In Ireland, at present, a peer holds a far higher station in society than a Roman Catholic priest; yet there are in Munster and Connaught few counties where a combination of priests would not carry an election against a combination of peers. In the seventeenth century the pulpit was to a large portion of the population what the periodical press now is. Scarce any of the clowns who came to the parish church ever saw a gazette or a political pamphlet. Ill informed as their spiritual pastor might be, he was yet better informed than themselves; he had every week an opportunity of haranguing them; and his harangues were never answered. At every important conjecture, invectives against the Whigs and exhortations to obey the Lord's anointed resounded at once from many thousands of pulpits; and the effect was formidable indeed. Of all the causes which, after the dissolution of the Oxford Parliament, produced the violent reaction against the Exclusionists, the most potent seems to have been the oratory of the country clergy.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 311.

1815. EDUCATION, Precocity in. *Samuel Johnson. I hate by-roads in education. Education is as well known, and has long been as well known, as ever it can be. Endeavoring to make children prematurely wise is useless labor. Suppose they have more knowledge at five or six years old than other children, what use can be made of it? It will be lost before it is wanted, and the waste of so much time and labor of the teacher can never be repaid. Too much is expected from precocity, and too little performed.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 266.

1816. EDUCATION prohibited. *Ireland. A.D. 1763. No Protestant in Ireland might instruct a papist. Papists could not supply their want by academies and schools of their own; for a Catholic to teach, even in a private family or as usher to a Protestant, was a felony, punishable by imprisonment, exile, or death. Thus papists were excluded from all opportunity of education at home. . . . By a statute of King William, to be educated in any foreign Catholic school was an "unalterable and perpetual outlawry." The child sent abroad for education, no matter of how tender an age, . . . could never sue in law or equity, or be guardian, executor, or administrator, or receive any legacy or deed of gift; he forfeited all his goods and chattels, and forfeited for his life all his lands. Whoever sent him abroad . . . or assisted him with money . . . incurred the same liabilities and penalties. The Crown divided the forfeiture with the informer.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 4.

1817. EDUCATION, Public. *Spartan. Among the principal objects of the institutions of Lycurgus, the education of the youth of the republic was that on which the legislator had bestowed the most particular attention. Children, after they had attained the age of seven, were no longer the charge of their parents, but of the State. Before that period they were taught at home the great lessons of obedience and frugality. Afterward, under public masters. . . . They were taught to despise equally danger and pain. To shrink under the stroke of punishment was a sufficient reason for having that punishment redoubled. Their very sports and amusements were such as are fitted to promote a strength of constitution and vigor and agility of body. The athletic exercises were prescribed alike for both sexes, as the bodily vigor of the mother is essential to that of her offspring. To run, to swim, to wrestle, to hunt, were the constant exercise of the youth. With regard to the culture of the mind, the Spartan discipline admitted none of those studies which tend to refine or embellish the understanding. But the duties of religion, the inviolable bond of a promise, the sacred obligation of an oath, the respect due to parents, the reverence for old age, the strictest obedience to the laws, and, above all, the love of their country, the noble flame of patriotism, were early and assiduously inculcated.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 9.

1818. EDUCATION, Religious. *Napoleon I. Though not established in the belief that Christianity was of divine origin, he ever cherished a profound reverence for the religion of the Bible. . . . When the schedule of study for Madame Campan's female school was presented to him, he found as one regulation, "The young ladies shall attend prayers twice a week." He immediately erased with his pen the words "twice a week," and substituted "Every day."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 32.

1819. ——. Wesley's. [The home in which John Wesley was reared was a model Christian household, a sanctuary of domestic and Christian virtues.] Ten of the children attained adult years; all these became devoted Christians, and every one of them "died in the Lord."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 58.

1820. EDUCATION, Sacrifices for, Mother's. "My father," thus narrates Dr. Martin Luther, "was a poor miner. My mother gathered wood and carried it home on her back, in order that her children might be educated. Both toiled slavishly for our sakes. In these days people would not do so." But after a little while they reached more comfortable circumstances.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 2, p. 20.

1821. EDUCATION and the State, Alexander. [After the conquest of Persia Alexander the Great accommodated himself] to the manners of the Asiatics, and at the same time persuaded them to adopt some of the Macedonian fashions; for, by a mixture of both, he thought a union might be promoted much better than by force, and his authority maintained when he was at a distance. For the same reason he elected thirty thousand boys, and gave them masters to instruct them in the Grecian literature, as well as to train them to arms in the Macedonian manner.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

1822. EDUCATION, State, Spartan. The Spartan children were not . . . under tutors purchased or hired with money, nor were the parents at liberty to educate them as they pleased; but as soon as they were seven years old Lycurgus ordered them to be enrolled in companies, where they were all kept under the same order and discipline, and had their exercises and recreations in common. He who showed the most conduct and courage among them was made captain of the company. The rest kept their eyes upon him, obeyed his orders, and bore with patience the punishment he inflicted; so that their whole education was an exercise of obedience. . . . As for learning, they had just what was absolutely necessary. All the rest of their education was calculated to make them subject to command, to endure labor, to fight and conquer. They added, therefore, to their discipline, as they advanced in age: cutting their hair very close, making them go barefoot, and play, for the most part, quite naked. At twelve years of age their under garment was taken away, and but one upper one a year allowed them. Hence they were necessarily dirty in their persons, and not indulged the great favor of baths and oils, except on some particular days of the year. They slept in companies, on beds made of the tops of reeds, which they gathered with their own hands, without knives, and brought from the banks of the Eurotas. In winter they were permitted to add a little thistle-down, as that seemed to have some warmth in it.—PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

1823. EDUCATION substituted, Bunyan. He had studied no great model of composition, with the exception—an important exception undoubtedly—of our noble translation of the Bible. His spelling was bad. He frequently transgressed the rules of grammar. Yet the native force of genius, and his experimental knowledge of all the religious passions, from despair to ecstasy, amply supplied in him the want of learning. His rude oratory roused and melted hearers who listened without interest to the labored discourses of great logicians and Hebraists.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 209.

1824. EDUCATION suspected, By Jesuits. The opposition of the Protestant mind of the latter years of the seventeenth century to the secular teaching of the Jesuits was natural and inevitable. No consideration of their ability as teachers could disarm the suspicion that they sought to make converts, under the guise of affording instruction.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 25, p. 410.

1825. EDUCATION, Tax for, Harvard University. Once at least every family in each of the colonies gave to the college at Cambridge twelve pence, or a peck of corn, or its value in unadulterated wampompeage, while the magistrates and wealthier men were profuse in their liberality.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 10.

1826. EDUCATION, Trials in, Samuel Johnson. His debts in college, though not great, were increasing; and his scanty remittances from Lichfield, which had all along been made with great difficulty, could be supplied no longer, his father having fallen into a state of insolvency. Compelled, therefore, by irresistible necessity, he left the college in autumn, 1731, without a degree, having been a member of it little more than three years.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 15.

1827. EDUCATION, Varied, Military. [The training of the Roman soldiers] comprehended whatever could add strength to the body, activity to the limbs, or grace to the motions. The soldiers were diligently instructed to march, to run, to leap, to swim, to carry heavy burdens, to handle every species of arms that was used either for offence or for defence, either in distant engagement or in a closer onset; to form a variety of evolutions; and to move to the sound of flutes in the Pyrrhic or martial dance.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1, p. 13.

1828. EDUCATION, Wealth for, Cooper Institute. Believing, as few, very few, rich men do, that his wealth was a sacred trust to be used for the benefit of his fellow-creatures, Mr. Cooper gave not merely of his money, but his life thenceforth, and anxious thought to the building up and maintenance of the Cooper Union for the advancement of science and art. . . . The advancement of science and art is well enough; but to teach, without one cent of charge, forty thousand men and women to earn a good living at skilled trades; to cultivate, without money and without price, the hands and brains of scores of thousands so that they may advance themselves in the world, and to exalt, mentally, morally, and physically, the poor and friendless, are far nobler objects. [Quoted from the New York Herald.]—LESTER'S LIFE OF PETER COOPER, p. 40.

1829. EFFEMINACY, Royal, Roman Emperor Elagabalus. As the attention of the new emperor was diverted by the most trifling amusements, he wasted many months in his luxurious progress from Syria to Italy, passed at Nicomedia his first winter after his victory, and deferred till the ensuing summer his triumphal entry into the capital. A faithful picture, however, which preceded his arrival, and was placed by his immediate order over the altar of Victory in the senate house, conveyed to the Romans the just but unworthy resemblance of his person and manners. He was drawn in his sacerdotal robes of silk and gold, after the loose, flowing fashion of the Medes and Phœnicians; his head was covered with a lofty tiara, his numerous collars and bracelets were adorned with gems of an inestimable value. His eyebrows were tinged with black, and his cheeks painted with an artificial red and white. The grave senators confessed with a sigh that, after having long experienced the stern tyranny of their own countrymen, Rome was at length humbled beneath the effeminate luxury of Oriental despotism.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6, p. 170.

1830. EFFORT, Misdirected. Gallienus. [The Emperor Gallienus was celebrated for his debauchery.] In every art that he attempted his lively genius enabled him to succeed; and as his genius was destitute of judgment, he attempted every art, except the important ones of war and government. He was a master of several curious but useless sciences, a ready orator, an elegant poet, a skilful gardener, an excellent cook, and most contemptible prince.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 10, p. 320.

1831. EFFORT, Useless. Frederick the Great. Dazzled by hope . . . Frederick went forth [against the Austrian commander], and attempted to storm his intrenchments on the heights of Colin. His brave battalions were repelled with disastrous loss. Left almost unattended, as he gazed at the spectacle, "Will you carry the battery alone?" demanded one of his lieutenants; on which the hero rode calmly toward the left wing, and ordered a retreat.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 12.

1832. EGOTISM of Caste. Byron. On leaving college, he again resided with his mother, whose furious temper age had not subdued. In her paroxysms of anger, she would throw at him the poker and tongs, and not unfrequently he had to fly from the house before her. At the age of nineteen his first volume of verses appeared, entitled, "Hours of Idleness. A Series of Poems, original and translated. By George Gordon—Lord Byron—a minor. New York, 1807."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 293.

1833. EGOTISM, Characteristic. President John Adams. [He wrote his wife of his inaugural address.] I had not slept well the night before, and did not sleep well the night after. I was unwell, and did not know whether I should get through or not. I did, however. How the business was received, I know not, only I have been told that Mason, the treaty-publisher, said we should lose nothing by the change, for he never heard such a speech in public in his life. All agree that, taken altogether, it was the sublimest thing ever exhibited in America.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 194.

1834. EGOTISM, Contrast in. Cæsar—Cicero. Like all real great men, he rarely speaks of himself. He tells us little or nothing of his own feelings or his own purposes. Cicero never forgets his individuality. In every line that he wrote Cicero was attitudinizing for posterity, or reflecting on the effect of his conduct upon his interests or his reputation. Cæsar is lost in his work; his personality is scarcely more visible than Shakespeare's.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 14.

1835. EGOTISM of Genius. Oliver Goldsmith. When accompanying two beautiful young ladies with their mother on a tour in France, he was seriously angry that more attention was paid to them than to him; and once at the exhibition of the Pantoccini in London, when those who sat next him observed with what dexterity a puppet was made to toss a pike, he could not bear that it should have such praise, and exclaimed, with some warmth, "Pshaw! I can do it better myself." NOTE.—He went home with Mr. Burke to supper, and broke his shin by attempting to exhibit to the company how much better he could jump over a stick than the puppets.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 114.

1836. EGOTISM, Royal. James II. [James had personal merits,] but his personal merits were as fuel to nourish the fire of his intense egotism. Every action of his life had reference to his personality. James, the king, was the one power in the State which was to counterbalance every other power.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 25, p. 402.

1837. ELECTION, A close. John Adams. President Washington had announced his intention to retire. The withdrawal of that august and commanding name threw the great prize open to competition, and all the fierce passions of party were enlisted in the strife. The Federal candidates were Adams and Pinckney; the Republican, Jefferson and Burr. After a very animated contest, John Adams was elected to the Presidency by a majority of one electoral vote; and Jefferson, having received next to the highest number, was elected vice-president. Neither party, therefore, had won a complete triumph; for, though the Federalists elected their president, the Republicans were partially consoled by placing their favorite in the second office.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 191.

1838. ELECTION, Coercion in. Samuel Johnson. He observed that "the statutes against bribery were intended to prevent upstarts with money from getting into Parliament;" adding, that "if he were a gentleman of landed property, he would turn out all his tenants who did not vote for the candidate whom he supported." LANGTON: "Would not that, sir, be checking the freedom of election?" JOHNSON: "Sir, the law does not mean that the privilege of voting should be independent of old family interest; of the permanent property of the country."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 244.

1839. ELECTION expenses. Treating. Evelyn laments that so many from the country came in to vote for his brother as knight for the shire of Surrey, "that I believe they ate and drank him out near to £2000, by a most abominable custom."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 21, p. 341.

1840. ELECTION frustrated. John Howard. In 1774 the liberal party in Bedfordshire nominated him for Parliament, and, after a most severe contest, he was elected by a small majority. The "issue" in this election was, whether the king and Lord North should be sustained in their American policy; and the election of Howard was, therefore, a defeat for the administration.

The ministry, however, succeeded in finding a pretext for annulling the election. Some of Howard's votes were declared illegal—enough to give the seat to a tory. The loss of a seat in Parliament was not much regretted by him for his own sake, but he felt acutely the wrong done to the great and patriotic party which had elected him. "I was a victim of the ministry," he wrote, after learning the result of the struggle. "Most surely I should not have fallen in with all their severe measures relative to the Americans, and my constant declaration that not one emolument of five shillings, were I in Parliament, would I ever accept of, marked me out as an object of their aversion."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 47.

1841. ELECTION of Grace. Cromwell. [On his death-bed.] "It is terrible, yea, it is very terrible," he muttered three times in succession, "to fall into the hands of the living God!" "Do you think," said he to his chaplain, "that a man who has once been in a state of grace can ever perish eternally?" "No," replied the chaplain, "there is no possibility of such a relapse." "Then I am safe," replied Cromwell; "for at one time I am confident that I was chosen." All his inquiries tended toward futurity; none bore reference to the present life. "I am the most insignificant of mortals," continued he after a momentary lapse; "but I have loved God, praised be His name, or, rather, I am beloved by Him!"—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 78.

1842. ELECTION resented. Reign of James II. [The fellows of Magdalen College refused to elect as president the infamous Anthony Farmer, whom the king urged.] Early in June the fellows were cited to appear before the High Commission at Whitehall. Five of them, deputed by the rest, obeyed the summons. Jeffreys treated them after his usual fashion. When one of them, a grave doctor named Fairfax, hinted some doubts as to the validity of the commission, the chancellor began to roar like a wild beast. "Who is this man? What commission has he to be impudent here? Seize him. Put him into a dark room. What does he do without a keeper? He is under my care as a lunatic. I wonder that nobody has applied to me for the custody of him." But when this storm had spent its force, and the depositions concerning the moral character of the king's nominee had been read, none of the commissioners had the front to pronounce that such a man could properly be made the head of a great college. [See more at No. 2891.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 269.

1843. ELECTION, A scandalous. James II. [He sought to complete the religious revolution of England by securing a Roman Catholic succession to the throne.] By corruption, by intimidation, by violent exertions of prerogative, by fraudulent distortions of law, [he sought] an assembly which might call itself a Parliament, and might be willing to register any edict of the sovereign. Returning officers must be appointed who would avail themselves of the slightest pretence to declare the king's friends duly elected. Every placeman, from the highest to the lowest, must be made to understand that, if he wished to retain his office, he must, at this conjuncture, support the throne by his vote and interest. The High Commission, meanwhile, would keep its eye on the clergy. The boroughs which had just been remodelled to serve one turn might be remodelled again to serve another. By such means the king hoped to obtain a majority in the House of Commons. [See No. 1850.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 292.

1844. ELECTION, A "tie." Jefferson—Burr. The Democratic party triumphed in 1801, and that triumph placed Thomas Jefferson in the Presidential chair. But there was a "tie" between Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr, each of them having received seventy-three electoral votes. Not that any single voter had expected or desired the elevation of Aaron Burr to the first office. The difficulty arose from the law, which provided that the person receiving the greatest number of electoral votes should be President, and that the person who received the number next to the highest should be the Vice-President. Jefferson and Burr were the Republican candidates for President and Vice-President, and as each chanced to receive the same number of electoral votes, neither of them was elected to either office, and the choice devolved upon the House of Representatives.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 350.

1845. ELECTION, A timely. Rev. Robert Newton. That Calvinism was not very dark or sulphurous seems to be shown from his repeating with gusto the saying of one of the old women of Olney when some preacher dwelt on the doctrine of predestination—"Ah, I have long settled that point; for if God had not chosen me before I was born, I am sure He would have seen nothing to have chosen me for afterward!"—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 3.

1846. ELECTION, Unanimous. Washington. The first Wednesday of January, 1789, was named as the time for the election of a chief magistrate. The people had but one voice as to the man that should be honored with that trust. Early in April the ballots of the electors were counted in the presence of Congress, and George Washington was unanimously chosen President and John Adams Vice-President of the United States.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 45, p. 362. Not only was every electoral vote cast for General Washington, but, so far as is known, he was the choice of every individual voter in every State of the Union.—JAMES PARTON, CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 16.

1847. ELECTION, Unique. Spartan. The manner of the election was this: When the people were assembled, some persons appointed for the purpose were shut up in a room near the place, where they could neither see nor be seen, and only hear the shouts of the constituents; for by them they decided this and most other affairs. Each candidate walked silently through the assembly, one after another, according to lot. Those that were shut up had writing-tables, in which they set down in different columns the number and loudness of the shouts, without knowing who they were for; only they marked them as first, second, third, and so on, according to the number of the competitors. He that had the most and loudest acclamations was declared duly elected.—PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

1848. ———. Captain John Smith. [Three of the five Virginia councilmen attempted to desert the colony, and were caught and impeached and removed.] Only Martin and Smith now remained; the former elected the latter president of Virginia! It was a forlorn piece of business, but very necessary for the public good.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 9, p. 97.

1849. ELECTION, Vociferous. Emperor Pompey. The mob was packed so thick that the house-tops were covered. A yell rose from tens of thousands of throats, so piercing that it was said a crow flying over the Forum dropped dead at the sound of it. The old patrician Catulus tried to speak, but the people would not hear him. The vote passed by acclamation, and Pompey was for three years sovereign of the Roman world.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 10.

1850. ELECTIONS, Farcical. Reign of James II. [He failed to secure a packed Parliament, by which he hoped to destroy the established church.] There was . . . only one way in which they could hope to effect their object. The charters of the boroughs must be resumed, and other charters must be granted confining the elective franchise to very small constituent bodies appointed by the sovereign. The judges themselves were uneasy. They represented that what they were required to do was in direct opposition to the plainest principles of law and justice; but all remonstrance was vain. The boroughs were commanded to surrender their charters. Few complied; and the course which the king took with those few did not encourage others to trust him. In several towns the right of voting was taken away from the commonalty, and given to a very small number of persons, who were required to bind themselves by oath to support the candidates recommended by the government. At Tewkesbury, for example, the franchise was confined to thirteen persons. Yet even this number was too large. Hatred and fear had spread so widely through the community that it was scarcely possible to bring together, in any town, by any process of packing, thirteen men on whom the court could absolutely depend. It was rumored that the majority of the new constituent body of Tewkesbury was animated by the same sentiment which was general throughout the nation, and would, when the decisive day should arrive, send true Protestants to Parliament. The regulators, in great wrath, threatened to reduce the number of electors to three.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 311.

1851. ELECTIONS, Free. William of Orange. [He ordered elections for members of Parliament.] The prince gave strict orders that no person in the public service should, on this occasion, practise those arts which had brought so much obloquy on the late government. He especially directed that no soldiers should be suffered to appear in any town where an election was going on.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 559.

1852. ELECTIONS, Venal. Parliament. A.D. 1768. [Reign of George III.] Boroughs were sold openly, and votes purchased at advanced prices. The market value of a seat in Parliament was £4000; at which rate the whole venal House would have been bought for not much over £2,000,000, sterling, and a majority for not much over £1,000,000. Yet in some places a contest cost the candidates £20,000 or £30,000 apiece, and it was affirmed that in Cumberland one person lavished £100,000. [It was the last Parliament] which ever legislated for America.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 33.

1853. ELECTRICITY, Light of. Columbus. [On his second voyage,] toward the latter part of October, they had in the night a gust of heavy rain, accompanied by the severe thunder and lightning of the tropics. It lasted for four hours, and they considered themselves in much peril, until they beheld several of those lambent flames playing about the tops of the masts, and gliding along the rigging, which have always been objects of superstitious fancies among sailors. Fernando Columbus makes remarks on them strongly characteristic of the age in which he lived. "On the same Saturday, in the night, was seen St. Elmo, with seven lighted tapers at the top-mast: there was much rain and great thunder; I mean to say, that those lights were seen, which mariners affirm to be the body of St. Elmo, on beholding which they chant litanies and orisons, holding it for certain that in the tempest in which he appears no one is in danger."—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 6, ch. 1.

1854. ELOQUENCE of Action. Samuel Johnson. At Mr. Thrale's in the evening, he repeated his usual paradoxical declamation against action in public speaking. "Action can have no effect upon reasonable minds. It may augment noise, but it never can enforce argument. If you speak to a dog, you use action; you hold up your hand thus, because he is a brute; and in proportion as men are removed from brutes, action will have the less influence upon them." MRS. THRALE: "What then, sir, becomes of Demosthenes' saying, 'Action, action, action'?" JOHNSON: "Demosthenes, madam, spoke to an assembly of brutes; to a barbarous people."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 204.

1855. ELOQUENCE of Facts. Appius Claudius. [He was a tyrannical consul, and sought to suppress the plebeians.] In the midst of the public assembly, a venerable figure, hoary with age, pale and emaciated, his countenance furrowed with anguish, and his whole appearance expressive of misery and calamity, stood up before the tribunal of the consuls, and prayed aloud for mercy against the oppression of an inhuman creditor. Disfigured as he was, his countenance was known, and many remembered to have seen him in the wars, where he fought with great courage, and had received many honorable wounds in the service of his country. He told his story with affecting simplicity. The enemy, in an incursion, had ravaged his little farm, and set fire to his cottage. Bereft of subsistence, he had borrowed, to support life, a small sum from one of the rich citizens; the interest had accumulated, and being quite unable to discharge the debt, he had delivered himself, with two of his children, into bondage. In this situation he affirmed that his merciless creditor had treated him as the worst of malefactors; and throwing aside his garment, he showed his back all covered with blood from the recent strokes of the whip. This miserable sight roused the populace to the highest pitch of fury. They rushed upon the consul's tribunal; and Appius would have been torn to pieces had not the lictors cleared for him a passage and carried him off to a place of safety.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 3.

1856. ELOQUENCE, Fear of. Demosthenes. It was in a similar strain of glowing eloquence that Demosthenes roused the torpid spirits of his countrymen to a vigorous effort to preserve their independence against the designs of this artful and ambitious prince; and Philip had just reason to say that he was more afraid of that man than of all the fleets and armies of the Athenians. It was highly, therefore, to the honor of the Athenians that they listened to the counsels of this excellent orator, and, however unequal to the contest, determined that they would dearly sell their freedom.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3.

1857. ELOQUENCE, Necessary. Romans. It must not appear extraordinary that this mode of education should have been common to all the young patricians, whether their inclination led them to the camp or to the bar; for as every citizen of Rome was a branch of its legislative system, the profession of arms became no apology for the want of that ability of maintaining the rights of the State in the assemblies of the people, which was equally necessary with the capacity of defending them in the field. If a public officer was accused, it was reckoned shameful if he could not himself give an account of his conduct, and plead his own cause. A senator who could not support his opinion by the ingenuity of argument or force of eloquence was an object of contempt to the people.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 3.

1858. ELOPEMENT, Royal. Beauty. During a visit which he paid at Tours to Foulques le Rechin, Count of Anjou, the king conceived a violent passion for Bertrade de Montfort, the Count's wife, reputed the most beautiful woman in the kingdom. The countess, who had married her husband not from affection, but for the sake of his rank and power, was easily persuaded to elope from him and to join [King] Philip at Orleans.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 7, § 14.

1859. EMANCIPATION advocated. Massachusetts. Massachusetts, where the first planters assumed to themselves "a right to treat the Indians on the foot of Canaanites or Amalekites," always opposed the introduction of slaves from abroad; and in 1701 the town of Boston instructed its representatives "to put a period to negroes being slaves."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 24.

1860. EMBARRASSMENT in Public. Bishop Roberts [was reared on the Western frontier, and in early life was greatly embarrassed when in public, owing to a constitutional diffidence]. For a long time after his appointment as class-leader among his rustic neighbors, he could not assume courage enough to address them individually, and it became necessary to supersede him by another leader until he conquered his timidity. In his first attempt at public exhortation he suddenly sat down, appalled at the intent look of a good man, whose favorable interest he took for disapprobation. At another time, when he was expected to exhort, he was so alarmed as to retire in agony and conceal himself in a barn. In the third attempt he proceeded some time with good effect, but fearing he had made a blunder, stopped short in confusion.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 4, p. 89.

1861. EMBLEM, Significant. Wolf. [Among the early Turks] the emperor's throne was turned toward the east, and a golden wolf on the top of a spear seemed to guard the entrance of his tent.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 42, p. 202.

1862. EMERGENCY, Deliverance in. William, Prince of Orange. [Invasion of England.] Torbay was the place where the prince intended to land. But the morning of Monday, the 5th of November, was hazy. The pilot of the Brill could not discern the sea-marks, and carried the fleet too far to the west. The danger was great. To return in the face of the wind was impossible. Plymouth was the next port; but at Plymouth a garrison had been posted under the command of Lord Bath. The landing might be opposed; and a check might produce serious consequences. There could be little doubt, moreover, that by this time the royal fleet had got out of the Thames, and was hastening full sail down the Channel. Russell saw the whole extent of the peril, and exclaimed to Burnet, "You may go to prayers, doctor; all is over!" At that moment the wind changed; a soft breeze sprang up from the south; the mist dispersed; the sun shone forth; and under the mild light of an autumnal noon, the fleet turned back, passed round the lofty cape of Berry Head, and rode safe in the harbor of Torbay. [See more at No. 4550.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 445.

1863. EMIGRANTS, City of. New York. New York was always a city of the world. Its settlers were relics of the first-fruits of the Reformation, chosen from the Belgic provinces and England, from France and Bohemia, and the Italian Alps.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 15.

1864. EMIGRANTS, Dangerous. Criminals. Thieves or homicides, the spendthrift or the fraudulent bankrupt, the debtors to justice or its victims, prisoners rightfully or wrongfully detained, excepting only those arrested for treason or counterfeiting money—these were to be the people by whom the colony (of New France) was, in part, to be established. . . . During the winter one was hanged for theft; several were put in irons, and "divers persons," as well men as women, were whipped.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 1.

1865. EMIGRATION, Benefits of. Greeks. At all events, it is universally allowed that, from the period of those strangers settling among them, the Greeks assumed a new character, and exhibited in some respects the manners of a civilized nation. The dawnings of a national religion began to appear; for the Titans were a religious people. They taught the savages to worship the Phœnician gods, Ouranos, Saturn, Jupiter, etc., who were nothing more than deified heroes; and by a progress of ideas not unnatural, this rude people confounded in after times those gods with the Titans who introduced them.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 6.

1866. EMIGRATION, Military. Goths. The march of Theodoric must be considered as the emigration of an entire people; the wives and children of the Goths, their aged parents, and most precious effects were carefully transported; and some idea may be formed of the heavy baggage that now followed the camp, by the loss of two thousand wagons, which had been sustained in a single action in the war of Epirus. For their subsistence the Goths depended on the magazines of corn, which was ground in portable mills by the hands of their women; on the milk and flesh of their flocks and herds; on the casual produce of the chase, and upon the contributions which they might impose on all who should presume to dispute the passage, or to refuse their friendly assistance.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39, p. 9.

1867. EMINENCE, Cowardly. Roman Emperor Honorius. The Emperor Honorius was distinguished, above his subjects, by the pre-eminence of fear, as well as of rank. The pride and luxury in which he was educated had not allowed him to suspect that there existed on the earth any power presumptuous enough to invade the repose of the successor of Augustus. The arts of flattery concealed the impending danger, till Alaric approached the palace of Milan. [Honorius fled from Alaric, the king of the Visigoths.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 30, p. 201.

1868. EMINENCE by Worth. Henry Wilson. On the 22d of November, 1875, Vice-President Wilson, whose health had been gradually failing since his inauguration, sank under a stroke of paralysis, and died at Washington City. Like Roger Sherman, he had risen from the shoemaker's bench to the highest honors of his country. Without the learning of Seward and Sumner—without the diplomatic skill of the one or the oratorical fame of the other, he nevertheless possessed those great abilities and sterling merits which transmitted his name in after times on the roll of patriot statesmen.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 68, p. 562.

1869. EMOTION, Overpowered by. Empress Josephine. [The imperial family and most illustrious officers of the empire were assembled at the Tuileries to receive from Napoleon and Josephine the official announcement, from each, of their intended divorce.] Josephine, holding a paper in her hand, began to read. But her heart was broken with grief. Uncontrollable sobs choked her voice. She handed the paper to M. Reynaud, and burying her face in her hands, sank into a chair. [In the paper she declared her sacrifice of personal happiness in the interest of the French people, who had no hope of an heir to the throne from the present union.]—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 10.

1870. EMOTIONS, Hidden. American Indian. He has little flexibility of features or transparency of skin, and therefore if he depicts his passions, it is by strong contortions, or the kindling of the eye, that seems ready to burst from its socket. He cannot blush; the movement of the blood does not visibly represent the movement of his affections. . . . he cannot paint to the eye the emotions of moral sublimity.—BANCROFT'S HIST. U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

1871. EMOTIONS from Success. Newton. Newton could, therefore, at once put his conjecture to the test of arithmetic. He could ascertain two things with the greatest exactness: 1, how much force was required to keep the moon in its orbit; and, 2, with how much force the earth did attract the moon, supposing that the law of attraction, as established by Galileo, held good. If these two calculations agreed, his conjecture was a discovery. He tried them. They did not agree. Busy with other investigations, he laid aside this inquiry for nineteen years. He then learned that he, in common with all the English astronomers, was in error as to the distance of the moon from the earth. This error being corrected, he repeated his calculations. When he had brought them so near to a conclusion that he was all but sure of the truth of his theory, he became so agitated that he was unable to go on, and he was obliged to ask a friend to complete them. When they were brought to a close, he saw that his youthful thought was indeed a sublime, demonstrated truth. Thus it was that the great law of the attraction of gravitation was discovered—the most brilliant and valuable discovery ever achieved by a human mind.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 252.

1872. EMPLOYMENT, Agreeable. Audubon. One of the happiest men, and one of the most interesting characters we have had in America, was John James Audubon, the celebrated painter and biographer of American birds. He was one of the few men whose pursuits were in perfect accordance with his tastes and his talents. . . . Up with the dawn, and rambling about all day, he was the happiest of men if he returned to his camp at evening carrying in his game-bag a new specimen with which to enrich his collection. He had no thought whatever of publishing his pictures. "It was no desire of glory," he assures us, "which led me into this exile; I wished only to enjoy nature."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 163.

1873. EMPLOYMENT, Humble. Washington. He became convinced of the defective nature of the working animals employed in the agriculture of the Southern States, and set about remedying the evil by the introduction of mules, . . . the mule being longer-lived, less liable to disease, requires less food, . . . more serviceable. . . . He received a present from the King of Spain of a jack and two jennies. . . . The jack, called the Royal Gift, was sixteen hands high. . . . Lafayette sent out a jack and jennies from the island of Malta. [Washington bred very superior mules from his coach mares.]—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 22.

1874. EMPLOYMENT, Opportune. Stephen A. Douglas. In the autumn of the year 1833, at the town of Winchester, in Illinois, there was to be a great auction sale of property, which drew to the place a large concourse of people from the neighboring country. When the sale was about to begin, the auctioneer was still unprovided with a clerk to enter the goods as they were sold, and he looked about for a person to perform that indispensable labor. At that moment he noticed on the outskirts of the crowd a pale, short, sickly-looking young man, with his coat upon his arm, apparently about nineteen, a stranger in the vicinity, who looked as though he might be able to write and keep accounts well enough for the purpose. He hailed him and offered him the place of clerk, at two dollars a day. It so happened that this young man was in very pressing need of employment, for he had recently arrived in the State, and having walked into Winchester that morning with all his worldly effects upon his person, including a few cents in his pocket—and but a few—he was anxious how he should get through the week. He had not a friend within a thousand miles of the spot, and his entire property would not have brought under the hammer $5. He accepted the clerkship, and mounted to his place near the auctioneer.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 196.

1875. EMPLOYMENT refused. Oliver Goldsmith. He applied at one place, we are told, for employment in the shop of a country apothecary; but all his medical science gathered in foreign universities could not gain him the management of a pestal and mortar. He even resorted, it is said, to the stage as a temporary expedient, and figured in low comedy at a country town in Kent.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 6, p. 52.

1876. EMPLOYMENT, Seeking. John Fitch. [The great inventor. His wife was a vixen and unendurable.] Henceforth he was a wanderer. Trudging along the road, he offered himself as a farm-laborer; but was refused on account of his slender and weakly frame. He tried to enlist as a soldier, but could not for the same reason. He roamed the country, cleaning clocks from house to house. At length, after many wanderings, he reached Trenton, where he lived awhile on three pence a day, making brass buttons, and selling them about the country. Having obtained a few shillings of his own, he invested them in the purchase of an old brass kettle, which he made up into buttons and sold to great advantage.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 149.

1877. EMPLOYMENT, Unworthy. Roman Emperor Honorius. Honorius was without passions, and consequently without talents; and his feeble and languid disposition was alike incapable of discharging the duties of his rank, or of enjoying the pleasures of his age. In his early youth he made some progress in the exercises of riding and drawing the bow; but he soon relinquished these fatiguing occupations, and the amusement of feeding poultry became the serious and daily care of the monarch of the West, who resigned the reins of empire to the firm and skilful hand of his guardian Stilicho. The experience of history will countenance the suspicion that a prince who was born in the purple received a worse education than the meanest peasant of his dominions; and that the ambitious minister suffered him to attain the age of manhood without attempting to excite his courage or to enlighten his understanding. . . . The son of Theodosius passed the summer of his life, a captive in his palace, a stranger in his country, and the patient, almost the indifferent, spectator of the ruin of the Western Empire, which was repeatedly attacked, and finally subverted, by the arms of the barbarians. In the eventful history of a reign of twenty-eight years, it will seldom be necessary to mention the name of the emperor Honorius.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 29, p. 188.

1878. ——. Roman Emperor Theodosius. The ample leisure which he acquired by neglecting the essential duties of his high office was filled by idle amusements and unprofitable studies. Hunting was the only active pursuit that could tempt him beyond the limits of the palace; but he most assiduously labored, sometimes by the light of a midnight lamp, in the mechanic occupations of painting and carving; and the elegance with which he transcribed religious books entitled the Roman emperor to the singular epithet of Calligraphes, or a fair writer. Separated from the world by an impenetrable veil, Theodosius trusted the persons whom he loved; he loved those who were accustomed to amuse and flatter his indolence; and as he never perused the papers that were presented for the royal signature, the acts of injustice the most repugnant to his character were frequently perpetrated in his name.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 32, p. 354.

1879. ENCOURAGEMENT, Timely. Luther. As Luther was passing to the assembly room of the diet, a noted commander, George von Frundsberg, touched him on the shoulder and said, "My dear monk, thou art now about taking a step the like of which neither I nor many a commander on the hardest-fought battle-field has ever taken. If thou art right and sure of thy cause, proceed in God's name, and be of good cheer; God will not forsake thee."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 9, p. 85.

1880. ——. Columbus. [His crews threatened mutiny.] Fortunately the manifestations of the vicinity of land were such on the following day as no longer to admit a doubt. Besides a quantity of fresh weeds, such as grow in rivers, they saw a green fish of a kind which keeps about rocks; then a branch of thorn with berries on it, and recently separated from the tree, floated by them; then they picked up a reed, a small board, and, above all, a staff artificially carved. All gloom and mutiny now gave way to sanguine expectation; and throughout the day each one was eagerly on the watch, in hopes of being the first to discover the long-sought-for land.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 3, ch. 4.

1881. ENCOURAGEMENT, Visionary. Columbus. He says, about the festival of Christmas, when menaced by Indian war and domestic rebellion, when distrustful of those around him and apprehensive of disgrace at court, he sank for a time into complete despondency. In this hour of gloom, when abandoned to despair, he heard in the night a voice addressing him in words of comfort, "O man of little faith! why art thou cast down? Fear nothing, I will provide for thee. The seven years of the term of gold are not expired; in that, and in all other things, I will take care of thee." The seven years' term of gold here mentioned alludes to a vow made by Columbus on discovering the New World, and recorded by him in a letter to the sovereigns, that within seven years he would furnish, from the profits of his discoveries, fifty thousand foot and five thousand horse, for the deliverance of the holy sepulchre, and an additional force of like amount within five years afterward. The comforting assurance given him by the voice was corroborated, he says, that very day, by intelligence received of the discovery of a large tract of country rich in mines. This imaginary promise of divine aid, thus mysteriously given, appeared to him at present in still greater progress of fulfilment. The troubles and dangers of the island had been succeeded by tranquillity.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 12, ch. 7.

1882. END recorded, The. "Charter Oak." In 1686. . . Andros was made royal governor of New England. . . . On the day of his arrival [at Hartford] he invaded the provincial assembly while in session, seized the minutes, and wrote Finis at the bottom of the page. He demanded the immediate surrender of the colonial charter. Governor Treat pleaded long and earnestly for the precious document. Andros was inexorable. The shades of evening fell. Joseph Wadsworth found in the gathering darkness an opportunity to conceal the cherished parchment—a deed which has made his name and the name of a tree immortal. [The liberties of Connecticut were restored two years later.]—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 21, p. 191.

1883. ENDURANCE, German. General Daniel Morgan, [of Revolutionary fame, said:] As to the fighting part of the matter, the men of all nations are pretty much alike; they fight as much as they find necessary, and no more. But, sir, for the grand essential in the composition of the good soldier, give me the Dutchman—he starves well.—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 12.

1884. ENEMIES, Detraction of. "Advocatus diaboli." In the Roman Catholic Church the person who shows cause against the canonization of one proposed for sainthood is called advocatus diaboli. He insists upon the weak points in the good man's or woman's life. Hence the name is sometimes applied to all who delight in detracting from the characters of good men. Most men have their advocatus diaboli.—AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA, "ADVOCATE."

1885. ENEMIES divided. Spanish Armada. The Armada lay off Calais, with its largest ships ranged outside, "like strong castles fearing no assault, the lesser placed in the middle ward." The English admiral could not attack them in their position without great disadvantage, but on the night of the 29th he sent eight fire-ships among them, with almost equal effect to that of the fire-ships which the Greeks so often employed against the Turkish fleets in their late war of independence. The Spaniards cut their cables, and put to sea in confusion. One of the largest galleasses ran foul of another vessel, and was stranded. The rest of the fleet was scattered about on the Flemish coast, and when the morning broke it was with difficulty and delay that they obeyed their admiral's signal to range themselves round him near Gravelines. Now was the golden opportunity for the English to assail them, and prevent them from ever letting loose Parma's flotilla against England, and nobly was that opportunity used. Drake and Fenner were the first English captains who attacked the unwieldy leviathans.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 430.

1886. ENEMIES neglected. *Turkmen*s. The shepherds were converted into robbers; the bands of robbers were collected into an army of conquerors; as far as Ispahan and the Tigris, Persia was afflicted by their predatory inroads; and the Turkmen were not ashamed or afraid to measure their courage and numbers with the proudest sovereigns of Asia. Massoud, the son and successor of Mahmud, had too long neglected the advice of his wisest Omrahs. "Your enemies," they repeatedly urged, "were in their origin a swarm of ants; they are now little snakes; and, unless they be instantly crushed, they will acquire the venom and magnitude of serpents."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 57, p. 506.

1887. ENEMIES, Partiality to. Philip of Macedonia. Scarcely was he seated on the throne, when he was attacked from every quarter. The Illy-rians and the Pæonians made inroads upon his territories. Two rival princes, Pausanias and Argæus, relations of the last monarch, disputed his title, each claiming the sovereignty for himself. The Thracians armed for Pausanias, the Athenians for Argæus. Philip disarmed the Pæonians by bribes and promises. The Thracians were won by a similar policy. He gained a victory over the Athenians, in which his rival Argæus lost his life; and having thus accomplished the security of his title to the throne, he attained with the people of Athens the character of extreme moderation and generosity, by sending back to their country, without ransom, all the prisoners he had taken in battle. In this manner, by the most dexterous policy, he removed a part of his enemies, that he might have the rest at his mercy.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3, p. 169.

1888. ENEMY, Generous. Luther. Miltitz [the Pope's ambassador] had made an appointment to meet Tetzel at Altenburg, in Saxony, to reprimand him for his excesses. But the latter, fearing the popular wrath, did not dare to undertake the journey. After Miltitz had concluded his conference with Luther, he went to Leipsic, and meeting Tetzel he administered so severe a reproof that he sickened and died of chagrin in a Dominican cloister, July 4, 1519. Luther wrote Tetzel a comforting letter during his sickness—an evidence of the nobility of soul and large-heartedness of the great Reformer.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 5, p. 59.

1889. ENEMY, Weapons from the. Revolutionary War. [For Sumter's regiment in South Carolina] bullets were cast of pewter, collected from housekeepers. With scarcely three rounds of cartridges to a man, they could obtain no more but from their foes; and the arms of the dead and wounded in one engagement must equip them for another.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 10, ch. 15.

1890. ENERGY complimented. Napoleon I. With such tremendous energy did he do this [attack English and Austrian armies], that he received from his antagonists the complimentary sobriquet of the one hundred thousand men. Wherever Napoleon made his appearance in the field, his presence alone was considered equal to that force.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 19.

1891. ENERGY, Expression of. General Grant. [At the battle of Fort Donelson, when ready for the final assault, General Buckner, the Confederate commander, proposed an armistice to settle terms of capitulation.] Grant wanted no armistice. He knew his advantage; . . . he replied: "No terms but unconditional and immediate surrender can be accepted. I propose to move immediately upon your works." [Buckner surrendered.]—HEADLEY'S GRANT, p. 68.

1892. ENERGY, Individual. Tribune Rienzi. Never perhaps has the energy and effect of a single mind been more remarkably felt than in the sudden though transient reformation of Rome by the tribune Rienzi. A den of robbers was converted to the discipline of a camp or a convent; patient to hear, swift to redress, inexorable to punish, his tribunal was always accessible to the poor and the stranger; nor could birth or dignity or the immunities of the Church protect the offender or his accomplices. The privileged houses, the private sanctuaries in Rome, on which no officer of justice would presume to trespass, were abolished; and he applied the timber and iron of their barricades in the fortifications of the Capitol.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 70, p. 477.

1893. ENERGY, Military. Emperor Trajan. Careless of the difference of seasons and of climates, he marched on foot, and bareheaded, over the snows of Caledonia and the sultry plains of Upper Egypt; nor was there a province of the empire which, in the course of his reign, was not honored with the presence of the monarch.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1, p. 9.

1894. ENERGY of Patriotism. Israel Putnam. A.D. 1775. On the morning [following the fight at Concord] . . . Israel Putnam, . . . in leather frock and apron, was assisting hired men to build a stone wall on his farm, when he heard the cry from Lexington. Leaving them to continue their task, he set off instantly to rouse the militia officers of the nearest towns. On his return he found hundreds who had mustered and chosen him their leader. Issuing orders for them to follow, he himself pushed forward, without changing the checked shirt he had worn in the field, and reached Cambridge at sunrise, . . . having rode the same horse one hundred miles in eighteen hours.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 29.

1895. ENERGY, Success by. Wolsey. [Thomas Wolsey, afterward the great cardinal, was a priest at Magdalen College, and subsequently chaplain of Henry VII.] His promotion in that court arose out of his capacity to seize upon a fit occasion for the display of remarkable energy. It is an attribute of genius thus to make its opportunities, while the ordinary man passes them by. [Wolsey was sent as a confidential messenger to the Emperor Maximilian, then in Flanders.] Having received his instructions from the king, he left Richmond at noon, took the ferry-boat at Gravesend, went on with horses to Dover, had a quick passage to Calais, discharged his commission to the emperor on the second night, travelled back to Calais the next day, and was again at Richmond on the fourth evening. This was an extraordinary journey for those times. Presenting himself to the king on the following morning, he was angrily asked why he had not set forth on his travel. [Henry presented him with the deanery of Lincoln.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 16, p. 265.

1896. ENERGY, Surpassing. Mahomet II. [To the ambassadors of Constantine, who protested against the erection of a threatening fortress:] "Return and inform your king that the present Ottoman is far different from his predecessors; that his resolutions surpass their wishes; and that he performs more than they could resolve. Return in safety; but the next who delivers a similar message may expect to be flayed alive." After this declaration Constantine, the first of the Greeks in spirit as in rank, had determined to unsheathe the sword, and to resist the approach and establishment of the Turks on the Bosphorus.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 68, p. 375.

1897. ENGINEERS, Service of. War in Netherlands. When we contemplate [William, Prince of Orange] this feeble-bodied man, with the most heroic spirit, one day in the trenches, another day on horseback from morning till night, . . . we can understand the confidence he won; . . . but while we admire the perseverance of William and the undaunted courage of all the troops of the allies, we must not forget that much of the success was due to the science of the engineer, Coehorn, the great rival of Vauban.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 12, p. 180.

1898. ENGRAVING invented. Mezzotinto. It was invented by the celebrated Prince Rupert, son of the Elector Palatine, about the year 1650; and the hint was conceived from observing the effect of rust upon a soldier's fusil, in covering the surface of the iron with innumerable small holes at regular distances. Rupert, who was a great mechanical genius and virtuoso, concluded that a contrivance might be found to cover a plate of copper with such a regular ground of holes so closely pierced as to give a black impression, which, if scraped away in proper parts, would leave the rest of the paper white; that thus light and shade might be as finely blended, or as strongly distinguished, as by the pencil in painting. He tried the experiment by means of an indented steel roller, and it succeeded to his wishes. A crenulated chisel is now used to make the rough ground in place of the roller. This art has been brought to very high perfection. Its characteristic is a softness equal to that of the pencil, and it is therefore particularly adapted to portraits; and nothing except the power of colors can express flesh more naturally, the flowing of hair, the folds of drapery, or the reflection from polished surfaces. Its defect is, that where there is one great mass of shade in the picture it wants an outline to detach and distinguish the different parts, which are thus almost lost in one entire shade; but in the blending of light and shade there is no other mode of engraving that approaches to it in excellence.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 22.

1899. ENMITY, Persistent. Cato. [Cato gave] a stronger instance of his enmity to Carthage; he never gave his opinion in the Senate upon any other point whatever without adding these words: "And my opinion is, that Carthage should be destroyed." Scipio, surnamed Nasica, made it a point to maintain the contrary, and concluded all his speeches thus: "And my opinion is, that Carthage should be left standing."—PLUTARCH.

1900. ENMITY, Race. Normans. In no country has the enmity of race been carried farther than in England. . . . His ordinary form of indignant denial was, "Do you take me for an Englishman?" The descendant of such a gentleman one hundred years later was proud of the English name.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 15.

1901. ENTERPRISE, Vast. Pacific Railroad. This vast enterprise was projected as early as 1853, but ten years elapsed before the work of construction actually began. The first division extended from Omaha . . . to Ogden, . . . a thousand and thirty-two miles; the western division, called the Central Pacific, . . . from Ogden to San Francisco, a distance of eight hundred and eighty-two miles. On the 10th of May, 1869, the great work was completed.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 68, p. 553.

1902. ENTERTAINMENT, Genius for. Paulus Æmilius. [After Paulus Æmilius had subdued the Macedonians, he made great entertainments.] And he showed so just a discernment in the ordering, the placing, and saluting of his guests, and in distinguishing what degree of civility was due to every man's rank and quality, that the Greeks were amazed at his knowledge of matters of mere politeness, and that amid his great actions even trifles did not escape his attention, but were conducted with the greatest decorum. That which afforded him the highest satisfaction was, that, notwithstanding the magnificence and variety of his preparations, he himself gave the greatest pleasure to those he entertained. And to those that expressed their admiration of his management on these occasions, he said that it required the same genius to draw up an army and to order an entertainment; that the one might be most formidable to the enemy, and the other most agreeable to the company.—PLUTARCH'S PAULUS ÆMILIUS.

1903. ENTHUSIASM, Patriotic. "Independence Hall." All day long the old bellman of the State House had stood in the steeple, ready to sound the note of freedom to the city and the nation. The hours went by; the gray-haired veteran in the belfry grew discouraged, and began to say, "They will never do it—they will never do it!" [i. e., sign the Declaration of American Independence]. Just then the lad who had been stationed below ran out and exclaimed, at the top of his voice, "Ring! ring!" and the aged patriot did ring as he never did before. . . . Everywhere the declaration was received with enthusiastic applause.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 39, p. 309.

1904. ENTHUSIASM, Persistent. Lord Nelson. [At the battle of Copenhagen, 1801, Nelson was vice-admiral, and led the attack against the Danish fleet. By accident one fourth of the fleet were unable to participate, and the battle became very destructive. Admiral Parker, a conservative and aged officer, seeing how little progress was made after three hours' conflict, signalled the fleet to discontinue the engagement.] That signal was No. 39. Nelson continued to walk the deck, without appearing to notice the signal. "Shall I repeat it?" said the signal lieutenant. "No; acknowledge it." He turned to the captain: "You know, Foley, I have only one eye. I can't see it," putting his glass to his blind eye. "Nail my signal for close action to the mast," cried Nelson. [The battle was a success, and the Danish fleet destroyed.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 23, p. 404.

1905. ENTHUSIASM for Philosophy. Archimedes. It is related of him, that being perpetually charmed by a domestic siren—that is, his geometry, he neglected his meat and drink, and took no care of his person; that he was often carried by force to the baths, and when there he would make mathematical figures in the ashes, and with his finger draw lines upon his body when it was anointed; so much was he transported with intellectual delight, such an enthusiast in science. And though he was the author of many curious and excellent discoveries, yet he is said to have desired his friends only to place on his tombstone a cylinder containing a sphere, and to set down the proportion which the containing solid bears to the contained.—PLUTARCH'S MARCELLUS.

1906. ENTHUSIASM, Remarkable. Joan of Arc. She honestly believed herself inspired by Heaven, and she infused into others that belief. An enthusiast herself, she filled a dispirited soldiery and a despairing people with enthusiasm. The great secret of her success was the boldness of her attacks.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 4, p. 87.

1907. ENTHUSIASM, A Soldier's. Battle of Manassas. [A Confederate soldier, wounded in the breast, was being carried off the field by his comrades. An officer expressed his sympathy.] "Yes, yes!" was his reply, "they have done for me now, but my father's there yet! our army is there yet! our cause is there yet!" and raising himself from the arms of his companions, his face lighting up like a sunbeam, he cried with an enthusiasm I shall never forget, "and Liberty is there yet!" His spasmodic exertion was too much for him; . . . he swooned away.—POLLARD'S FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 4, p. 121.

1908. ENTHUSIASTS, Gospel. Quakers. George Fox did not fail by letter to catechise Innocent XI. Ploughmen and milkmaids, becoming itinerant preachers, sounded the alarm throughout the world, and appealed to the consciences of Puritans and Cavaliers, of the Pope and the Grand Turk, of the negro and the savage. The plans of the Quakers designed no less than the establishment of a universal religion; their apostles made their way to Rome and Jerusalem, to New England and Egypt; and some were even moved to go toward China and Japan. The rise of the people called Quakers is one of the memorable events in the history of man. It marks the moment when intellectual freedom was claimed unconditionally by the people as an inalienable birthright.—BANCROFT'S U. S., ch. 16, vol. 2.

1909. ENVY rebuked. Oliver Goldsmith. Upon another occasion, when Goldsmith confessed himself to be of an envious disposition, I contended with Johnson that we ought not to be angry with him, he was so candid in owning it. "Nay, sir," said Johnson, "we must be angry that a man has such a superabundance of an odious quality that he cannot keep it within his own breast, but it boils over." In my opinion, however, Goldsmith had not more of it than other people have, but only talked of it freely.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 220.

1910. ENVY of Reputation. Aristides. At the time that Aristides was banished, when the people were inscribing the names on the shells, it is reported that an illiterate burgher came up to Aristides, whom he took for some ordinary person, and giving him his shell, desired him to write Aristides upon it. The good man, surprised at the adventure, asked him whether Aristides had ever injured him. "No," said he, "nor do I even know him; but it vexes me to hear him everywhere called the Just." Aristides made no answer, but took the shell, and having written his own name upon it, returned it to the man. When he quitted Athens, he lifted up his hands toward Heaven, and, agreeably to his character, made a prayer, very different from that of Achilles—namely, that the people of Athens might never see the day which should force them to remember Aristides.—PLUTARCH'S ARISTIDES.

1911. ENVY, Unhappiness of. Henry III. [After his victory over the German auxiliaries] the king returned to Paris, where he made his triumphal entry, . . . but found, to his extreme mortification, that the entire credit and glory of the campaign was assigned by the Parisians to their idol, the Duke of Guise. "Saul has slain his thousands," cried the multitude, "but David his ten thousands."—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 17, § 8, p. 355.

1912. EPIDEMIC, Destructive. India. [In 1818 the British army in India] was encamped in low ground, on the banks of a tributary of the Jumna. The Indian cholera morbus had ascended the valley of the Ganges, and reaching the camp of the main British army destroyed, in a little more than a week, one tenth of the number there crowded together.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 12, p. 417.

1913. EPICURES, Reputed. English. [The English people were called epicures by the impoverished Scots, who opposed the union of the two nations. They were said to be] devoted to Dutch cabbages and wheaten bread, and despising honest kale and oatmeal.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 21, p. 322.

1914. EPISCOPACY, Fictitious. Roman. [Reign of James II. Adda, the Pope's nuncio in England,] had, by a fiction often used in the Church of Rome, been lately raised to the episcopal dignity without having the charge of any see. He was called Archbishop of Amasia, the birthplace of Mithridates, an ancient city of which all trace had long disappeared.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 249.

1915. EPITAPH, Unique. Elihu Yale. [Chief founder of Yale College.] Elihu Yale lived to the age of seventy-three years, dying in 1721, and was buried at Wrexham, in Wales. The epitaph on his tombstone is still legible. After the date of his birth and death these lines follow :

Born in America, in Europe bred,
In Africa travelled, and in Asia wed,
Where long he lived and thrived : at London, dead.

Much good, some ill, he did ; so hope all's even,
And that his soul through mercy's gone to heaven.

You that survive and read, take care
For this most certain exit to prepare ;
For only the actions of the just Smell sweet and blossom in the dust.

—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 594.

1816. EQUALITY, Religious. Mohammedan. One of the princes of Roman Syria, Djabalah, adopted the faith of the conquerors. . . . Omar took him along with him, at the epoch of the pilgrimage, to accomplish the rites of Islamism at Medina. The Syrian prince, arrayed in silken apparel, and wearing a crown decked with priceless pearls—which resembled the ear-drop of Maria, of which this princess had made a present to the temple of Mecca at the moment of her conversion—followed by magnificent horses of Nedjid, which his slaves were leading by the hand, accompanied Omar in his stations around the holy edifice. A Bedouin of the tribe of Fezara, who was walking behind him, trod on the tail of his cloak, and made it fall from his shoulders. Djabalah turned around angry, gave this man a slap, and cut him on the face. The Fezarian claimed of Omar satisfaction for this outrage. "Thou hast stricken him ?" asked the Khalif of Djabalah. "Yes," replied the latter, "and but for my veneration for the Kaaba, I would have cloven his hand with my sword." "Thou avowest the act," rejoined Omar ; "thou must purchase then from the offended party a desistance from the complaint." "And if I am unwilling to do it ?" "Then thou wilt be subject to the penalty of retaliation. I will order that this Bedouin shall strike thee upon the face, as thou hast stricken him." "But I am a king, and he is but an obscure individual." "The king and the beggar are equal before the Mussulman law ; thou hast over him but the superiority of physical force." "I had thought I would be still more honored in Islamism than in my former religion." "No more words ; satisfy the complainant, or submit to retaliation."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 173.

1917. EQUALITY, Sentimental. Napoleon I. [He professed to believe in the nobility of merit and the equality of men.] Murat sought Napoleon's sister Caroline for a bride. "Murat ! Murat !" said Napoleon, thoughtfully and hesitatingly. "He is the son of an inn-keeper. In the elevated rank [of First Consul] to which I have attained, I cannot mix my blood with his." [He afterward consented as a matter of policy.] —ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 16.

1918. EQUIVOCATION declined. John Huss. Huss . . . railed against the ecclesiastical hierarchy and the disorderly lives of the popes and bishops. He was cited to appear before the council of Constance, and was examined touching the most obnoxious passages of his writings. To deny the hierarchy, and to reproach the conduct and morals of the bishops, were sufficient crimes in the judgment of a council of these bishops, and Huss was condemned to be burnt alive. He might have saved his life by simply declaring that he abjured all his errors. The Emperor Sigismund, who wanted to save him, thus reasoned with him : "What harm can there be," said he, "in any man declaring that he abjures his errors ? I am ready this moment to declare that I abjure all my errors ;" but John Huss was too sincere to save his life by an equivocation, and he suffered death with heroic courage.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 11.

1919. EQUIVOCATION, Ingenious. Reign of James II. [William, Prince of Orange, issued a manifesto announcing the invitation of the prelates to an invasion of England.] Bishop Compton was called into the royal closet and asked whether he believed that there was the slightest ground for the prince's assertion. The bishop was in a strait, for he was himself one of the seven who had signed the invitation ; and his conscience, not a very enlightened conscience, would not suffer him, it seems, to utter a direct falsehood. "Sir," he said, "I am quite confident that there is not one of my brethren who is not as guiltless as myself in this matter." The equivocation was ingenious ; but whether the difference between the sin of such an equivocation and the sin of a lie be worth any expense of ingenuity may perhaps be doubted. The king was satisfied. "I fully acquit you all," he said; "but I think it necessary that you should publicly contradict the slanderous charge brought against you in the prince's declaration." The bishop very naturally begged that he might be allowed to read the paper which he was required to contradict; but the king would not suffer him to look at it. [At another interview,] when Compton's turn came, he parried the question with an adroitness which a Jesuit might have envied. "I gave your Majesty my answer yesterday."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 440.

1920. EQUIVOCATION, Oracular. Fate. [Constantine was approaching the city with a great army.] Before Maxentius left Rome, he consulted the Sibylline books. The guardians of these ancient oracles were as well versed in the arts of this world as they were ignorant of the secrets of fate; and they returned him a very prudent answer, which might adapt itself to the event, and secure their reputation, whatever should be the chance of arms.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 14, p. 480.

1921. ERROR from Vastness. Explorer. [Seeking a western passage from Europe to Asia.] August 10, 1519, Admiral Magalhaens sailed from Seville, and reached the coast of Brazil in the middle of December. He then steered to the south, and, sailing close in shore, looked out anxiously to find a break in the continent which would let him into the great ocean that washed the shores of Asia, and encircled the rich islands of which he was in quest. The broad mouth of the La Plata lured him in at length. He entered it, but discovering soon that it was only a river, he dropped down the stream, and resumed his run along the coast.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 297.

1922. ESCAPE by Bravery. Battle of Hastings. [William the Norman addressed his troops:] There will be no safety in asking quarter or in flight; the English will never love or spare a Norman. Felons they were, and felons they are; false they were, and false they will be. Show no weakness toward them, for they will have no pity on you; neither the coward for running well, nor the bold man for smiting well, will be the better liked by the English, nor will any be the more spared on either account. You may fly to the sea, but you can fly no farther; you will find neither ships nor bridge there; there will be no sailors to receive you; and the English will overtake you there, and slay you in your shame. More of you will die in flight than in battle. Then, as flight will not secure you, fight, and you will conquer.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 308.

1923. ESCAPE difficult. Luther. Luther's friends, fearing that he would not be permitted to depart from the city, provided for him a horse and an old companion at arms, and dismissed him at night through a secret gate in the city walls. Thus he escaped upon a hard-riding trotter, in his monk's coat, without boots or pants, spurs or sword, travelling about forty miles before he sought rest. When he dismounted at the inn at Monheim he could hardly stand, and for weariness fell down upon the straw.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 5, p. 55.

1924. ESTRANGEMENT, Connubial. William and Mary. A time would come when the princess [Mary], who had been educated only to work embroidery, to play on the spinet, and to read the Bible and the "Whole Duty of Man," would be the chief of a great monarchy [the English], and would hold the balance of Europe, while her lord [William, Prince of Orange,] ambitious, versed in affairs, and bent on great enterprises, . . . would hold power only from her bounty and during her pleasure. . . . The Princess of Orange had not the faintest suspicion of her husband's feelings. Her preceptor, Bishop Compton, had instructed her carefully in religion, and had especially guarded her mind against the arts of Roman Catholic divines, but had left her profoundly ignorant of the English Constitution and of her own position. She knew that her marriage vow bound her to obey her husband; and it had never occurred to her that the relation in which they stood to each other might one day be inverted. She had been nine years married before she discovered the cause of William's discontent; nor would she ever have learned it from himself. In general, his temper inclined him rather to brood over his griefs than to give utterance to them; and in this particular case his lips were sealed by a very natural delicacy. At length a complete explanation and reconciliation were brought about by the agency of Gilbert Burnet.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 161.

1925. ETIQUETTE burdensome. Edward IV. [In 1466 a Bohemian nobleman and suite were entertained by Edward IV.] Having been feasted himself . . . he was conducted into a costly ornamented room, where the queen was to dine. . . . "The queen sat down on a golden stool, alone at her table; and her mother and the king's sister stood far below her. And when the queen spoke to [them] they kneeled down every time before her, and remained kneeling until the queen drank water. And all her ladies and maids, and those who waited upon her, even great lords, had to kneel while she was eating, which continued three hours. After dinner there was dancing, but the queen continued sitting upon her stool, and her mother knelt before her."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 11, p. 170.

1926. ETIQUETTE, Questions of. American. In the first months of his administration Washington was much vexed about questions of ceremony and etiquette. How should he appear in public? How often? What kind of entertainment should he give? What title should he bear, and in what manner be introduced? . . . He must not, on the one hand, demean himself like a king, surrounded with peers and courtiers; nor, on the other hand, must he degrade his high office by such blunt democratic ceremonies as would render himself ridiculous and the Presidency contemptible. In this embarrassment Washington sought the advice of Adams, Jefferson, Hamilton, and others. . . . Adams, in answer, would have much ceremony; Jefferson, none at all. The letter said: "I hope that the terms Excellency, Honor, Worship, Esquire, and even Mr. shall shortly and forever disappear from among us." Hamilton's reply favored a moderate and simple formality, and this view was adopted by Washington.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 46, p. 365.

1927. ETIQUETTE, Restraints of. Princess Anne. The princess became impatient of the restraints which etiquette imposed on her. She could not bear the words Madam and Royal Highness from [Sarah Churchill] the lips of one who was more to her than a sister. . . . Anne was Mrs. Morley; Lady Churchill was Mrs. Freeman; and under those childish names was carried on, during twenty years, a correspondence on which, at last, the fate of administrations and dynasties depended.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 238.

1928. EULOGISM, Sublime. By General Henry Lee. Washington . . . "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 16.

1929. EVASION, Deceptive. Samuel Johnson. [He wrote for the Adventurer.] Johnson's saying, "I have no part in the paper beyond now and then a motto," may seem inconsistent with his being the author of the papers marked T. But he had, at this time, written only one number; and besides, even at any after period, he might have used the same expression, considering it as a point of honor not to own them; for Mrs. Williams told me that, "as he had given those essays to Dr. Bathurst, who sold them at two guineas each, he never would own them; nay, he used to say he did not write them; but the fact was, that he dictated them, while Bathurst wrote."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 66.

1930. EVASION, Legal. Reversal. It is said, that when the ambassadors from Lacedæmon came . . . to Athens [to arrange the terms of peace, they were deterred by a decree against the Megarensians, their enemies]. Pericles pretended there was a law which forbade the taking down any tablet on which a decree of the people was written. "Then," said Polyarces, one of the ambassadors, "do not take it down, but turn the other side outward; there is no law against that." Notwithstanding the pleasantry of this answer, Pericles relented not in the least.—PLUTARCH'S PERICLES.

1931. EVIDENCE, Abundant. Impossible. [Mahomet was inclined to jealousy, yet he] published a law of domestic peace, that no woman should be condemned unless four male witnesses had seen her in the act of adultery.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 150.

1932. EVIDENCE, Circumstantial. Nero's Persecution. When once the Christians were pointed out to the popular vengeance, many reasons would be adduced to prove their connection with the conflagration. Temples had perished—and were they not notorious enemies of the temples? Did not popular rumor charge them with nocturnal orgies and Thyestæan feasts? Suspicions of incendiarism were sometimes brought against Jews; but the Jews were not in the habit of talking, as these sectaries were, about a fire which should consume the world, and rejoicing in the prospect of that fiery consummation. Nay, more, when Pagans had bewailed the destruction of the city and the loss of the ancient monuments of Rome, had not these pernicious people used ambiguous language, as though they joyously recognized in these events the signs of a coming end? Even when they tried to suppress all outward tokens of exultation, had they not listened to the fears and lamentations of their fellow-citizens with some sparkle in the eyes, and had they not answered with something of triumph in their tones?—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 4, p. 37.

1933. EVIDENCE, Conflicting. Napoleon I. [After defeating the mob in the streets of Paris] a fish-woman, of enormous rotundity of person, exhorted the mob, with the most vehement volubility, not to disperse, exclaiming, "Never mind those coxcombs with epaulets on their shoulders; they care not if we poor people all starve, if they can but feed well and grow fat!" Napoleon, who was thin and meagre as a shadow, turned to her and said: "Look at me, my good woman, and tell me which of us two is the fatter." The Amazon was completely disconcerted by this happy repartee, and the crowd in good-humor dispersed.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 3.

1934. EVIDENCE, Constructive. Trial of Strafford. Never did an arraigned prisoner reply with greater majesty of innocence than did Strafford in his last defence before his accusers and his king. Neither Athens nor Rome records any incident of more tragic sublimity in the united annals. "Unable to find in my conduct," said Strafford to his judges, "anything to which might be applied the name or punishment of treason, my enemies have invented, in defiance of all law, a chain of constructive and accumulative evidence, by which my actions, although innocent and laudable when taken separately, viewed in this collected light, become treasonable. It is hard to be questioned on a law which cannot be shown. Where hath this fire lain hid so many hundreds of years, without smoke to discover it, till it thus bursts forth to consume me and my children? It is better to be without laws altogether than to persuade ourselves that we have laws by which to regulate our conduct, and to find that they consist only in the enmity and arbitrary will of our accusers. If a man sails upon the Thames in a boat, and splits himself upon an anchor, and no buoy be floating to discover it, he who owneth the anchor shall make satisfaction; but if a buoy be set there, every one passeth it at his own peril. Now, where is the mark, where the tokens upon this crime, to declare it to be high treason? It has remained hidden under the water; no human prudence or innocence could preserve me from the ruin with which it menaces me. For two hundred and forty years every species of treason has been defined, and during that long space of time I am the first, I am the only exception for whom the definition has been enlarged, that I may be enveloped in its meshes."—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 11.

1935. EVIDENCE, Convincing. Samuel Johnson. After we came out of the church, we stood talking for some time together of Bishop Berkeley's ingenious sophistry to prove the non-existence of matter, and that everything in the universe is merely ideal. I observed, that though we are satisfied his doctrine is not true, it is impossible to refute it. I never shall forget the alacrity with which Johnson answered, striking his foot with mighty force against a large stone, till he rebounded from it, "I refute it thus."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 131.

1936. EVIDENCE, Discredited. James II. James informed this great assembly [of notables] that he thought it necessary to produce proofs of the birth of his son. The arts of bad men had poisoned the public mind to such an extent that very many believed the Prince of Wales to be a supposititious child; but Providence had graciously ordered things so that scarcely any prince had ever come into the world in the presence of so many witnesses. All who were present appeared to be satisfied. The evidence was instantly published, and was allowed by judicious and impartial persons to be decisive. But the judicious are always a minority; and scarcely anybody was then impartial. The whole nation was convinced that all sincere papists thought it a duty to perjure themselves whenever they could, by perjury, serve the interests of their Church. Men who, having been bred Protestants, had, for the sake of lucre, pretended to be converted to popery, were, if possible, less trustworthy even than sincere papists. The depositions of all who belonged to these two classes were therefore regarded as mere nullities.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 434.

1937. EVIDENCE, External. Gnostics. As the Christian religion was received, at first, by many, from the conviction of its truth from external evidence, and without a due examination of its doctrines, it was not surprising that many who called themselves Christians should retain the doctrines of a prevailing philosophy to which they have been accustomed, and endeavor to accommodate these to the system of revelation, which they found in the sacred volumes.<sup>6</sup> Such, for example, were the Christian Gnostics, who intermixed the doctrines of the Oriental philosophy concerning the two separate principles, a good and an evil, with the precepts of Christianity, and admitted the authority of Zoroaster, as an inspired personage, equally with that of Jesus Christ. Such likewise were the sect of the Ammonians, who vainly endeavored to reconcile together the opinions of all the different schools of the pagan philosophy, and attempted, with yet greater absurdity, to accommodate all these to the doctrines of Christianity. From this confusion of the pagan philosophy with the plain and simple doctrines of the Christian religion, the Church, in this period of its infant state, suffered in a most essential manner.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 4.

1938. EVIDENCE of common Fame. Monmouth's Rebellion. The fact that Monmouth was in arms against the government was so notorious that the bill of attainder became a law with only a faint show of opposition from one or two peers, and has seldom been censured even by Whig historians; yet when we consider how important it is that legislative and judicial functions should be kept distinct, how important it is that common fame, however strong and general, should not be received as a legal proof of guilt, how important it is to maintain the rule that no man shall be condemned to death without an opportunity of defending himself, and how easily and speedily breaches in great principles, when once made, are widened, we shall probably be disposed to think that the course taken by the Parliament was open to some objection. Neither house had before it anything which even so corrupt a judge as Jeffreys could have directed a jury to consider as proof of Monmouth's crime.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 538.

1939. EVIDENCE, Forced. Knights Templars. On the 13th of October, 1307, not only Du Molay, but all the Knights Templars throughout the realm of France, were arrested and thrown into prison; and Philip [IV.] proceeded in person to the vast fortress of the Temple at Paris, of which he took forcible possession. Certain secret revelations had been made to the king by two renegade members of the Order, who had been condemned for gross misconduct and imprisoned for life; and the Templars were charged upon their testimony with the most monstrous crimes, including systematic blasphemy and impiety, shameless immorality, and deliberate apostasy from the Christian faith. One hundred and forty of the prisoners were immediately examined before the Grand Inquisitor at Paris; and the severest tortures having been employed to extract confession, admissions were obtained which seemed to a great extent to establish their guilt.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 9, § 19, p. 188.

1940. EVIDENCE, Impossible. Mutiny. In their secret conferences they exclaimed against him as a desperado, bent, in a mad phantasy, upon doing something extravagant to render himself notorious. What were their sufferings and dangers to one evidently content to sacrifice his own life for the chance of distinction? . . . As an effectual means of preventing his complaints, they might throw him into the sea, and give out that he had fallen overboard while busy with his instruments contemplating the stars; a report which no one would have either the inclination or the means to controvert. Columbus was not ignorant of the mutinous disposition of his crew, but he still maintained a serene and steady countenance; soothing some with gentle words; endeavoring to stimulate the pride or avarice of others, and openly menacing the refractory with signal punishment, should they do anything to impede the voyage.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 3, ch. 4.

1941. EVIDENCE, Indisputable. Coat of Mail. [In 1405 Archbishop Scrope joined a rebellion against Henry IV. He was taken and beheaded. The pope claimed that the king had no jurisdiction over a prelate—that it was an offence against the Church, and he] issued a temporary sentence of excommunication against all who had been concerned in his death. There is a story [that Henry] charged a messenger to deliver the armor of the archbishop to the pope, with these words of the brothers of Joseph: "Lo! this we have found; we know not whether it be thy son's coat or no."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 3, p. 50.

1942. EVIDENCE, Inferential. Cæsar. [The young desperado Clodius evidently sought to corrupt the wife of Cæsar.] Cæsar . . . divorced Pompeia; yet, when called as an evidence on the trial, he declared he knew nothing of what was alleged against Clodius [who was reputed to have injured her virtue]. As this declaration appeared somewhat strange, the accuser demanded why, if that was the case, he had divorced his wife: "Because," said he, "I would have the chastity of my wife clear even of suspicion."—PLUTARCH'S CÆSAR.

1943. EVIDENCE manufactured. Nicias. [The Athenian general] gave not only to those who deserved his bounty, but to such as might be able to do him harm ; and bad men found resources in his fears, as well as good men in his liberality. . . . Teleclides introduced a trading-informer speaking thus : " Charicles would not give one mina to prevent my declaring that he was the first-fruits of his mother's amours ; but Nicias, the son of Niceratus, gave me four. Why he did it, I shall not say, though I know it perfectly well. For Nicias is my friend, a very wise man besides, in my opinion."—PLUTARCH'S NICIAS.

1944. EVIDENCE perverted. Mahomet. Some authors consider the fits of the prophet as the principal evidence of his mission. . . . They were preceded by great depression of spirits, and his face was clouded ; and they were ushered in by coldness of the extremities and shivering. He shook as if he were suffering from ague, and called out for covering. His mind was in a most painfully excited state. He heard a tinkling in his ears, as if bells were ringing, or a humming, as if bees were swarming round his head, and his lips quivered ; but this motion was under the control of volition. If the attack proceeded beyond this stage, his eyes became fixed and staring, and the motions of his head convulsive and automatic. At length perspiration broke out, which covered his face in large drops ; and with this ended the attack. . . . Sometimes, however, if he had a violent fit, he fell comatose to the ground, like a person who is intoxicated ; and (at least at a later period of his life) his face was flushed, and his respiration stertorous, and he remained in that state for some time. The bystanders sprinkled water in his face.—NOTE IN GIBBON'S MAHOMET, p. 53.

1945. EVIDENCE of Prejudice. James I. In the second year of this reign was framed another plot, . . . one of the most infernal that ever entered into the human breast to conceive—the Gunpowder Treason. . . . This conspiracy . . . had for its object to cut off at one blow the king and the whole body of the Parliament. . . . It had originated from the disgust and disappointment of the Catholics, who, on the accession of James, the son of a Catholic, had formed to themselves illusive hopes of the establishment of their religion. . . . The conduct of the king in the punishment of this conspiracy was an instance of moderation, if not of humanity. The majority of his people would have gladly seen an utter extinction of all the Catholics in the kingdom. But James confined the vengeance of the laws to those only who were actually engaged in the plot—a measure which was by a great part of his subjects construed into his own tacit inclination to favor the popish superstitions—an idea, of which the absurdity was yet greater than its illiberality.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 29.

1946. EVIDENCE, Presumptive. Reign of Charles II. [During the fight occasioned by Titus Oates' pretended popery plot.] Edward Coleman, a very busy and not very honest Roman Catholic intriguer, had been among the persons accused. Search was made for his papers. It was found that he had just destroyed the greater part of them ; but a few which had escaped contained some passages which, to minds strongly prepossessed, might seem to confirm the evidence of Oates. . . . But the country was not then inclined to construe the letters of papists candidly ; and it was urged, with some show of reason, that if papers which had been passed over as unimportant were filled with matter so suspicious, some great mystery of iniquity must have been contained in those documents which had been carefully committed to the flames.—MACAULAY'S HIST., ch. 2, p. 218.

1947. EVIDENCE, Purchase of. Reign of James II. [Papists] accused [William Douglas,] the treasurer, not only of extenuating the crime of the insurgents, but of having himself prompted it, and did all in their power to obtain evidence of his guilt. One of the ringleaders, who had been taken, was offered a pardon if he would own that Queensberry had set him on ; but the same religious enthusiasm which had impelled the unhappy prisoner to criminal violence prevented him from purchasing his life by a calumny. He and several of his accomplices were hanged. [James sought to advance the Catholic religion in Scotland, and a riot ensued.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 107.

1948. EVIDENCE, Refuted by. Peculation. The younger Scipio (Asiaticus) was soon after impeached for the same crime which had been matter of accusation against his brother. The tribunes, it seems, were determined to have at least one victim from that illustrious house of the Corneli. He was condemned to pay a heavy fine, as is generally believed, upon false evidence ; for when his whole property was seized, his poverty disproved the calumnious accusation, and the Senate decreed him a high recompense for the injury he had sustained.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 9, p. 381.

1949. EVIDENCE rejected. Roman General Belisarius. Before her marriage with Belisarius, Antonina had one husband and many lovers ; Photius, the son of her former nuptials, was of an age to distinguish himself at the siege of Naples ; and it was not till the autumn of her age and beauty that she indulged a scandalous attachment to a Thracian youth. Theodosius had been educated in the Eunomian heresy ; the African voyage was consecrated by the baptism and auspicious name of the first soldier who embarked ; and the proselyte was adopted into the family of his spiritual parents, Belisarius and Antonina. Before they touched the shores of Africa, this holy kindred degenerated into sensual love ; and as Antonina soon overleaped the bounds of modesty and caution, the Roman general was alone ignorant of his own dishonor. During their residence at Carthage, he surprised the two lovers in a subterraneous chamber, solitary, warm, and almost naked. Anger flashed from his eyes. " With the help of this young man," said the unblushing Antonina, " I was secreting our most precious effects from the knowledge of Justinian."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41, p. 184.

1950. EVIDENCE, Religious. Joan of Arc. The English, wild with hate and humiliation, urged and threatened. So great was their rage against the Pucelle, that they burned a woman alive for speaking well of her. If the Pucelle herself were not tried, condemned, and burned as a sorceress—if her victories were not set down as due to the devil, they would remain in the eyes of the people miracles, God's own works. The inference would be that God was against the English, that they had been rightfully and loyally defeated, and that their cause was the devil's. According to the notions of the time, there was no medium. A conclusion like this, intolerable to English pride, was infinitely more so to a government of bishops like that of England, and to the cardinal, its head.—MICHELET'S JOAN OF ARC, p. 29.

1951. EVIDENCE, Secondary. Samuel Johnson. As to the Christian religion, sir, besides the strong evidence which we have for it, there is a balance in its favor from the number of great men who have been convinced of its truth, after a serious consideration of the question. Grotius was an acute man, a lawyer, a man accustomed to examine evidence, and he was convinced. Grotius was not a recluse, but a man of the world, who certainly had no bias to the side of religion. Sir Isaac Newton set out an infidel, and came to be a very firm believer.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 125.

1952. EVIDENCE, Slender. Trial of Strafford. Strafford was brought to trial; he defended himself with great ability. The charge upon the whole was certainly relevant; but though it was apparent he had acted with great intemperance and indiscretion, nothing was proved which was sufficient to justify a penal conclusion. His enemies now found it necessary to attempt a new mode of prosecution, and this was the most unjustifiable part of their procedure. A bill of attainder was brought into the House of Commons, in which the principal proof adduced of Strafford's guilt was a scrap of paper in the handwriting of Sir Henry Vane, consisting of notes taken of a debate in the privy council on the subject of the war against the Scots, in which Strafford was said to have urged the king to go on to levy the ship-money, and to have hinted that he was now absolved from all rules of government. Six counsellors, together with Vane, had been present at this debate. Four of these declared that they recollected no such expressions of Strafford's; the other two could give no evidence, as one had left the country and the other was a state-prisoner. Vane's evidence, therefore, stood single and unsupported; yet a majority of the Commons passed the bill of attainder; and the Peers, intimidated by these violent and desperate measures, which made every man tremble for his own safety, [approved.]—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 29, p. 403.

1953. ———. Roman Emperor Domitian. The monster—for such his life declared him—contrived, like some of his unworthy predecessors, for awhile to conceal his vices. He affected to show a moderation and a love of justice, which gave promise of a happy reign; but his natural position soon unveiled itself. An insurrection, which happened at that time in Germany, gave him an opportunity of satiating himself with blood. The rebellion itself was speedily quelled, but its consequences were long deplored in the innumerable murders of the most respected among the citizens, for which the bare suspicion of having been concerned in the rebellion afforded always a sufficient pretext. Informers, that despicable brood, the scourge of men of worth, began again to swarm throughout the country; slaves were bribed to give evidence against their masters; pretenders to astrology were appointed to draw the horoscope of the principal citizens, the emperor ordering those to be put to death to whom fortune promised anything great or successful.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 3.

1954. EVIDENCE by Symbols. Barbarians. Some of the northern barbarous nations use, at this day, a mode of authenticating contracts by symbols, which is a nearer approach to the solemnity of writing. After the agreement is made, the parties cut a piece of wood irregularly into two tallies; each party keeps one of these, and both are given up and destroyed when the bargain is fulfilled. A custom of this kind supposes a state of society where all agreements are of the simplest nature; for these tallies, though they might certify the existence of a contract, could never give evidence of its tenor.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 3.

1955. EVIL overruled. Henry VIII. The origin of the Reformation in England is to be traced to a cause still more remote from the real interests of religion than that which gave rise to the Reformation in Germany. As early as the middle of the fourteenth century, the learned Wicliffe had begun an attack against many of the abuses in the Church of Rome, both in his sermons to the people and in his writings. . . . Such was the state of things at the beginning of the reign of Henry VIII., who was a prince zealously attached from education to the doctrines of the Church of Rome; but he was yet more addicted to the unrestrained gratification of his passions, and this, in fact, was one of the minor though immediate causes of the Reformation in England.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 20.

1956. EXAGGERATION, Barbarian. Majesty. The barbarian princes [under Attila] confessed, in the language of devotion or flattery, that they could not presume to gaze, with a steady eye, on the divine majesty of the king of the Huns.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 34, p. 391.

1957. EXAGGERATION detected. Samuel Johnson. The king then asked him what he thought of Dr. Hill. Johnson answered that he was an ingenious man, but had no veracity; and immediately mentioned, as an instance of it, an assertion of that writer, that he had seen objects magnified to a much greater degree by using three or four microscopes at a time than by using one. "Now," added Johnson, "every one acquainted with microscopes knows that the more of them he looks through the less the object will appear." "Why," replied the king, "this is not only telling an untruth, but telling it clumsily; for, if that be the case, every one who can look through a microscope will be able to detect him."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 151.

1958. EXAGGERATION, Impious. Political. There was launched from the Hague, in March, 1652, a virulent royalist piece in Latin, under the title of Regii sanguinis clamor ad cælum (Cry of the King's blood to Heaven against the English parricides). Its one hundred and sixty pages contained the usual royalist invective in a rather common style of hyperbolic declamation, such as that "in comparison of the execution of Charles I., the guilt of the Jews in crucifying Christ was as nothing."—MILTON, BY M. PAT-TISON, ch. 10.

1959. EXAMINATION needless. Samuel Johnson. Mrs. Montague, a lady distinguished for having written an essay on Shakespeare, being mentioned. REYNOLDS: "I think that essay does her honor." JOHNSON: "Yes, sir, it does her honor, but it would do nobody else honor. I have indeed not read it all. But when I take up the end of a web, and find it pack-thread, I do not expect, by looking farther, to find embroidery." —BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 164.

1960. EXAMPLE followed. Death. [The Moguls invaded China.] The obstinate remnant of independence and hostility was transported from the land to the sea. But when the fleet of the Song was surrounded and oppressed by a superior armament, their last champion leaped into the waves with his infant emperor in his arms. "It is more glorious," he cried, "to die a prince than to live a slave!" A hundred thousand Chinese imitated his example; and the whole empire, from Tonkin to the great wall, submitted to the dominion of Cublai.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 63.

1961. EXAMPLE, Instruction by. Gauls. [Siege of Rome.] Some of the barbarians employed in the siege, happening to pass by the place where Pontius had made his way by night up to the [Roman] Capitol, observed many traces of his feet and hands, as he had worked himself up the rock, torn off what grew there, and tumbled down the mould. Of this they informed the king, who, coming and viewing it, for the present said nothing; but in the evening he assembled the lightest and most active of his men, who were the likeliest to climb any difficult height, and thus addressed them: "The enemy have themselves shown us a way to reach them, which we were ignorant of, and have proved that this rock is neither inaccessible nor untrodden by human feet. What a shame would it be, then, after having made a beginning, not to finish; and to quit the place as impregnable, when the Romans themselves have taught us how to take it! Where it was easy for one man to ascend it cannot be difficult for many, one by one." . . . The foremost, having gained the top, put themselves in order, and were ready to take possession of the wall, and to fall upon the guards, who were fast asleep; for neither man nor dog perceived their coming. However, there were certain sacred geese kept near Juno's temple. . . . They immediately perceived the coming of the Gauls, and running at them with all the noise they could make, they awoke all the guards.—PLUTARCH'S CAMILLUS.

1962. EXAMPLE, Power of. Patriotism. A.D. 1774. But what most animated the country was the magnanimity of Boston; "suffering amazing loss, but determined to endure poverty and death rather than betray America and posterity." Its people, under the eyes of the [British] general, disregarding alike his army, his proclamations against a provincial congress, and the British statute against town-meetings, came together, according to their ancient forms; and with Samuel Adams as moderator elected delegates to the next provincial congress of Massachusetts.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 16.

1963. ——. General Jackson, 1812. During the winter Jackson's troops, unprovided and starving, became mutinous, and were going home.

But the general set the example of living on acorns; then rode before the rebellious line, and threatened with death the first mutineer that stirred. And no man stirred.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 50, p. 403.

1964. ——. John Huss. A few months afterward Jerome of Prague, the disciple and the friend of John Huss, underwent the same fate with his master. He was a man of superior talents and of great eloquence. The fear of death was at first too powerful, and he signed a recantation of his opinions; but no sooner had he heard how his master had encountered death than he was ashamed to live. He publicly retracted his recantation, preached forth his doctrines, and was condemned to the flames. . . . These executions were attended with consequences to the emperor of which he had little expectation. The succession to the kingdom of Bohemia was opened to him by the death of his brother Wincellaus; but the Bohemians were so exasperated at the fate of their two countrymen, that it cost Sigismund a bloody war of sixteen years' continuance before he acquired the full possession of these dominions.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 11.

1965. ——. Peter the Great. The Strelitzes, a body of militia consisting of about 30,000 men, like the Turkish Janizaries, had frequently embroiled the empire by their seditions. Peter determined to abolish entirely this dangerous body, and for that purpose began with the formation of a regiment, which, by degrees, he increased to the number of 12,000 men. To set an example of subordination to his nobility, he served himself in the quality of a private soldier; thence advancing gradually to the rank of captain and general officer.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 35.

1966. EXAMPLE quoted. Samuel Johnson. Dr. Percy called upon Johnson to take him to Goldsmith's lodgings; he found Johnson arrayed with unusual care in a new suit of clothes, a new hat, and a well-powdered wig, and could not but notice his uncommon spruceness. "Why, sir," replied Johnson, "I hear that Goldsmith, who is a very great sloven, justifies his disregard of cleanliness and decency by quoting my practice, and I am desirous this night to show him a better example."—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 12, p. 91.

1967. EXASPERATION, Rashness of. Colonel Ethan Allen. A.D. 1775. [He failed in the attempt to surprise Montreal, and was taken prisoner.] At the barrack yard in Montreal, Prescott, a British brigadier, asked the prisoner, "Are you that Allen who took Ticonderoga?" "I am the very man," quoth Allen. Then Prescott, in great rage, called him a rebel and other hard names, and raised his cane. At this Allen shook his fist, telling him: "This is the beetle of mortality to you, if you offer to strike."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 52.

1968. EXCELLENCE, Cost of. Time. Antisthenes. . . when he was told that Ismenias played excellently upon the flute, answered properly enough, "Then he is good for nothing else; otherwise he would not have played so well." Such also was Philip's saying to his son, when at a certain entertainment he sang in a very agreeable and skilful manner: "Are you not ashamed to sing so well?" It is enough for a prince to bestow a vacant hour upon hearing others sing; and he does the muses sufficient honor if he attends the performances of those who excel in their arts. . . . If a man applies himself to servile or mechanical employments, his industry in those things is a proof of his inattention to nobler studies.—PLUTARCH'S PERICLES.

1669. EXCESS, Reaction of. Execution of Charles I. His long misgovernment, his innumerable perfidies, were forgotten. His memory was, in the minds of the great majority of his subjects, associated with those free institutions which he had, during many years, labored to destroy; for those free institutions had perished with him, and amid the mournful silence of a community kept down by arms, had been defended by his voice alone. From that day began a reaction in favor of monarchy and of the exiled house—a reaction which never ceased till the throne had again been set up in all its old dignity.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 120.

1670. EXCESSES, Ruinous. Charles XII. [King of Sweden.] His character, in a few words, is well summed up by Voltaire: "He carried all the virtues of a hero to that excess that they became as dangerous as their opposite vices. The obstinacy of his resolution occasioned all his misfortunes in the Ukraine, and kept him five years in Turkey. His liberality degenerating into profusion ruined his kingdom of Sweden. His courage pushed to temerity was the occasion of his death. His justice often amounted to cruelty; and in the last years of his life the maintenance of his authority approached to tyranny. His many great qualities, of which a single one might have immortalized another prince, were the ruin of his country. He never was the first to attack, but he was not always as prudent as he was implacable in his revenge. He was the first who had the ambition to be a conqueror without the desire of aggrandizing his dominions. He wished to gain empires only to give them away. His passion for glory, for war, and for revenge prevented his being a good politician, a quality without which there can be no great conqueror. Before he gave battle, and after he gained a victory, he was all modesty; after a defeat he was all resolution, rigid to others as to himself, counting for nothing the fatigues or the lives of his subjects any more than his own. He was, in short, a singular man rather than a great one—a character more to be admired than imitated.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 35, p. 482.

1671. EXCISE, Laws of. First English. The first imposition of a tax known as excise was by the Parliament after the civil war. Beer, ale, cider, and perry were so taxed in 1645. The Royalists raised money by a similar tax. These duties were continued at the Restoration, with additional imposts on the new luxuries of tea and coffee. In the reign of James II. there was a temporary excise upon wine. In the reign of William distilled liquors were thus taxed. The customs duties were greatly diminished by frauds of enormous magnitude.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 4, p. 69.

1672. EXCISE, Unexecuted. Robert Burns. [When excise officer,] a woman who had been brewing, on seeing Burns coming with another excise man, slipped out by the back door, leaving a servant and a little girl in the house. "Has there been any brewing for the fair here the day?" "Oh no, sir, we hae nae license for that," answered the servant maid. "That's no true," exclaimed the child; "the muckle black kist is fou' o' the bottles o' yill that my mither sat up a' nicht brewing for the fair." . . . "We are in a hurry just now," said Burns, "but when we return from the fair, we'll examine the muckle black kist."—SHARP'S BURNS, ch. 5.

1673. EXCITEMENT, Delusive. William of Orange. [In Devonshire] the very senses of the multitude were fooled by the imagination. News-letters conveyed to every part of the kingdom fabulous accounts of the size and strength of the invaders. It was affirmed that they were, with scarcely an exception, above six feet high, and that they wielded such huge pikes, swords, and muskets, as had never before been seen in England.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 452.

1674. EXCITEMENT of Discovery. California Gold. In the evening of February 2, 1848, James Marshall suddenly rode into the fort—his horse foaming, and both horse and rider splattered all over with mud. The man was laboring under wild excitement. Meeting Captain Sutter, he asked to be conducted to a room where they could converse alone. The astonished Sutter complied with his desire, and they entered a secluded apartment. Marshall closed the door, and asked Captain Sutter if he was certain they were safe from intrusion, and begged him to lock the door. The honest Sutter began to think the man was mad, and was a little alarmed at the idea of being locked in with a maniac. He assured Marshall that they were safe from interruption. Satisfied, at length, upon this point, he took from his pocket a pouch, from which he poured upon the table half a thimbleful of yellow grains of metal, with the exclamation that he thought they were gold. "Where did you get it?" asked Captain Sutter. Marshall replied that, early that morning, the water being shot off from the mill-race, as usual, he noticed, in passing along, shining particles scattered about on the bottom. He picked up several, and, finding them to be metal, the thought had burst upon his mind that they might be gold. Having gathered about an ounce of them, he had mounted his horse and ridden forty miles to impart the momentous secret to his employer, and bring the yellow substance to some scientific test. Captain Sutter was at first disposed to laugh at his excited friend. Among his stores, however, he happened to have a bottle of aqua-fortis, and the action of this powerful acid upon the yellow particles at once proved them to be pure gold!—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 525.

1675. EXCITEMENT, Popular. Assassination of Cæsar. Mark Antony took advantage of these favorable dispositions. The body being laid on a couch of state in the forum, he mounted the consul's tribunal, and after reading the decree of the Senate, which had conferred upon Cæsar even the honors due to a divinity, he entered into an enumeration of all his illustrious achievements for the glory and aggrandizement of the state; he then proceeded to recount the examples of his clemency, and heightened all his virtues with the most pathetic eloquence. "By these titles we have sworn that his person should be held sacred and inviolable; and here," said he, "behold the force of our oaths." At these words he lifted up the robe which covered the body, and holding it out to the people, who melted into tears, he showed it all covered with blood and pierced with the daggers of the conspirators. A general cry of vengeance was heard.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 2, p. 416.

1976. EXCOMMUNICATION or Money. Papal. [Henry III. had received at the hands of the pope the crown of Sicily for his son Edmund.] The pope had really advanced a large sum, which Henry could not repay; and a Roman agent came before Parliament, and followed up his demand for instant payment by a threat of excommunication and general interdict.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 24, p. 367.

1977. EXCUSE abandoned. Ligarius. In Pompey's party [against Cæsar] there was one Quintus Ligarius, whom Cæsar had pardoned, though he had borne arms against him. This man, less grateful for the pardon he had received than offended with the powers which made him stand in need of it, hated Cæsar, but was the intimate friend of Brutus. The latter one day visited him, and finding him not well, said, "O Ligarius! what a time is this to be sick!" Upon which he raised himself on his elbow, and taking Brutus by the hand, answered, "If Brutus has any design worthy of himself, Ligarius is well."—PLUTARCH'S MARCUS BRUTUS.

1978. EXCUSES, Ignominious. James II. [He had been accused of acting] undutifully and disrespectfully toward France [the national enemy of England]. He led [the French minister] Barillon into a private room, and there apologized for having dared to take so important a step [as to call a Parliament] without the previous sanction of Louis. "Assure your master," said James, "of my gratitude and attachment. I know that without his protection I can do nothing. I know what troubles my brother brought upon himself for not steadily adhering to France. I will take good care not to let the houses meddle with foreign affairs. If I see in them any disposition to make mischief, I will send them about their business. Explain this to my good brother. I hope that he will not take it amiss that I have acted without consulting him."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 425.

1979. EXECUTION, Brutal. Duke of Monmouth. The hangman addressed himself to his office; but he had been disconcerted by what the duke had said. The first blow inflicted only a slight wound. The duke struggled, rose from the block, and looked reproachfully at the executioner. The head sank down once more. The stroke was repeated again and again; but still the neck was not severed, and the body continued to move. Yells of rage and horror rose from the crowd. Ketch flung down the axe with a curse. "I cannot do it," he said; "my heart fails me." "Take up the axe, man," cried the sheriff. "Fling him over the rails," roared the mob. At length the axe was taken up. Two more blows extinguished the last remains of life; but a knife was used to separate the head from the shoulders. The crowd was wrought up to such an ecstasy of rage that the executioner was in danger of being torn in pieces, and was conveyed away under a strong guard.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 581.

1980. EXECUTION, Inhuman. Kirke. [Commander under James II.; execution of rebels under the Duke of Monmouth.] The sign-post of the White Hart Inn served for a gallows. It is said that the work of death went on in sight of the windows where the officers of the Tangier regiment were carousing, and that at every health a wretch was turned off. When the legs of the dying men quivered in the last agony, the colonel ordered the drums to strike up. He would give the rebels, he said, music to their dancing.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 587.

1981. EXERCISE, Important. Military. So sensible were the Romans of the imperfection of valor without skill and practice, that in their language the name of an army was borrowed from the word which signified exercise. Military exercises were the important and unremitted object of their discipline. The recruits and young soldiers were constantly trained, both in the morning and in the evening, nor was age or knowledge allowed to excuse the veterans from the daily repetition of what they had completely learned. Large sheds were erected in the winter quarters of the troops, that their useful labors might not receive any interruption from the most tempestuous weather; and it was carefully observed that the arms destined to this imitation of war should be of double the weight which was required in real action.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1, p. 12.

1982. EXERTION, Absorbed by. Napoleon I. [The night before the battle of Waterloo.] For eighteen hours the emperor had tasted neither sleep, repose, nor nourishment. His clothes were covered with mud and soaked with rain. But regardless of exposure and fatigue, he did not seek even to warm himself by the fires.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 27.

1983. EXHIBITION, Immense. Centennial. The entire area of the ground floor [of the Main Building] was 872,320 square feet; of the floors of the projections, 37,344 feet; of the tower floors, 26,344, making an aggregate area of 936,008 square feet, or 21 and  $\frac{2}{3}$  acres! The ground floor proper covered a space of a little more than 20 acres. [Length, 1880 feet; breadth, 464 feet; general height within, 70 feet; principal arcades, 100 feet high.]—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 68, p. 577.

1984. EXPECTATION, Delusive. Columbus. [On his second voyage.] One old man brought two pieces of virgin ore, weighing an ounce, and thought himself richly repaid when he received a hawk's bell. On remarking that the admiral was struck with the size of these specimens, he affected to treat them with contempt, as insignificant, intimating by signs that in his country, which lay within half a day's journey, they found pieces of gold as big as an orange. Other Indians brought grains of gold weighing ten and twelve drachms, and declared that in the country whence they got them there were masses of ore as large as the head of a child. As usual, however, these golden tracts were always in some remote valley, or along some rugged and sequestered stream; and the wealthiest spot was sure to be at the greatest distance—for the land of promise is ever beyond the mountain.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 6, ch. 9.

1985. EXPECTATIONS, Popular. Civil War. It was said at the beginning of the war that while cotton would "bring Europe to its knees," the Southern privateers would cut up the commerce of the North, and soon bring the mercenary and money-making spirits of that section to repentance. Neither result was realized.—POLLARD'S FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 8, p. 212.

1986. EXPEDITION, Remarkable. Fernando de Soto. At his own dictation he was . . . appointed [A.D. 1537] governor of Cuba and Florida, with the privilege of exploring and conquering the latter country. . . . A great company of young Spaniards, nearly all of them wealthy and high born, flocked to his standard. Of these he selected 600 of the most gallant and daring. They were clad in costly suits of armor of the knightly pattern, with airy scarfs and silken embroidery and all the trappings of chivalry. Elaborate preparations were made for the great conquest. . . . Arms and stores; shackles . . . for the slaves; tools; . . . bloodhounds were bought and trained for the hunting of fugitives; cards to keep the young knights excited with gaming; twelve priests; and, last of all, a drove of swine to fatten on the maize and mast of the country. . . . After a year of impatience and delay . . . the gay Castilian squadron, ten vessels in all, left the harbor of San Lucas to conquer imaginary empires in the New World. [A constantly wasting number marched from Florida northward and westward, until overcome by melancholy and exhaustion. De Soto died, and was buried in the Mississippi River near Natchez. Mexico was no longer sought. After great sufferings the 311 heart-broken fugitives reached the Gulf.] Thus ended the most marvellous expedition in the early history of our country.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 4, p. 66.

1987. EXPENSE, Divisions by. Thirteen States. After [the Revolutionary War] the first great duty of the new government was to provide for the payment of the war debt, which had now reached the sum of $38,000,000. Congress could only recommend to the several States the levying of a sufficient tax to meet the indebtedness. Some of the States made the required levy; others were dilatory; others refused. At the very outset the government was balked and thwarted. The serious troubles that attended the disbanding of the army were traceable rather to the inability than the indisposition of Congress to pay the soldiers. The princely fortune of Robert Morris was exhausted, and himself brought to poverty in a vain effort to sustain the credit of the government. For three years after the treaty of peace public affairs were in a condition bordering on chaos. . . . It was seen unless the Articles of Confederation could be replaced with a better system, the nation would go to ruin. [Hence came the present national union of the States.] —RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 45, p. 358.

1988. EXPERIENCE, Guidance of. Bartholomew Dias. [Exploring the west coast of Africa.] As the ships advanced toward the south, the astonishment of the navigators was unbounded when they found the weather daily growing colder. This was contrary to all past experience. No European had ever before gone far enough south of the equator to discover that the temperature lowers as you go south of the equator in the same proportion as when you go north of it. This fact was the first great discovery of Dias and his followers.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 285.

1989. EXPERIENCE, Needless. War of 1812. The waters of Lake Erie were commanded by a British squadron of six vessels, carrying sixty-three guns. It was seen that a successful invasion of Canada could only be made by first gaining control of the lake. This serious undertaking was imposed on Commodore Oliver H. Perry, of Rhode Island, a young man not twenty-eight years old, who had never been in a naval battle. His antagonist, Commodore Barclay, was a veteran from the sea-service of Europe. With indefatigable energy Perry directed the construction of nine ships carrying fifty-four guns. [After the battle] he sent to General Harrison this famous despatch: "We have met the enemy, and they are ours—two ships, two brigs, one schooner, and one sloop."—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 50, p. 401.

1990. EXPERIENCE, Personal. John Howard. [The vessel in which he was sailing for Lisbon was captured by a French privateer, and all on board were made prisoners of war.] He now . . . was called to endure the anguish "which wretches feel," and which he spent laborious years in assuaging. The privateer was forty hours in reaching the nearest French port; and during that time the prisoners had not a drop of water nor an atom of food. Arriving at Brest, they were thrust into a filthy dungeon under ground, and there again they were kept miserable hours without nourishment. At length a joint of mutton was thrown down into their dungeon, like meat into a dog-kennel; and this, for want of a knife, they were obliged to tear to pieces with their hands. For six days and nights they were detained in this damp and stinking hole, gnawing bones, and sleeping upon wet straw. [This was the beginning of his great life-work in ameliorating the sufferings of prisoners.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 84.

1991. EXPERIENCE, Test of. Samuel Johnson. The conversation then took a philosophical turn. JOHNSON: "Human experience, which is constantly contradicting theory, is the greatest test of truth. A system, built upon the discoveries of a great many minds, is always of more strength than what is produced by the mere workings of any one mind, which, of itself, can do little. There is not so poor a book in the world that would not be a prodigious effort were it wrought out entirely by a single mind, without the aid of prior investigators. The French writers are superficial, because they are not scholars, and so proceed upon the mere power of their own minds; and we see how very little power they have."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 125.

1992. EXPERIMENT, Incomplete. Professor Benjamin Silliman. [The great American scientist.] An instance of the lecturer's want of skill used to be related by Professor Silliman. After informing the class, one day, that life could not be sustained in hydrogen gas, a hen was placed under a bell glass filled with hydrogen. The hen gasped, kicked, and was still. "There, gentlemen," said the lecturer, "you see she is dead." He had no sooner uttered these words than the hen overturned the bell glass and flew screaming across the room, flapping with her wings the heads of the students, who roared with laughter.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 597.

1993. EXPERIMENT, Scientific. Isaac Newton. On the day of Cromwell's death, when [Sir Isaac] Newton was sixteen, a great storm raged over all England. He used to say in his old age, that on that day he made his first purely scientific experiment. To ascertain the force of the wind, he first jumped with the wind and then against it; and by comparing these distances with the extent of his own jump on a calm day, he was enabled to compute the force of the storm. When the wind blew thereafter, he used to say it was so many feet strong.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 248.

1994. EXPERT by Practice. Sir George Jeffrey. During many years his chief business was to examine and cross-examine the most hardened miscreants of a great capital. Daily conflicts with prostitutes and thieves called out and exercised his powers so effectually, that he became the most consummate bully ever known in his profession. All tenderness for the feelings of others, all self-respect, all sense of the becoming, were obliterated from his mind. He acquired a boundless command of the rhetoric in which the vulgar express hatred and contempt. The profusion of maledictions and vituperative epithets which composed his vocabulary could hardly have been rivalled in the fish-market or the bear-garden. His countenance and his voice must always have been unamiable; but these natural advantages—for such he seems to have thought them—he had improved to such a degree that there were few who, in his paroxysms of rage, could see or hear him without emotion. Impudence and ferocity sat upon his brow. The glare of his eyes had a fascination for the unhappy victim on whom they were fixed; yet his brow and eye were said to be less terrible than the savage lines of his mouth. His yell of fury, as was said by one who had often heard it, sounded like the thunder of the judgment-day. These qualifications he carried, while still a young man, from the bar to the bench.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 418.

1995. EXPLANATION, Relief by. Louis Philippe. [A disguised exile, with a great reward offered for his arrest.] Once, and once only, he heard his ancestral name pronounced. Having spent a day in the country with the family at whose house he boarded (in Christiana, Norway), just as they were about to summon their vehicles to return to the town, a young man of the party cried out in French: "The carriage of the Duke of Orleans!" Penetrated with alarm, the prince had self-control enough not to betray any agitation; and seeing that the young man did not look at him, he ventured to inquire in a careless tone why he had called the Duke of Orleans' carriage, and what relations he had with the duke. "None," replied the youth; "but when I was at Paris, whenever we came from the opera, I heard repeated from all quarters, 'The carriage of the Duke of Orleans.' I have been more than once stunned with the noise, and I just took it into my head to make the same exclamation." The prince, as may be imagined, was much relieved by this explanation.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 506.

1996. EXPOSURE of Purpose. James II. [Clarendon, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and Halifax, Lord-Treasurer of England, two noted Protestants, were dismissed from office.] The dismissal of the two brothers is a great epoch in the reign of James. From that time it was clear that what he really wanted was not liberty of conscience for the members of his own church, but liberty to persecute the members of other churches. Pretending to abhor tests, he had himself imposed a test. He thought it monstrous that able and loyal men should be excluded from the public service solely for being Roman Catholics. Yet he had turned out of office a treasurer whom he admitted had been both loyal and able, solely for being a Protestant. The cry was, that a general proscription was at hand, and that every public functionary must make up his mind to lose his soul or lose his place.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 148.

1997. EXPOSURE, Threat of. Reign of James II. [Tyrconnel was anxious to be Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland.] All opposition, however, yielded to Tyrconnel's energy and cunning. He fawned, bullied, and bribed indefatigably. Petre's help was secured by flattery. Sunderland was plied at once with promises and menaces. . . . Tyrconnel threatened to let the king know that [Sunderland] the lord president had, at the Friday dinners, described his Majesty as a fool, who must be governed either by a woman or by a priest. Sunderland, pale and trembling, offered to procure for Tyrconnel supreme military command, enormous appointments—anything but the vice-royalty; but all compromise was rejected; and it was necessary to yield. . . . With a chain of pearls he . . . boasted . . . he had purchased the support of the queen. [He succeeded.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 145.

1998. EXPULSION of Scholars. James II. [The fellows of Magdalen College refused to vote for James' nominee for president, as he favored the overthrow of the Protestant faith.] Then the king, as he had threatened, laid on them the whole weight of his hand. They were by one sweeping edict condemned to expulsion. Yet this punishment was not deemed sufficient. It was known that many noblemen and gentlemen who possessed church patronage would be disposed to provide for men who had suffered so much for the laws of England and for the Protestant religion. The High Commission therefore pronounced the ejected fellows incapable of ever holding any church preferment. Such of them as were not yet in holy orders were pronounced incapable of receiving the clerical character. James might enjoy the thought that he had reduced many of them from a situation in which they were surrounded by comforts, and had before them the fairest professional prospects, to hopeless indigence. But all these severities produced an effect directly the opposite of that which he had anticipated. [See No. 2.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 279.

1999. EXTERMINATION, War of. *Queen Anne's War. The Indians vanished when their homes were invaded; they could not be reduced by the usual methods of warfare; hence a bounty was offered for every Indian scalp; to regular forces . . . the grant was £10; to volunteers in actual service twice that sum; but if men would of themselves . . . make up parties and patrol the forests in search of Indians, as . . . for wild beasts, . . . £50 per scalp.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 21.

2000. EXTORTION complete. *England. Longchamp [who had charge of the English Government in the absence of Richard I., the crusader] and his revellers had so exhausted the whole kingdom, that they did not leave a man his belt, a woman her necklace, nor a nobleman his ring.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 22, p. 315.

2001. EXTORTION, Cruel. *Jews. [In 1211] the memorable expedient of drawing a tooth daily from a Jew at Bristol, until he paid down 10,000 marks, is recorded in connection with the expedition of [King John] into Ireland.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 23, p. 339.

2002. ———. *Massachusetts Colony. The summer of 1621 was unfruitful, and the pilgrims were brought to the point of starvation. To make their condition still more grievous, a new company of emigrants, without provisions or stores, arrived, and were quartered on the colonists during the fall and winter. For six months together the settlers were obliged to subsist on half-allowance. At one time only a few grains of parched corn remained to be distributed, and at another there was absolute destitution. In this state of affairs English fishing vessels came to Plymouth and charged the starving colonies two prices for food enough to keep them alive.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 13, p. 125.

2003. EXTORTION, Dilemma in. *Henry VII. The chief aim of the king was the accumulation of a treasure which should relieve him from the need of ever appealing for its aid. Subsidies granted for the support of wars which Henry evaded formed the base of royal treasure, which was swelled by the revival of dormant claims of the Crown, by the exaction of fines for the breach of forgotten tenures, and by a host of petty extortions. Benevolences were again revived. A dilemma of Henry's minister, which received the name of "Morton's fork," extorted gifts to the exchequer from men who lived handsomely on the ground that their wealth was manifest, and from those who lived plainly on the plea that economy had made them wealthy. Still greater sums were drawn from those who were compromised in the revolts which checkered the king's rule.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 496.

2004. EXTORTION of Government. *Charles I. [In 1633 Charles I. employed a commission to harass every owner of a new house, by levying enormous fines or commanding the houses to be pulled down. There had been proclamations by James and Charles against the increase of buildings in London, in order to preserve the health of the city; fines were accepted in lieu of removal of buildings. A Mr. Moore was fined £2000 by the Star-Chamber for not having pulled his houses down by Easter.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 26, p. 416.

2005. EXTORTION misnamed. *Edward IV. Edward IV. had been accustomed to plunder his subjects under the name of "Benevolences," which practice the Duke of Buckingham defined to be "that every man should pay, not what he of his own good-will list, but what the king of his own good-will list to take."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 12, p. 199.

2006. EXTORTION, Outrageous. *Romans in Briton. [The Roman officials, after the conquest of Briton,] seized upon the corn, and made the people buy it for their own consumption.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 3, p. 35.

2007. EXTORTION, Royal. *Richard II. In the face of his declared amnesty for all offences, he extorted fines from fifteen counties, to whose population he imputed crimes connected with the levying of arms in 1387 [eleven years previous]. Under forced confession of treason done at that period, he compelled rich individuals to give blank obligations, which his officers filled up with large sums, having no limitation but their despotic caprice.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 2, p. 32.

2008. EXTORTION, Submission to. *Marcus Crassus. [He was charged with wasting] his money upon those who made a trade of impeachments to prevent their doing him any harm; it was a circumstance which exposed him to ridicule, and unworthy, perhaps, of the characters of Pericles and Aristides, but necessary for him, who had a timidity in his nature. It was a thing which Lycurgus the orator afterward made a merit of to the people; when censured for having bought off one of these trading informers, "I rejoice," said he, "that after being so long employed in the administration, I am discovered to have given money, and not taken it."—PLUTARCH'S NICIAS AND CRASSUS COMPARED.

2009. EXTRAVAGANCE, Domestic. *Richard II. Richard's household consisted of ten thousand persons; he had three hundred in his kitchen; . . . all his offices were furnished in like proportion.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 2, p. 23.

2010. EXTRAVAGANCE in Food. *Coffee and Tea. In the reign of George I. it was held that "the luxury of the age will be the ruin of the nation;" one of the proofs of this degeneracy was that "the wholesome breakfast of water-gruel and milk pottage is changed for coffee and tea."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 2, p. 24.

2011. EXTRAVAGANCE, Oppression by. *Charles I. While the people were starving beneath the weight of oppression and forced loans, so that for the first twelve years of the reign of Charles I. scarcely any one dared to call his property his own, and a morning never rose upon an English family which was not dreaded as the possible herald of some new oppression, it is quite curious, and moves to a natural indignation, to notice the enormous sums expended by the king on diamonds, jewels, and chains of gold, either for himself or for personal presents. We read of £10,400 paid to one William Rogers, a goldsmith; we read of £10,000 paid to Philip Jacobson, a jeweller, for a ring, etc.; we read of £2000 paid to Henry Garway, Esq., for one large thick table diamond; we read of £8000 paid to Sir Manrill Abbott for a diamond set in a collar of gold; and, in fact, their lie before us a long catalogue of similar items, indicating the reckless extravagance of the king. — HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 3, p. 55.

2012. EXTRAVAGANCE of wounded Pride. Aged William Pitt. [By accepting the peerage as Lord Chatham he lost his popularity with the people and his power with Parliament.] A morbid restlessness now led him to great and extravagant expense, in which he vied with those who were no more than his equals in the peerage, but who were besides the inheritors of vast estates. He would drive out with ten outriders and with two carriages, each drawn by six horses. His vain magnificence deceived no one but himself, and was but the poor relief of humbled pride. — BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 31.

2013. EXTRAVAGANCE rebuked. Washington. A single shad was caught in the Delaware in February. . . . When the fish was served, Washington suspected a departure from his orders touching the provision to be made for his table, and said to Fraunces, . . . "What fish is this?" "A shad, a very fine shad," was the reply; "I knew your Excellency was particularly fond of this kind of fish, and was so fortunate as to procure this one in market—a solitary one, and the first of the season." "The price, sir; the price!" continued Washington, in a stern, commanding tone; "the price, sir?" "Three—three—three dollars," stammered the conscience-stricken steward. "Take it away," thundered the chief—"take it away, sir; it shall never be said that my table sets such an example of luxury and extravagance." — CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 21.

2014. EXTRAVAGANCE, Ruinous. Romans. [Cato the Censor reproved the Romans for their extravagant habits.] One day when the Romans clamored violently and unseasonably for a distribution of corn, to dissuade them from it he thus began his address: "It is a difficult task, my fellow-citizens, to speak to the belly, because it hath no ears." Another time, complaining of the luxury of the Romans, he said: "It was a hard matter to save that city from ruin, where a fish was sold for more than an ox." — PLUTARCH'S CATO.

2015. EXTREMITY, Desperate. Siege of Rome. [See No. 2079.] A crowd of spectres, pale and emaciated, their bodies oppressed with disease and their minds with despair, surrounded the palace of the governor, urged, with unavailing truth, that it was the duty of a master to maintain his slaves, and humbly requested that he would provide for their subsistence, permit their flight, or command their immediate execution. Bessas replied, with unfeeling tranquillity, that it was impossible to feed, unsafe to dismiss, and unlawful to kill, the subjects of the emperor. Yet the example of a private citizen might have shown his countrymen that a tyrant cannot withhold the privilege of death. Pierced by the cries of five children, who vainly called on their father for bread, he ordered them to follow his steps; advanced with calm and silent despair to one of the bridges of the Tiber, and, covering his face, threw himself headlong into the stream, in the presence of his family and the Roman people. — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 43, p. 255.

2016. EXTREMITY, Miserable. Britons. Pulcheria, the sister of Theodosius, who had in reality governed the empire during the whole reign of her weak and insignificant brother, now boldly placed herself on the throne, and at the same time married Marcianus, a soldier of fortune, and their joint-title was acknowledged by the Eastern Empire. The West was in the lowest state of imbecility. Rome, unable to defend her provinces, allowed them to drop off without an attempt to retain them. It was at this time that the Britons, by a very melancholy deputation, implored the Romans to protect them against the Picts and Scots. "We are," said they, "in the utmost misery, nor have we any refuge left us; the barbarians drive us to the sea, the sea drives us back upon the barbarians." In return to this miserable supplication, the Romans gave them to understand that their own situation was such that they could now afford them nothing but compassion. — TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 5.

2017. EYE, Disfigured. Samuel Johnson. Young Johnson had the misfortune to be much afflicted with the scrofula, or king's evil, which disfigured a countenance naturally well formed, and hurt his visual nerves so much, that he did not see at all with one of his eyes, though its appearance was little different from that of the other. There is among his prayers one inscribed "When my EYE was restored to its use." — BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 6.

2018. EYES, Useless. Siamese Junks. Great clumsy junks were lying here and there at anchor, with two great eyes in their prows, to let them see their way on the sea—the natives believing that they are as necessary to a ship as to a man. [Seen at Bangkok.] — GENERAL GRANT'S TRAVELS, p. 362.

2019. FACTIONS, Dangerous. Constantinople. The city . . . had been harassed during the two last reigns with violent popular factions, which had arisen from the intemperate fondness of the people for the diversions of the circus—a striking indication of the most irretrievable degeneracy of national character. The factions took the names of the green, the blue, and the red, from the dresses worn by the charioteers of the different parties. Justinian espoused with zeal the faction of the blue, while his queen Theodora, with equal intemperance, took part with the green. Her party proceeded so far as publicly to insult the emperor; and upon the punishment of some of their ringleaders took up arms to avenge their cause, and proclaimed Hypatius, a man allied to the blood-royal, for their monarch. Justinian appeared and offered indemnity, on condition of their returning to their duty, but they compelled him to retreat for safety to his palace. — TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 5, p. 23.

2020. FACTS assumed. Aristotle. He misstates many things which he could have verified with the utmost ease. He says, for example, that a man has more teeth than a woman, and that the ox and the horse have each a bone in its heart. Mice, he informs us, die if they drink in summer; and all animals bitten by mad dogs go mad, except man. He also says that horses feeding in meadows suffer from no disease except gout, which destroys their hoofs, and that one sign of this disease is the appearance of a deep wrinkle beneath the nose. — CYCLOPEDIA OF BROG., p. 562.

2021. FAILURE, Beginning with. Demos-thenes. In his first address to the people . . . was laughed at and interrupted by their clamors ; for the violence of his manner threw him into a confusion of periods, and a distortion of his argument. Beside, he had a weakness and a stammering in his voice, and a want of breath, which caused such a distraction in his discourse, that it was difficult for the audience to understand him. At last, upon his quitting the assembly, Eunomus, the Thracian, a man now extremely old, found him wandering in a dejected condition in the Piræus, and took upon him to set him right. "You," said he, "have a manner of speaking very like that of Pericles ; and yet you lose yourself out of mere timidity and cowardice. You neither bear up against the tumults of a popular assembly, nor prepare your body by exercise for the labor of the rostrum, but suffer your parts to wither away in negligence and indolence."—PLUTARCH'S DEMOSTHENES.

2022. FAILURE, Cause of. First Cable. The cable was found, picked up, and joined to the rest ; and this wonder of the world was accomplished. The cable was taken out of the ocean where it was two and a half miles deep. "In taking up the first cable," Mr. Cooper continued, "the cause of the first failure was discovered. In passing it into the vat manufactured for it where it was intended to lie under water, the workmen neglected to keep it immersed, and on one occasion when the sun shone very hot down into the vat, its rays melted the gutta-percha, so that the copper wire inside sunk down against the outer covering."—LESTER'S LIFE OF PETER COOPER, p. 27.

2023. FAILURE, Discouragement by. Bishop M'Kendree. [He became celebrated as a pulpit orator, yet he] hardly escaped total discomfiture in his first trial. At one of his appointments, after singing and prayer, he took his text, and attempted to look at his audience ; but such was his embarrassment, that he could not lift his eyes from the Bible till he finished his sermon. After the sermon his host left the house, supposing the preacher would follow him ; but not seeing him he returned to the church, and there found him seated on the lowest step of the pulpit stairs, his face covered with his hands, looking forlorn and dejected, as if he had not a friend on earth. He invited him to go home with him. M'Kendree said, in a mournful tone, "I am not fit to go home with anybody."—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 3, p. 85.

2024. FAILURE at First. Battle of Molwitz. Frederick's first battle was fought at Molwitz, and never did the career of a great commander open in a more inauspicious manner. . . . The cavalry which he commanded in person was put to flight. Unaccustomed to the tumult and carnage of a field of battle, he lost his self-possession, and listened too readily to those who urged him to save himself. His English gray carried him many miles from the field, while Schwerin, though wounded in two places, manfully upheld the day. The skill of the old field-marshal and the steadiness of the Prussian battalions prevailed ; and the Austrian army was driven from the field with the loss of 8000 men. The news was carried late at night to a mill in which the king had taken shelter. It gave him a bitter pang. He was successful ; but he owed his success to dispositions which others had made, and to the valor of men who had fought while he was flying. So unpromising was the first appearance of the greatest warrior of that age !—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 33.

2025. FAILURE by Incompetence. Invasion of Canada. Vast preparations were now made for the invasion of Canada [by the British]. . . . But for the utter incompetence of [Sir Hovenden Walker] the admiral, success would have been assured. For six weeks in midsummer the great fleet lay idly in Boston harbor. Sir Hovenden was getting ready to sail. . . . The Indians carried the news to Canada, and every day added strength to the ramparts. At last, on the 30th of July, when no further excuse could be invented, the ships set sail for the St. Lawrence. . . . On the 22d of August were enveloped in a fog. The wind blew hard. . . . The commander was cautioned to remain on deck, but he quietly went to bed. . . . Eight of his best vessels were dashed on the rocks . . . 884 men went down. . . . A council of war was held, and all voted that it was impossible to proceed. In a letter to the English Government, Walker expressed great gratitude that by the loss of 1000 men the rest had been saved from freezing to death at Quebec. —RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 17, p. 155.

2026. FAILURE, Lesson of. Minucius. [Minucius, the Roman general, was envious of the success of Fabius Maximus, who had held the chief command of the Roman army operating against Hannibal. He obtained command of a part of the army, and was overwhelmingly defeated by the Carthaginians in an unwise attack.] Minucius, having called his men together, he thus expressed himself : "Friends and fellow-soldiers ! not to err at all in the management of great affairs is above the wisdom of men ; but it is the part of a prudent and a good man to learn, from his errors and miscarriages, to correct himself for the future. . . . I confess . . . what I could not be brought to be sensible of in so long a time, I have learned in the small compass of one day that I know not how to command, but have need to be under the direction of another ; and from this moment I bid adieu to the ambition of getting the better of a man whom it is an honor to be foiled by. In all other respects the dictator shall be your commander ; but in the due expressions of gratitude to him, I will be your leader still, by being the first to show an example of obedience and submission." —PLUTARCH'S FABIUS MAXIMUS.

2027. FAILURE in Life. Robert Burns. If success were that which most secures men's sympathy, Burns would have won but little regard ; for in all but his poetry his was a defeated life—sad and heart-depressing to contemplate beyond the lives even of most poets. Perhaps it may be the very fact that in him so much failure and shipwreck were combined with such splendid gifts, that has attracted to him so deep and compassionate interest.—SHARP'S BURNS, ch. 1.

2028. FAILURE, Signal. Spanish Armada. This vast project was dissipated like a summer's cloud. The English met the Invincible Armada with 100 ships of smaller size and 80 fire-ships. The fire-ships attacked them in the night, which threw them into the utmost confusion; an engagement ensued, in which the English were favored by a storm, which drove the Spaniards upon the coast of Zealand; many of their vessels were taken, a great number beaten to pieces upon the rocks and sand-banks, and only 50 ships with about 6000 men of all this prodigious armament returned to Spain. When intelligence of this great national misfortune arrived at Madrid, the behavior of Philip [II.] upon that occasion was, it must be owned, truly magnanimous. "God's holy will be done," said he; "I thought myself a match for the power of England, but I did not pretend to fight against the elements."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 26, p. 370.

2029. FAILURES misunderstood. George Whitefield. [The burning of Whitefield's Orphan House, near Savannah, occasioned the failure of the ostensible design of its founder, but] it had accomplished a greater result, which was destined never to fail: it had been the centre of American attraction to its founder, had prompted his thirteen passages across the Atlantic, and had thus led to those extraordinary evangelical labors and travels, from Georgia to Maine, which quickened the spiritual life of the continent.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 3, p. 50.

2030. FAILURES in Professions. Oliver Goldsmith's. [He met Dean Goldsmith.] This august dignity was pleased to discover signs of talent in Oliver, and suggested that as he had attempted divinity and law without success, he should now try physic. The advice came from too important a source to be disregarded, and it was determined to send him to Edinburgh to commence his studies. The dean having given the advice, added to it, we trust, his blessing, but no money; that was furnished from the scantier purses of Goldsmith's brother, his sister (Mrs. Hodson), and his ever-ready uncle, Contarine. It was in the autumn of 1752 that Goldsmith arrived in Edinburgh.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 3, p. 37.

2031. FAILURES surmounted. Atlantic Cable. After a few weeks of successful operation, the first Atlantic cable, laid by Mr. Field in 1858, had ceased to work. The friends of the enterprise were greatly disheartened. Not so with Mr. Field. . . . He made fifty voyages across the Atlantic, and finally secured sufficient capital to begin the laying of the second cable . . . in 1865. When the steamer Great Eastern had proceeded more than twelve hundred miles [from Ireland], . . . the cable parted and was lost. Six millions of money had been spent in unsuccessful attempts, but still he persevered. In July of 1866 a third cable, two thousand miles in length, was coiled in the Great Eastern, and again the vessel started on her way. This time the work was completely successful. After twelve years of unremitting effort Mr. Field received a gold medal from the Congress of his country and the plaudits of all civilized nations.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 67, p. 545.

2032. FAITH conditioned. John Bunyan. His wife had been overtaken by a premature confinement, and was suffering acutely. It was at the time when Bunyan was exercised with questions about the truth of religion altogether. As the poor woman lay crying at his side, he had said, mentally, "Lord, if Thou wilt now remove this sad affliction from my wife, and cause that she be troubled no more therewith this night, then I shall know that Thou canst discern the more secret thoughts of the heart." In a moment the pain ceased, and she fell into a sleep which lasted till morning. Bunyan, though surprised at the time, forgot what had happened till it rushed back upon his memory, when he had committed himself by a similar mental assent to selling Christ. He remembered the proof which had been given to him that God could and did discern his thoughts. God had discerned this second thought also, and in punishing him for it had punished him at the same time for the doubt which he had allowed himself to feel. "I should have believed His word," he said, "and not have put an 'if' upon the all-seeingness of God."—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 4.

2033. FAITH, Defenders of the. Henry VIII. One of the first champions of the see of Rome who took up his pen against Luther was Henry VIII., King of England—the person who we shall see became a few years afterward the most inveterate enemy of the pope's jurisdiction. Henry had been educated in all the subtleties of the schools, and was fond of passing for a man of learning, and an adept in the vain philosophy of the times. He asked leave of Leo to read and to examine the works of Luther, which at that time were prohibited under pain of excommunication; and in a short time he composed a treatise in defence of the seven sacraments, against the attacks of Luther, which was received by Pope Leo (who very probably never read it) with the highest approbation. Henry and his successors (in return for this service done to the church) had the title given them of Defenders of the Faith.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 20, p. 293.

2034. FAITH despised. Science. A just and severe censure has been inflicted on the law of [the Emperor Julian] which prohibited the Christians from teaching the arts of grammar and rhetoric. The motives alleged by the emperor to justify this partial and oppressive measure might command, during his lifetime, the silence of slaves and the applause of flatterers. Julian abuses the ambiguous meaning of a word which might be indifferently applied to the language and the religion of the Greeks; he contemptuously observes, that the men who exalt the merit of implicit faith are unfit to claim or to enjoy the advantages of science; and he vainly contends, that if they refuse to adore the gods of Homer and Demosthenes, they ought to content themselves with expounding Luke and Matthew in the churches of the Galileans.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 23, p. 442.

2035. FAITH, Fed by. George Müller. Children's clothing, wearing apparel, new and second-hand, material for dresses, ladies' bags, pin-cushions, needle-cases, toilet-covers, antimacassars, pen-wipers, sofa-cushions, etc., etc., were received and disposed of for the benefit of the institution. Sometimes it would happen that at nine o'clock in the morning there were no provisions in the houses, neither was there money in hand to purchase the food needed for the dinner; then, in answer to the earnest cries of those who were engaged in the work, money was received in time to procure supplies and get the meal ready by the dinner hour at one o'clock; but often afterward there was nothing left for supper. Another united prayer-meeting was, therefore, held, in order that they might beseech the Lord mercifully to appear on their behalf; and this He invariably did.—LIFE OF GEORGE MÜLLER, p. 30.

2036. FAITH invigorated. Difficulties. The contemporaries of Moses and Joshua had beheld with careless indifference the most amazing miracles. Under the pressure of every calamity, the belief of those miracles has preserved the Jews of a later period from the universal contagion of idolatry; and in contradiction to every known principle of the human mind, that singular people seem to have yielded a stronger and more ready assent to the traditions of their remote ancestors than to the evidence of their own senses.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 15, p. 510.

2037. FAITH, Living by. George Müller. In Bristol, as at Teignmouth, though he continued to live without any regular income, God never allowed him nor his family to want, and, with the Apostle Paul, he was generally able to say, "I have all and abound." On the other hand, however, it is right to state, that times without number his faith was sorely tried—because when God gives faith He always tries it; but whenever there was no money left, instead of being discouraged, he and his beloved wife would kneel down and ask God graciously to send them help; which, sooner or later, was invariably granted. Sometimes it happened, too, that not only was there no money left, but that all the provisions likewise in the house were gone—a trying state of things indeed; the Lord never suffered them, however, to be confounded.—LIFE OF GEORGE MÜLLER, p. 24.

2038. FAITH, Power of. Puritans. There is nothing more remarkable, in the course of this civil war, than the fact that men who had just come from the market and plough should meet the Cavaliers on their own ground, and defeat them. The Royalists prided themselves on their military character; war was their trade and their boast; swordsmen, they professed to be skilled in all the discipline and practice of the field. It was their ancestral character; it was the crest and crown of their feudalism, and, defeated in war, they had nothing further to boast of. How was it? The history we have given in some degree explains it; but the principal reason, after all, is found in the higher faith. Look at the watchwords of the two armies as they rushed on to conflict: "Truth and Peace!" "God is with us!" "The Lord of Hosts!" such mottoes contrast favorably with "The King and Queen Mary!" "Hey! for Cavaliers!" or even that of "The Covenant!" These men charged in battle as if beneath the eye of God; to them it was no play, but business: they knew that they rushed on, many of them, to their death, but they heeded not, for their spirit's eye caught visions of waiting chariots of fire, and horses of fire, hovering round the field; and they advanced to the conflict, mingling with the roar of musketry and the clash of steel the sound of psalms and spiritual songs.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 6, p. 103.

2039. FAITH, Victory by. Sir Henry Vane. [After the restoration of Charles II., Sir Henry Vane, who supported the Commonwealth, was pronounced guilty of treason, and confined in the Tower. His enemies urged his execution. He writes his wife from prison:] "They that press so earnestly to carry on my trial do little know what presence of God may be afforded me in it, and issue out of it, to the magnifying of Christ in my body, by life or by death. Nor can they, I am sure, imagine how much I desire to be dissolved and be with Christ, which of all things that can befall me I account the best."—KNIGHT'S ENGLAND, vol. 4, ch. 16, p. 260.

2040. FAITHFULNESS rewarded. By the People. [In 1637 William Prynne was brought up from his prison with his ears sewed on, to be punished by the Star-Chamber for publishing a book against Sabbath-breaking. Also came Henry Burton, who had offended in a sermon, and in a tract. And Robert Bastwick, who had published prelacy as identical with popery. Each were fined £5000, to be degraded from their professions, to be placed in the pillory, to have their ears cut off, and their cheeks and foreheads branded, and to be confined for life in distant prisons. Three years later their principles have borne fruit. Their petitions reach the House. These prisoners were ordered to be brought to London. Burton and Prynne made a triumphal entry. Baillie says, "Never here such a like show: about a thousand horse, and, as some of good note say, above four thousand; above a hundred coaches and, as many say, above two hundred." Bastwick returned with trumpets sounding, and torches burning, and a thousand horse for his convoy.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 28, p. 444.

2041. FALSEHOOD, Confirmed in. Charles I. Cromwell, we believe, all along used the circumstances as they transpired as best he could. What would we have had him do? When the king was conquered, would we have had him place the conquered tyrant once more upon the throne, without any promise or constitution? We have seen that there was no reliance on his faith; yet there are those who have ever a good word for him. But he could not be true, he could not be sincere. "I wonder you don't leave off this abominable custom of lying, George," said Lord Muskerry to the celebrated George Rooke, when they were sailing together. "I can't help it," said George. "Pooh! pooh!" said his lordship; "it may be done by degrees. Suppose you were to begin by uttering one truth a day!" If Charles had only told the truth "by degrees," had he been sincere only now and then, he might have been saved! He signed the death-warrant of his best friend and strongest servant, Lord Strafford, after he had most faithfully pledged that he would rather lose his crown than perform such an act of unfealty, and "on the word of a king" became a proverb and byword from that circumstance through all ages. Then came the revelations of the letters seized on the field of Naseby. Then, when the king was in the power of the Parliament, Cromwell desired to save him, and Cromwell was willing to do so. The king had appealed to him, in his despair, from the Isle of Wight; and the letters, in the saddle-bags of the king's private messenger, to the queen in France, seized at the Blue Boar, in Holborn, revealed the king as saying of Cromwell, whose hand was graciously at his own peril saving him, "He thinks that I may confer upon him the Garter and the Star, but I shall know in good time how to fit his neck to a halter!"—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 14, p. 181.

2042. FALSEHOOD, Governmental. Bonaparte. It is difficult to determine whether his proclamations to the people of Egypt or his despatches to the French Directory contain the greater number of lies and exaggerations in reference to his Syrian campaign.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 22, p. 381.

2044. FALSEHOOD justified. By Jesuits. [When Henry Garnet, a Jesuit, was tried as a conspirator in the Gunpowder Plot, he expressed his general principles in a paper written before his trial. He had been made privy to the design through the confessional.] "Concerning equivocation, this is my opinion: in moral affairs, and in the common intercourse of life, when the truth is asked among friends, it is not lawful to use equivocation. But in cases where it becomes necessary to an individual for his defence, or for avoiding any injustice or loss, or for obtaining any important advantage, without danger or mischief to any other person, there equivocation is lawful." In an examination after the trial he goes further, and holds that an oath might be lawfully used to confirm a simple equivocation. "In cases of lawful equivocation, the speech by equivocation being saved from a lie, the same speech, without perjury, may be confirmed by oath, or by any other usual way, though it were by receiving the sacrament, if just necessity so require."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 21, p. 337.

2045. ———. Samuel Johnson. We talked of the casuistical question, Whether it was allowable at any time to depart from Truth? JOHNSON: "The general rule is, that Truth should never be violated, because it is of the utmost importance to the comfort of life, that we should have a full security by mutual faith; and occasional inconveniences should be willingly suffered, that we may preserve it. There must, however, be some exceptions. If, for instance, a murderer should ask you which way a man is gone, you may tell him what is not true, because you are under a previous obligation not to betray a man to a murderer." BOSWELL: "Supposing the person who wrote 'Junius' were asked whether he was the author, might he deny it?" JOHNSON: "I don't know what to say to this. If you were sure that he wrote 'Junius,' would you, if he denied it, think as well of him afterward? Yet it may be urged, that what a man has a right to ask you may refuse to communicate; and there is no other effectual mode of preserving a secret and an important secret, the discovery of which may be very hurtful to you, but a flat denial; for if you are silent, or hesitate, or evade, it will be held equivalent to a confession. But stay, sir; here is another case. Supposing the author had told me confidentially that he had written 'Junius,' and I were asked if he had, I should hold myself at liberty to deny it, as being under a previous promise, express or implied, to conceal it. Now what I ought to do for the author, may I not do for myself? But I deny the lawfulness of telling a lie to a sick man, for fear of alarming him. You have no business with consequences; you are to tell the truth. Besides, you are not sure what effect your telling him that he is in danger may have. It may bring his distemper to a crisis, and that may cure him. Of all lying, I have the greatest abhorrence of this, because I believe it has been frequently practised on myself."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 526.

2046. FAME belated. John Quincy Adams. His career was in many respects remarkable. He had been minister to five different European courts, Senator of the United States, appointed to the Supreme bench, had been eight years Secretary of State, and four years President. . . . But it may fairly be doubted whether if his presidency had closed his public life, his fame would have attracted special observation. . . . But in his sixty-fifth year, when the public life of the most favored draws to a close, the noble and shining career of Mr. Adams began. He entered the House of Representatives in 1831, and for the remainder of his life—a period of seventeen years—he was the one grand figure in that assembly. . . . His warfare . . . in favor of the humblest to petition for redress of grievances are among the memorable events in the parliamentary history of the United States. It was in large degree the moral courage of his position that first fixed the attention of the country, and then attracted its admiration.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 69.

2047. FAME by Competition. Sir William Parry. In order to be very much distinguished in this busy world, it is necessary to do something that nobody else ever did. Admiral Parry could boast that he had been nearer the North Pole than any other human being. It is doubtful if a polar bear ever went nearer, or even a seal. Four hundred and ninety-five miles more would have brought him to the pole itself, and he would have lived forever in history as the first man who ever performed that feat.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 385.

2048. FAME, Costly. Sir Walter Scott. In those days of high postage Scott's bill for letters "seldom came under £150 a year," and "as to coach parcels, they were a perfect ruin." On one occasion a mighty package came by post from the United States, for which Scott had to pay £5 sterling. It contained a ms. play called "The Cherokee Lovers," by a young lady of New York, who begged Scott to read and correct it, write a prologue and epilogue, get it put on the stage at Drury Lane, and negotiate with Constable or Murray for the copyright. In about a fortnight another packet not less formidable arrived, charged with a similar postage, which Scott, not grown cautious through experience, recklessly opened ; out jumped a duplicate copy of "The Cherokee Lovers," with a second letter from the authoress, stating that as the weather had been stormy, and she feared that something might have happened to her former ms., she had thought it prudent to send him a duplicate.—HUTTON'S SCOTT, ch. 12.

2049. FAME by Discovery. North-west Passage. Martin Frobisher, an Englishman, well versed in various navigation, had revolved the design of accomplishing the discovery of the North-western passage, esteeming it "the only thing of the world that was yet left undone, by which a notable mind might be made famous and fortunate."—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U.S., vol. 1, ch. 3.

2050. FAME, Distant. Lincoln. Since Garibaldi overthrew the Bourbon King of Naples, and the unification of Italy, Sicily has felt the spirit of the age, and various modern improvements have been made, and among them the laying out of several new avenues, one of which bears the name of Lincoln.—TRAVELS OF GENERAL GRANT, p. 106.

2051. FAME, Impostor's. Reign of Charles II. The tale of Oates . . . sufficient to convulse the whole realm, would not, until confirmed by other evidence, suffice to destroy the humblest of those whom he had accused ; for, by the old law of England, two witnesses are necessary to establish a charge of treason. But the success of the first impostor produced its natural consequences. In a few weeks he had been raised from penury and obscurity to opulence, to power which made him the dread of princes and nobles, and to notoriety such as has for low and bad minds all the attractions of glory. He was not long without coadjutors and rivals.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 222.

2052. FAME by Infamy. Assassination. A young Saxon, twenty years of age, named Von der Sulhn, was arrested in Paris. He confessed that it was his intention to assassinate the emperor, and thus to immortalize his own name by connecting it with that of Napoleon. [He was confined, but not executed.]—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 11.

2053. FAME, Locality for. Napoleon I. "Europe," said he, "presents no fields for glorious exploits ; no great empires or revolutions are to be found but in the East. . . . [He had conquered the Italians and the Austrians.] . . . My glory is declining. This little corner of Europe is too small to supply it. We must go to the East. All the great men of the world have there acquired their celebrity."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 10.

2055. FAME, Posthumous. Columbus. Columbus . . . in his lifetime met with no adequate recompense. The self-love of the Spanish monarch was offended at receiving from a foreigner in his employ benefits too vast for requital ; and the contemporaries of the great navigator persecuted the merit which they could not adequately reward.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., ch. 1.

2056. FAME regarded. Cicero. In December it was known that an agrarian law would be at once proposed under plea of providing for Pompey's troops ; and Cicero had had to decide whether he would act in earnest in the spirit which he had begun to show when the tribunes bill was under discussion, or would fall back upon resistance with the rest of his party, or evade the difficult dilemma by going on foreign service, or else would simply absent himself from Rome while the struggle was going on. "I may either resist," he said, "and there will be an honorable fight ; or I may do nothing, and withdraw into the country, which will be honorable also ; or I may give active help, which I am told Cæsar expects of me. . . . What will history say of me six hundred years hence ? I am more afraid of that than of the chatter of my contemporaries."—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 12.

2058. — — —. "Berner's Street Hoax." [Theodore Hook bet a guinea that in one week he could make a neat and modest house the most famous in all London.] The bet was taken, and in four or five days Hook had written and posted one thousand letters, annexing orders to tradesmen of every sort . . . all to be executed on one particular day, and as nearly as possible at a fixed hour. From "wagons of coals and potatoes, to books, prints, feathers, ices, jellies, and cranberry tarts," nothing whatever available to any human being but was commanded from scores of rival dealers, scattered all over the city. . . . The mayor and his chaplain were invited to take the death-bed confession of a speculating common councillor. There also came the Governor of the Bank, Chairman of the East India Company, the Lord Chief Justice, and the Prime Minister, . . . his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, and his Royal Highness the Commander in Chief. [All came at the call of Hook's letters.] They could not all reach Berner's Street.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 354.

of that day, who were much less reticent and more irrepressible than the American travellers of this—would come to him without introductions, facetiously cry out “Prodigious!” in imitation of Dominie Sampson, at whatever they were shown, inquire whether the new house was called Tullyveolan or Tillytudlem, cross-examine, with open note-books, as to Scott’s age and the age of his wife, and appear to be taken quite by surprise when they were bowed out without being asked to dine.—HUTTON’S SCOTT, ch. 12.

2060. FAME undesired. Emperor Maximin. The emperor of the East commanded a disciplined and veteran army of above 70,000 men; and Licinius, who had collected about 30,000 Illyrians, was at first oppressed by the superiority of numbers. His military skill and the firmness of his troops restored the day, and obtained a decisive victory. The incredible speed which Maximin exerted in his flight is much more celebrated than his prowess in the battle. Twenty-four hours afterward he was seen, pale, trembling, and without his Imperial ornaments, at Nicomedia, one hundred and sixty miles from the place of his defeat.—GIBBON’S ROME, ch. 14, p. 486.

2062. FAMILIARITY, Mistake of. Mary Queen of Scots. The page of the Marechal de Damville, the young Du Chatelard, had remained, as we have seen, at Holyrood, for the purpose of entertaining his master with letters about all that related to the queen, his idol. Du Chatelard, treated as a child by the playful indulgence of the queen, had conceived for his mistress a passion bordering on madness. The queen had encouraged him too much to retain the right of punishing him. Du Chatelard, constantly admitted to the most intimate familiarity with his mistress, ended by mistaking sport for earnest, persuading himself that she only desired a pretext for yielding to his audacity. The ladies of the palace discovered him one night hidden under the queen’s bed; he was expelled with indignation, but his boldness was placed to the account of the thoughtlessness of his age and character. Raillery was his only punishment.—LAMARTINE’S MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, p. 15.

proprietors of Massachusetts, has gone on steadily increasing in wealth and numbers from 1620 to the present time, and the family estate still comprises the lands originally bought by the Adams who was grandfather to the second President of the United States. John Adams died worth $100,000. His son, John Quincy Adams, left, it is said, twice as much; and his son, Charles Francis Adams, late minister to London, is supposed to be worth $2,000,000.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 173.

2064. FAMILY, Benefits of the. Luther. In place of the monk’s cowl the habit of the citizen was assumed. Because of this the heart of the German people went out to the great Reformer. As a struggling monk he excited wonder and surprise. But as a husband and father he is loved and revered by the German people.—REIN’S LUTHER, ch. 16, p. 137.

2066. FAMILY discord. Of Charles IV. of Spain. [Prince Ferdinand accused his mother, Louisa Maria, of shameless licentiousness with one of the king’s body-guard named Godroy. She charged him with ignoble birth, her husband not being his father. Napoleon was solicited to favor each side in the possession of the throne of Spain. He held an interview with all.] The imbecile old king brandished over the head of Ferdinand a long gold-headed cane . . . loaded him with reproaches and imprecations. Suddenly the mother . . . fell upon the culprit. A flood of most uncourtly epithets she poured upon the victim. . . . As Napoleon left the room he exclaimed . . . “What a mother! What a son!”—ABBOTT’S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 1.

2068. FAMILY kinship. Lines. Among civilized nations the family is so constructed that the lines of kinship diverge constantly from the line of descent, so that collateral kinsmen with each generation stand at a still greater remove from each other. . . . this is traceable to the establishment of a male line of descent. In the Indian family this is all reversed. The descent is established in the female line. . . . Ties of kinship converge upon each other until they all meet in the granddaughter. . . . Every grandson and granddaughter was the grandson and granddaughter of the whole tribe. . . . All the uncles were reckoned as his fathers; also all mothers' sisters as mothers; all the cousins were sisters and brothers; all the nieces were daughters; all the nephews, sons.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 1, p. 46.

2070. FAMILY, Religion in the. Mahomet. Islamism commenced like a family. It was practised for a long time in the dwelling of Mahomet, before it was diffused and exercised in any meeting of the Khoreishites. The first of the faithful were himself, his wife, his nephew, his daughters, and his domestics. He seems to have been long content with this conversion of himself and household to the pure faith of Abraham, hoping that God would be content with this restricted worship, and would not ask of him a more onerous propagation of the truth.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 69.

2071. FAMILY, Responsibility to. Reign of James II. Every battered old cavalier who, in return for blood and lands lost in the royal cause, had obtained some small place under the keeper of the wardrobe or the master of the harriers, was called upon to choose between the king and the church. The commissioners of customs and excise were ordered to attend his Majesty at the treasury. There he demanded from them a promise to support his policy, and directed them to require a similar promise from all their subordinates. One custom-house officer notified his submission to the royal will in a way which excited both merriment and compassion. "I have," he said, "fourteen reasons for obeying his Majesty's commands, a wife and thirteen young children."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 313.

2072. FAMILY, Sanguinary. Cæsar's. On the parents, and the three sons in succession, the hopes of Rome were fixed. But Germanicus was poisoned by order of Tiberius, and Agrippina was murdered in banishment, after the endurance of the most terrible anguish. Their two elder sons, Nero and Drusus, lived only long enough to disgrace themselves, and to be forced to die of starvation. The third was the monster Gaius. Of the three daughters, the youngest, Julia Livina, was put to death by the orders of Messalina, the wife of her uncle Claudius. Drusilla died in prosperous infamy, and Agrippina the younger, after a life of crime so abnormal and so detestable that it throws into the shade even the monstrous crimes of many of her contemporaries, murdered her husband, and was murdered by the orders of the son for whose sake she had waded through seas of blood. . . . That son was Nero! Truly the palace of the Cæsars must have been haunted by many a restless ghost, and amid its vast and solitary chambers the guilty lords of its splendor must have feared lest they should come upon some spectre weeping tears of blood.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 1, p. 13.

2073. FAMILY, Sorrowful. Martyr's. [At two o'clock in the morning Dr. Rowland Taylor was delivered to the sheriff in Aldgate.] Now when the sheriff and his company came against St. Botolph Church, Elizabeth, his daughter, cried, saying, "O my dear father! Mother, mother, here is my father led away!" Then cried his wife, "Rowland, Rowland, where art thou?" for it was a very dark morning, that the one could not see the other. Dr. Taylor answered, "Dear wife, I am here," and stayed. The sheriff's men would have led him forth, but the sheriff said, "Stay a little, masters, I pray you, and let him speak to his wife;" and so they stayed. Then came she to him; and he took his daughter Mary in his arms, and he, his wife, and Elizabeth kneeled down and said the Lord's Prayer; at which sight the sheriff wept apace, and so did divers others of the company. After they had prayed, he rose up and kissed his wife, and shook her by the hand and said, "Farewell, my dear wife; be of good comfort, for I am quiet in my conscience. God shall stir up a father for my children." Then he kissed his daughter Mary and said, "God bless thee; I pray you all stand strong and steadfast unto Christ and His words, and keep you from idolatry." Then said his wife, "God be with thee, dear Rowland. I will with God's grace meet thee at Hadleigh." [Afterward he said:] "Come hither, my son Thomas;" then John Hull lifted up the child, and set him on the horse before his father. Then lifted he up his eyes toward heaven and prayed for his son, laid his hand on the child's head, and blessed him. [He then went to the stake.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 6.

2074. FAMILY, Substitutes in the. Indians. When one party prevailed, it was a rule to pursue their success by an undistinguishing carnage, as long as the enemy gave the smallest resistance. When that was over, they bound and carried off the prisoners, who were reserved for the most cruel and tormenting death. This the captives themselves knew, and were prepared for. They had, however, one chance of life; for, on returning to their village, the victors made offer to each family of a captive for every relation they had lost in the war. This offer they might either accept or reject. If accepted, the captive became a member of the family; if rejected, he was doomed to die under the most excruciating tortures. In these executions the women would bear their part, and seem actuated by the spirit of furies. What is most remarkable is the fortitude with which these unhappy wretches submitted to their fate. There was a contest between them and their tormentors which should exceed, these in inflicting, or the others in enduring the greatest ex-acerbations of pain. It is even said that by insults they endeavored to provoke their executioners and stimulate their fury by telling them of the cruelties they had themselves inflicted on their countrymen.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 21.

2075. FAMILY sufferings. House of the Cæsars. It has been well said that no page, even of Tacitus, has so sombre and tragic an eloquence as the mere Stemma Cæsarium. The great Julius, robbed by death of his two daughters, was succeeded by his nephew Augustus, who, in ordering the assassination of Cæsarion, the natural son of Julius by Cleopatra, extinguished the direct line of the greatest of the Cæsars. Augustus by his three marriages was the father of but one daughter, and that daughter disgraced his family and embittered his life. He saw his two elder grandsons die under circumstances of the deepest suspicion; and being induced to disinherit the third for the asserted stupidity and ferocity of his disposition, was succeeded by Tiberius, who was only his stepson, and had not one drop of the Julian blood in his veins. Tiberius had but one son, who was poisoned by his favorite, Sejanus, before his own death. This son, Drusus, left but one son, who was compelled to commit suicide by his cousin, Gaius; and one daughter, whose son, Rubellius Plautus, was put to death by order of Nero.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 1, p. 13.

2076. FAMINE, Brutalizing. Athenians. [Athens was besieged by Demetrius, and famine followed.] In the course of it many dreadful things happened, and this is related among the rest. A father and his son were sitting in the same room, in the last despair; when a dead mouse happening to fall from the roof of the house, they both started up and fought for it.—PLUTARCH'S DEMETRIUS.

2077. FAMINE, Cannibals in. France. A fearful famine, by which France was visited in 1033, occasioned throughout the country miseries almost unparalleled in history. For three years in succession the harvest had failed. . . . Food was obtainable only at exorbitant prices; and the poorer classes . . . were driven at last to the most revolting expedients to appease their hunger. An innkeeper near Macon was burnt alive for having massacred no less than forty-eight unhappy wayfarers, whose bodies had afterward been devoured. Human flesh was publicly exposed for sale in the market of Tournus.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 7, § 8, p. 110.

2079. FAMINE, Distress of. Rome. A.D. 546. Totila proceeded, not to assault, but to encompass and starve, the ancient capital. Rome was afflicted by the avarice and guarded by the valor of Bessas, a veteran chief of Gothic extraction, who filled, with a garrison of 3000 soldiers, the spacious circle of her venerable walls. From the distress of the people he extracted a profitable trade, and secretly rejoiced in the continuance of the siege. It was for his use that the granaries had been replenished; the charity of Pope Vigilius had purchased and embarked an ample supply of Sicilian corn; but the vessels which escaped the barbarians were seized by a rapacious governor, who imparted a scanty sustenance to the soldiers, and sold the remainder to the wealthy Romans. The medimnus, or fifth part of the quarter of wheat, was exchanged for seven pieces of gold; fifty pieces were given for an ox, a rare and accidental prize; the progress of famine enhanced this exorbitant value, and the mercenaries were tempted to deprive themselves of the allowance which was scarcely sufficient for the support of life. A tasteless and unwholesome mixture, in which the bran thrice exceeded the quantity of flour, appeased the hunger of the poor; they were gradually reduced to feed on dead horses, dogs, cats, and mice, and eagerly to snatch the grass, and even the nettles, which grew among the ruins of the city.—[See No. 2015.] GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 43, p. 255.

2080. FAMINE, Resource in. Horses. [When Bonaparte's army was retreating from Moscow, during a month there were no rations, and dead horses were the only resource.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 30, p. 359.

2081. FAMINE, Trials of. Plymouth Colony. The arrival of new emigrants, who came unprovided with food, compelled the whole colony, for six months in succession, to subsist on half-allowance only. "I have seen men," says Winslow, "stagger by reason of faintness for want of food." . . . In the third year of their settlement their victuals were so entirely spent that "they knew not at night where to have a bit in the morning." . . . When a few of their old friends arrived to join them, a lobster or a piece of fish, without bread or anything else but a cup of fair spring water, was the best dish the whole colony could offer.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 8.

2083. FANATIC, Insane. Puritan. A mad tailor, named Ludowick Muggleton, wandered from pot-house to pot-house, tippling ale, and denouncing eternal torments against those who refused to believe, on his testimony, that the Supreme Being was only six feet high, and that the sun was just four miles from the earth. George Fox had raised a tempest of derision by proclaiming that it was a violation of Christian sincerity to designate a single person by a plural pronoun, and that it was an idolatrous homage to Janus and Woden to talk about January and Wednesday.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 153.

2084. FANATICISM, Danger from. Reformation. Karlstadt forbade the paying and taking of interest on money loaned, and even went so far as to recommend the introduction of the system of polygamy as practised by the ancient Hebrews. [Luther wrote the elector] he thought that Karlstadt had always ignored the praise of Christ, and that he would always do so, "His own insane desire for fame and praise has brought him to this. He has proved to be our most dangerous enemy, so that I am inclined to believe the poor, miserable wretch is possessed of an evil spirit."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 14, p. 125.

2085. FANATICISM, Idolatrous. Bassianus Antoninus. In a solemn procession through the streets of Rome, the way was strewn with gold dust; the black stone, set in precious gems, was placed on a chariot drawn by six milk-white horses, richly caparisoned. The pious emperor held the reins, and, supported by his ministers, moved slowly backward, that he might perpetually enjoy the felicity of the divine presence. In a magnificent temple raised on the Palatine Mount, the sacrifices of the god Elagabalus were celebrated with every circumstance of cost and solemnity. The richest wines, the most extraordinary victims, and the rarest aromatics were profusely consumed on the altar. Around the altar a chorus of Syrian damsels performed their lascivious dances to the sound of barbarian music, while the gravest personages of the state and army, clothed in long Phœnician tunics, officiated in the meanest functions, with affected zeal and secret indignation.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6, p. 171.

2086. FANATICISM inflamed. Orleans. And the Pucelle, left behind, found herself absolute mistress of the city, where all authority but hers seemed to be at an end. She caracolled round the walls, and the people followed her fearlessly. The next day she rode out to reconnoitre the English bastilles, and young women and children went too, to look at these famous bastilles, where all remained still and betrayed no sign of movement. She led back the crowd with her to attend vespers at the church of Saint Croix; and as she wept at prayers, they all wept likewise. The citizens were beside themselves; they were raised above all fears, were drunk with religion and with war—seized by one of those formidable accessions of fanaticism in which men can do all and believe all, and in which they are scarcely less terrible to friends than to enemies.—MICHELET'S JOAN OF ARC, p. 14.

2088. FANATICISM, Religious. "Prophets." Three of the prime movers came to Wittenberg during the Christmas holidays in the year 1521. They were curious fellows in warlike attire. Wonderful experiences did they relate: God had conversed with them; they could foretell future events; in short, they claimed to be prophets and apostles! Melancthon thought that they were possessed of a particular spirit, whatever be its nature, and that Luther alone could determine its true character. But Luther did not wish to return on that account, especially since it was not the desire of the Elector. He wrote to Melancthon, and also to his friend Amsdorf, that the prophets of Zwickau should not be heard at once, but that the matter should quietly take its course. An investigation of their claims to a special calling should be held, and their spirits should be tried according to the advice of St. John (I. 4 : 1), whether they be to God.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 11, p. 103.

2089. ——. Gunpowder Plot. [Henry Garnet, a Catholic priest, received through the confessional information of the Gunpowder Plot, which he did not reveal. He defended his course with ability. He acknowledged] that he had done more than he could excuse by law in having concealed his privy to the design, yet he maintained that "he had acted upon a conscientious persuasion that he was bound to disclose nothing that he had heard in sacramental confession."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 21, p. 336.

2091. ——. Fifth Monarchy. The Fifth Monarchy men rose on the 6th of January, 1661, under their old leader, Thomas Venner, the wine cooper. Some fifty or sixty of them, after an encounter with the feeble municipal police, marched to Caen Wood, near Highgate, and having been there concealed for two days, returned to encounter the trained bands, and even a regular body of guards, in the confidence that their cause—the establishment of the reign of Christ on earth, and the suppression of all other authority—would be miraculously upheld. The capital was in fearful alarm; the shops were shut; the city gates were barricaded. But these wild men drove all before them, till a rally was made, and they were for the most part slaughtered, refusing quarter.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 15, p. 251.

2092. ——. Fifth Monarchy. [In 1657 there was a great tumult in London over the Fifth Monarchy. The Assyrian monarchy, the Persian, the Greek, and the Roman, being all four extinct, it was announced that the Fifth Monarchy—the greatest of all—the reign of the saints on earth, was at hand. Thomas Venner, a wine cooper, with its standard of the Lion of the tribe of Judah, was to proclaim it as its herald on the 9th of April, on Mile End Green; a troop of horse arrested the Fifth Monarchy.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 13, p. 206.

with more zeal than charity, "Madam, change your opinion, and repent of your former wickedness, and settle your faith only in Jesus Christ, by Him to be saved." Mary told him to trouble himself no further; and Shrewsbury and Kent said they would pray for her. She thanked them; "but to join with you in prayer I will not, for that you and I are not of one religion." The dean then prayed aloud from the English liturgy; and Mary, with steadfast voice, having in her hand a crucifix, began to pray in Latin; and she finally prayed in English for Christ's afflicted church, for her son, and for the Queen of England. The callous Earl of Kent was not moved even by this solemn earnestness, but told her to "leave those trumperies." Such is fanaticism, from whatever perverted view of the religion of love it may spring.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 13, p. 203.

2094. FANATICISM, Scandalous. Quaker. [In 1656 James Nayler, one of the new sect of Quakers, in his frantic enthusiasm had proclaimed that the Redeemer was incarnate in His person; and he had given a great public scandal in going about in a state of nudity. The madman narrowly escaped hanging.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 13, p. 203.

2096. FAREWELL to Country. Napoleon I. [A captive, and sailing for St. Helena. Beholding the receding vision of his native land,] he then uncovered his head, bowed to the distant hills, and said, with deep emotion, "Land of the brave, I salute thee! Farewell! France, farewell!"—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 30.

2099. FAREWELL, A touching. Washington's. [Nine days after the evacuation of New York by the British] Washington assembled his officers, and bade them a final adieu. When they were met, the chieftain spoke a few affectionate words to his comrades, who came forward in turn, and with tears and sobs, which the veterans no longer cared to conceal, bade him farewell. Washington then walked to Whitehall, followed by a vast concourse of citizens and soldiers, and thence departed to Annapolis, where Congress was in session. On his way he paused at Philadelphia, and made to the proper officers a report of his expenses during the war. The account was in his own handwriting, and covered a total expenditure of $74,485, all correct to a cent. The route of the chief from Paulus' Hook to Annapolis was a continuous triumph. The people by hundreds and thousands flocked to the villages and roadsides to see him pass: gray-haired statesmen to speak words of praise; young men to shout with enthusiasm; maidens to strew his way with flowers.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 44, p. 355.

2100. FARMER, An unsuccessful. Isaac Newton. Isaac was taken from school to assist his mother in the management of her farm. But nature claimed him for higher work. He could not be a farmer. Being sent to market once a week, with an aged and faithful servant, no sooner were the horses put into the stable than he would shut himself up in a garret with his books, till the produce was sold and it was time to return. In summer he would choose a shady nook on the road-side, out of town, and there await the return of the wagon. If he was sent to the fields to watch the sheep and cattle, he would be found, hours after, perched in a tree, absorbed in a book, or on the banks of a stream, eagerly watching the operation of a water-wheel; while the cattle, perhaps, were rioting in a corn-field, and the sheep were wandering down the road.—PARTON'S NEWTON, p. 76.

2101. ———. Edmund Burke. The reader may smile as he recognizes the ardor, the earnestness, the fervid gravity of the political speeches, in letters which discuss the merits of carrots in fattening porkers, and the precise degree to which they should be boiled. Burke throws himself just as eagerly into white peas and Indian corn, into cabbages that grow into head and cabbages that shoot into leaves, into experiments with pumpkin-seed and wild parsnip, as if they had been details of the Stamp Act, or justice to Ireland. When he complains that it is scarcely possible for him, with his numerous avocations, to get his servants to enter fully into his views as to the right treatment of his crops, we can easily understand that his farming did not help him to make money. It is impossible that he should have had time or attention to spare for the effectual direction of even a small farm.—MORLEY'S BURKE, ch. 6.

2102. FASHION, Depreciated by. Science. Charles [II.] himself had a laboratory. . . . It was almost necessary to the character of a fine gentleman to have something to say about air-pumps and telescopes; and even fine ladies, now and then, thought it becoming to affect a taste for science, went in coaches and six to visit the Gresham curiosities, and broke forth into cries of delight at finding that a magnet really attracted a needle, and that a microscope really made a fly look as large as a sparrow. . . . It is the universal law, that whatever pursuit, whatever doctrine becomes fashionable, shall lose a portion of that dignity which it had possessed while it was confined to a small but earnest minority, and was loved for its own sake alone. It is true that the follies of some persons who, without any real aptitude for science, professed a passion for it, furnished matter of contemptuous mirth to a few malignant satirists who belonged to the preceding generation.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 380.

2104. FASHION, Struggle for. French. Hats were a French invention of 1449; a belted knight writes: "Send me a hat and a bonnet by the same man; and let him bring the hat on his head, for fear of misfashioning of it."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 8, p. 121.

2105. FASTS, Religious. Early Methodists. Four fasts were appointed for each year on every circuit, and the preachers were ordered to write on all class papers: "The first Friday after every Quarterly Meeting is to be observed as a day of fasting and prayer." The earliest historian of Methodism remarks that it was the custom of its people "to observe formerly all Fridays as days of fasting or abstinence."—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 2, p. 134.

2106. FATE, Belief in. Mohammedans. The Koran inculcates, in the most absolute sense, the tenets of fate and predestination, which would extinguish both industry and virtue, if the actions of man were governed by his speculative belief. Yet their influence in every age has exalted the courage of the Saracens and Turks. The first companions of Mahomet advanced to battle with a fearless confidence; there is no danger where there is no chance; they were ordained to perish in their beds; or they were safe and invulnerable amid the darts of the enemy.—GIBBON'S MAHOMET, p. 39.

2107. FATHER, A confiding. John Milton's. There is no attempt on the part of Milton to take up a profession, not even for the sake of appearances. The elder Milton was content to provide the son, of whom he was proud, with the means of prosecuting his eccentric scheme of life, to continue, namely, to prepare himself for some great work, nature unknown. For a young man of simple habits and studious life a little suffices. The chief want is books.—MILTON, by M. PATRISON, ch. 3.

2108. FATHERHOOD, Experience of. Agessilaus. Agessilaus [the Lacedæmonian king] was certainly a most affectionate father. It is said, when his children were small, he would join in their sports; and a friend happening to find him one day riding among them upon a stick, he desired him "not to mention it until he was a father himself."—PLUTARCH'S AGESILAUS.

2109. FATHERHOOD suppressed. War of Rebellion. [At the battle of Malvern Hill in Virginia] the son of [Confederate] Major Peyton, but fifteen years of age, called to his father for help. A ball had shattered both his legs. "When we have beaten the enemy, then I will help you," answered Peyton; "I have here other sons to lead to glory. Forward!" But the column had advanced only a few paces when the major himself fell to the earth a corpse.—POL-LARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, p. 323.

2111. FEAR conquered by Faith. Moravians. [When John Wesley came as a missionary to the American colonists and Indians, he had not obtained the experience of the conscious favor of God. While on his passage, in the midst of a fearful storm which endangered the lives of all, he observed the calmness of a little band of Moravian passengers who were holding religious service. When in the midst of the psalm which they were singing,] the sea broke over the ship, split the mainsail into pieces, and poured in between the decks as if the great deep had already swallowed them up. A terrible outcry arose from the English, but the Moravians calmly sung on. Wesley asked one of them, "Were you not afraid?" He answered: "I thank God, no." "But were not your women and children?" "No; our women and children are not afraid to die."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 78.

2112. FEAR, Contagious. Romans. They had never yet looked Germans in the face, and imagination magnifies the unknown. Roman merchants and the Gauls of the neighborhood brought stories of the gigantic size and strength of these northern warriors. The glare of their eyes was reported to be so fierce that it could not be borne. They were wild, wonderful, and dreadful. Young officers, patricians, and knights, who had followed Cæsar for little mild experience, began to dislike the notion of these new enemies. Some applied for leave of absence; others, though ashamed to ask to be allowed to leave the army, cowered in their tents with sinking hearts, made their wills, and composed last messages for their friends. The centurions caught the alarm from their superiors, and the legionaries from the centurions.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 14, p. 32.

2113. FEAR and Courage. War. [While at war with each other a small company of Thebans under Pelopidas unexpectedly met their Lacedæmonian enemies on the road.] As soon as they were perceived to be passing the straits, one ran and told Pelopidas, "We are fallen into the enemy's hands." "And why not they," said he, "into ours?"—PLUTARCH'S PELOPIDAS.

2114. FEAR, Government by. England. [Edmund Burke said of the success of the Revolutionists of France:] I believe very few were able to enter into the effects of mere terror. . . . For four years we have seen loans made, treasuries supplied, and armies levied and maintained, more numerous than France ever showed in the field, by the effects of fear alone.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 15, p. 268.

2115. ———. School. Fashion, and even convenience, soon persuaded the conquerors of Rome to assume the more elegant dress of the natives; but they still persisted in the use of their mother-tongue; and their contempt for the Latin schools was applauded by Theodoric himself, who gratified their prejudices, or his own, by declaring that the child who had trembled at a rod would never dare to look upon a sword.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39.

2117. FEAR, Panic of. Rome. Meanwhile the report reached Rome that Cæsar had crossed the Rubicon. The aristocracy had nursed the pleasant belief that his heart would fail him, or that his army would desert him. His heart had not failed, his army had not deserted; and, in their terror, they saw him already in their midst like an avenging Marius. He was coming. His horse had been seen on the Apennines. Flight, instant flight, was the only safety. Up they rose, consuls, prætors, senators, leaving wives and children and property to their fate, not halting even to take the money out of the treasury, but contenting themselves with leaving it locked. On foot, on horseback, in litters, in carriages, they fled for their lives to find safety under Pompey's wing in Capua.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 21.

2118. FEAR of Retribution. Reign of James II. [Lord Sunderland, his prime-minister and tool, apprehended the revolution which dethroned James.] Visions of an innumerable crowd covering Tower Hill [the place of execution], and shouting with savage joy at the sight of the apostate [who sought to betray James to William, Prince of Orange], of a scaffold hung with black, of [Bishop] Burnet reading the prayer for the departing, and of Ketch [the executioner] leaning on the axe with which Russell and Monmouth had been mangled in so butcherly a fashion, began to haunt the unhappy statesman.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 411.

2119. FEAR, Shameless. Duke of Monmouth. [His rebellion against James II. was suppressed.] The spoiled darling of the court and of the populace, accustomed to be loved and worshipped wherever he appeared, was now surrounded by stern jailers, in whose eyes he read his doom. Yet a few hours of gloomy seclusion, and he must die a violent and shameful death. His heart sank within him. Life seemed to be worth purchasing by any humiliation; nor could his mind, always feeble, and now distracted by terror, perceive that humiliation must degrade but could not save him. . . . He wrote to the king. The letter was that of a man whom a craven fear had made insensible to shame. He professed in vehement terms his remorse for his treason. He affirmed that, when he promised his cousins at the Hague not to raise troubles in England, he had fully meant to keep his word. Unhappily, he had afterward been seduced from his allegiance by some horrid people who had heated his mind by calumnies and misled him by sophistry; but now he abhorred them; he abhorred himself. He begged in piteous terms that he might be admitted to the royal presence.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 573.

2120. FEAR, Stranger to. Colony of Georgia. A Cherokee appeared among the English. "Fear nothing," said Oglethorpe [the governor], "but speak freely;" and the mountainer answered, "I always speak freely. Why should I fear? I am now among friends; I never feared even among my enemies."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 24.

2121. FEARLESSNESS, Astonishing. Romans. [Hannibal's approach to Rome.] Hannibal was astonished by the constancy of the Senate, who, without raising the siege of Capua, or recalling their scattered forces, expected his approach. He encamped on the banks of the Anio, at the distance of three miles from the city; and he was soon informed that the ground on which he had pitched his tent was sold for an adequate price at a public auction, and that a body of troops was dismissed by an opposite road, to re-enforce the legions of Spain.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31, p. 245.

2122. FEARLESSNESS, Boyish. Benedict Arnold. He was no common boy. The most striking trait of his character was fearlessness. He would place himself in situations of extreme peril, for no other motive than to terrify his elders, or to "show off" his courage. . . . It was often the duty of the boy Arnold to carry bags of Indian corn to a mill, two miles from home, himself riding upon the bags that were thrown over the horse's back. While he was waiting for his grist, it was his delight to astonish the miller with his wild, daring tricks. As he was bathing in the mill-stream, he would seize hold of one of the spokes of the great water-wheel, and go around with it, now dangling in the air, now buried in the foaming water, while the miller stood horror-stricken at his recklessness. He was a most daring and headlong rider. Horses that he was accustomed to ride were observed to fall into bad habits, such as kicking, starting, and running away.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 229.

2123. FEARS, Imaginary. Cæsar. Sixty thousand picked men left the Gauls' camp before dawn; they stole round by a distant route, and were allowed to rest concealed in a valley till the middle of the day. At noon they came over the ridge at the Romans' back; and they had the best of the position, being able to attack from above. Their appearance was the signal for a general assault on all sides, and for a determined sally by Vercingetorix from within. Thus before, behind, and everywhere, the legions were assailed at the same moment; and Cæsar observes that the cries of battle in the rear are always more trying to men than the fiercest onset upon them in front; because what they cannot see they imagine more formidable than it is, and they depend for their own safety on the courage of others. [Cæsar's genius saved the army.]—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 19.

2124. FEAST, Intellectual. Mahomet. He assembled his relatives to the number of forty, at a feast served in the court of his house, as was the usage of the grand councils which preceded great revolutions among the Arabs. They were all the sons and descendants of his uncle and adoptive father, Aboutaleb. The banquet, frugal, like the life of the desert, was composed but of a leg of mutton and some rice. Mahomet supplied its meagreness by the nutriment of the soul; he entertained his guests with so much inspiration and persuasion that they felt themselves quite satisfied by his words. These simple minds, astonished to find they had their fill despite the pitiful supply upon the table, attributed to the magic of the infernal spirits this charm and repletion, which were but the magic of the divine word. They retired uneasy, interrogating each other, and promising not to return to expose themselves to such enchantments.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 73.

2125. FEES, Extortionate. Jailers. [At that day a jailer had no salary, but was supported chiefly by fees extorted from the prisoners on their leaving jail. Custom had established, with the force of law, that every prisoner, whether felon or debtor, whether discharged because the jury had acquitted him, or because no bill of indictment was found against him, or because his term of imprisonment had expired, should pay, before leaving the jail, a fee of 15s. 4d. to the jailer, and another fee of 2s. to the turnkey—about $5 in all. If a prisoner could not pay this sum the jailer was allowed to keep him in prison till he could. . . . [John] Howard discovered one man who . . . had been confined four years solely because . . . unable to pay the fees for delivery. He found some prisoners, who had been proved innocent, and against whom no bill had been found, still languishing in a loathsome dungeon, because there was no one on earth able and willing to lend them the trifling sum of 19s. 4d., while the county was at the expense of supporting them. Such frightful abuses . . . come of great men putting their duties upon deputies.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 42.

2126. FEMALES, Imitation of. Theseus. [When Theseus went with a tribute of seven young men and as many virgins to be sacrificed in the labyrinth at Crete, or save themselves by destroying the Minotaur,] he did not take with him all the virgins upon whom the lot had fallen, but selected two young men of his acquaintance who had feminine and florid aspects, but were not wanting in spirit and presence of mind. These by warm bathing, and keeping them out of the sun, by providing unguents for their hair and complexions, and everything necessary for their dress, by forming their voice, their manner, and their step, he so effectually altered, that they passed among the virgins designed for Crete, and no one could discern the difference.—PLUTARCH'S THESEUS.

2127. FESTIVAL, A coronation. Edward I. [On the 19th of August, 1274, King Edward I. and his queen were crowned at Westminster.] The coronation feast presents a curious illustration of the rude hospitality of that age. . . . There were two halls; . . . many new halls were built up, in which tables were fixed in the ground, at which all who came—princes, nobles, the rich, and the poor—were feasted for fifteen days. Innumerable kitchens were built beside the halls, and numberless leaden cauldrons were placed outside the kitchens, for additional cooking. Oxen, sheep, and pigs were consumed in numbers exceeding those of a crowded market day in recent Smithfield; and Leadenhall market at Christmas could not vie with this royal poultry-show. The Pipe-rolls record that three hundred barrels of wine were purchased for this occasion.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 25, p. 383.

2128. FIDELITY tested. Roman General Belisarius. He marched to the gates of Rome, which surrendered without an attack; he possessed himself of the city, and with 5000 men undertook to defend it against 100,000 of the rebel Ostrogoths, who sat down to besiege him. . . . After various successes the Goths themselves, filled with admiration at the character of Belisarius, requested him to accept of the crown of Italy; but that generous and heroic man refused the offer of a kingdom, incapable of betraying the interests of his sovereign, although he had repeatedly experienced his ingratitude.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 5, p. 24.

2129. FIGHTING in Death. Persians. [When Alexander defeated Darius, the Persians were completely routed.] A few of the best and bravest of them, indeed, met their death before the king's chariot; and falling in heaps one upon another, strove to stop the pursuit; for in the very pangs of death they clung to the Macedonians, and caught hold of their horses' legs as they lay upon the ground.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

2130. FIGHTING, Desperate. Battle of Marbeuge. [Cæsar's wars in Gaul.] The Nervii fought with a courage which filled Cæsar with admiration; men of greater spirit he said that he had never seen. As their first ranks fell, they piled the bodies of their comrades into heaps, and from the top of them hurled back the Roman javelins. They would not fly; they dropped where they stood; and the battle ended only with their extermination. Out of 600 senators there survived but three; out of 60,000 men able to bear arms, only 500. The aged of the tribe, and the women and children, who had been left in the morasses for security, sent in their surrender, their warriors being all dead.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 14.

2131. FIGHTING and Praying. Admiral Blake. It was against those splendid Spanish galleons and India-built merchantmen, their holds full of the choicest products of the far West—gold and silver, pearls and precious stones, hides, indigo, cochineal, sugar, and tobacco—that he and his men set forth; and abundant were the treasures of sparkling silver pieces which fell into the horny hands of Blake's men. He made his first seizure on this venture, and sent it home; the bullion was conveyed to London, under the charge of soldiers, and eight-and-thirty wagon-loads of silver reeled along through the streets of London to the Tower, amid the cheerful applause of the multitude. Blake did not come home; he was still out on those distant seas waiting for, and ready to pounce upon, more prizes. Perhaps many of our readers will think it a difficult thing to conceive of this warlike sailor as a God-fearing man, following up all this mischief against the Spaniards in the fear of the Lord; but it was even so; not an oath was heard on board his vessel or vessels, the ordinances of religion were followed up punctiliously. Why not? he was fighting the cause of freedom and faith against popery and absolutism, and their persecutions; and whereas Spain and Rome had made Protestants everywhere tremble, this Gustavus of the seas, in turn, made Spain and Rome to tremble, and perhaps stirred some new thoughts about Protestant heroism within their cruel souls. He appears to have seen plainly the sphere in which he had to play his part. "It is not for us," said he, "to mind State affairs, but to keep the foreigners from fooling us," and his name became as terrible to the foes of England on the sea as Cromwell's on the land.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 16, p. 207.

2134. FINANCE, Delusions in. John Law. [A Scotchman who financiered for Louis XIV.] A bank was Law's first scheme—capital 6,000,000 francs, in shares of 5000 francs each; the shares to be paid for in four instalments—one fourth in coin and three fourths in royal bonds at their par value! . . . All tax-gatherers [were ordered] to receive the notes of the bank in payment of all sums due the government. To the bank was soon added a company, called the "Company of the West," designed to settle and trade with the French province of Louisiana. Shares in this company where also purchasable with the same royal bonds at their par value, with the addition of a small percentage in coin or bank-notes. A "Guinea Company" was also started for trading with the coast of Africa. . . . The schemes having been launched, the next thing was to impose upon the credulity and inflame the avarice of the public. A large engraving was posted . . . exhibiting a number of Louisiana Indians running to meet a group of Frenchmen, each holding out a piece of gold. [The collapse of these schemes was more astonishing than their rise.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 454.

2135. FINANCE, Fraudulent. Rome. A.D. 544. The improvement of the revenue was committed to Alexander, a subtle scribe, long practised in the fraud and oppression of the Byzantine schools, and whose name of Psalliction, the scissors, was drawn from the dexterous artifice with which he reduced the size, without defacing the figure, of the gold coin. Instead of expediting the restoration of peace and industry, he imposed a heavy assessment on the fortunes of the Italians.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 43, p. 252.

2136. FINANCE, Patriotism in. William of Orange. The city of London undertook to extricate the prince from his financial difficulties. The common council, by a unanimous vote, engaged to find him £200,000. It was thought a great proof, both of the wealth and of the public spirit of the merchants of the capital, that in forty-eight hours the whole sum was raised on no security but the prince's word. A few weeks before James had been unable to procure a much smaller sum, though he had offered to pay higher interest, and to pledge valuable property.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 550.

2137. FINANCES, Unsoundness in. Restoration. [The selfish and profligate government of Charles II. appropriated moneys designed to support the navy. The Dutch invaded England, and found sailors demoralized and ships rotting in the ports. Many English sailors on Dutch ships cried out to their companions,] "We did heretofore fight for tickets; now we fight for dollars." . . . The sailors' wives went up and down the streets of Wapping, crying, "This comes of your not paying our husbands." [England received a dishonor never to be wiped off, from the corruption of national honor at the fountain-head.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 17, p. 298.

2138. FINE nullified. Charles I. [He presented a declaration against illegal taxation and innovations in the religion of the State; Parliament was not reassembled for eleven years.] Eliot was fined £2000; he very likely increased the spite of the king by taking precautions against his pouncing upon this valuable little peculation; he said he had two cloaks, a few books, a few pairs of boots, and that was all his personal substance, and if they could turn this into £2000, much good might it do them. So the sheriffs appointed to seize upon his possessions in Cornwall, for the king, were obliged to return a nil.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 3, p. 75.

to the present time.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 23, p. 331.

2140. FIRE, Calamity by. Rome. Fire is the most powerful agent of life and death; the rapid mischief may be kindled and propagated by the industry or negligence of mankind; and every period of the Roman annals is marked by the repetition of similar calamities. A memorable conflagration, the guilt or misfortune of Nero's reign, continued, though with unequal fury, either six or nine days. Innumerable buildings, crowded in close and crooked streets, supplied perpetual fuel for the flames; and when they ceased, four only of the fourteen regions were left entire; three were totally destroyed, and seven were deformed by the relics of smoking and lacerated edifices.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 71, p. 520.

2141. — — —. Rome. In the tenth year of the reign of Nero, the capital of the empire was afflicted by a fire which raged beyond the memory or example of former ages. The monuments of Grecian art and of Roman virtue, the trophies of the Punic and Gallic wars, the most holy temples, and the most splendid palaces were involved in one common destruction.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16, p. 17.

2142. FIRE, Destruction by. By Government. Louis XIV., unable to maintain his conquests, . . . gave orders for the wholesale devastation of the Palatinate by fire and sword, for the purpose of preventing the enemy's army from reoccupying the country. This inhuman decree was instantly carried into execution, and with far more disastrous effect than in the former campaign under Turenne. Having warned the population to retire, the French generals set fire to Heidelberg, with the magnificent palace of the electors, and reduced it to a mass of blackened ruins. Mannheim, Spire, Worms, Oppenheim, Bingen, were condemned in succession to the flames. Crops, farms, vines, orchards, fruit-trees, were all destroyed; and this once rich and smiling land was converted into a desolate wilderness. The houseless peasants, to the number of a hundred thousand, wandered about in abject misery, imprecating the vengeance of Heaven upon the heartless tyrant who had caused their ruin.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 22, § 13, p. 443.

2143. FIRE, Destructive. Greek Fire. The principal ingredient of the Greek fire was the naphtha, or liquid bitumen, a light, tenacious, and inflammable oil, which springs from the earth, and catches fire as soon as it comes in contact with the air. The naphtha was mingled, I know not by what methods or in what proportions, with sulphur and with the pitch that is extracted from evergreen firs. From this mixture, which produced a thick smoke and a loud explosion, proceeded a fierce and obstinate flame, which not only rose in perpendicular ascent, but likewise burnt with equal vehemence in descent or lateral progress; instead of being extinguished, it was nourished and quickened by the element of water; and sand, urine, or vinegar were the only remedies that could damp the fury of this powerful agent, which was justly denominated by the Greeks the liquid or the maritime fire. . . . This important art was preserved at Constantinople, as the palladium of the State; the galleys and artillery might occasionally be lent to the allies of Rome; but the composition of the Greek fire was concealed with the most jealous scruple, and the terror of the enemies was increased and prolonged by their ignorance and surprise.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 52, p. 283.

2144. FIRE, Helpful. London. The [great] fire of London [in 1666] had rendered it impossible to carry on the spiritual instruction of the people by the established clergy (the parish churches being in ruins), and therefore assemblies to hear the sermons of Presbyterians and Independents were not visited with the penalties of the Conventicle Act [which forbid five or more Non-conformists to unite in independent worship]. "It was," says Baxter, "at the first a thing too gross to forbid an undone people all worshipping of God, with too great rigor; and if they had been so forbidden, poverty had left them so little to lose as would have made them desperate to go on."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 18, p. 307.

2145. FIRE, Holy. Altar of Jupiter. [After the Greeks had defeated the Persians they offered sacrifice.] They were directed by Apollo "To build an altar to Jupiter, the deliverer, but not to offer any sacrifice upon it until they had extinguished all the fire in the country (because it had been polluted by the barbarians), and supplied themselves with pure fire from the common altar at Delphi." Hereupon the Grecian generals went all over the country, and caused the fires to be put out; and Eueidas, a Platean, undertaking to fetch fire, with all imaginable speed, from the altar of the god, went to Delphi, sprinkled and purified himself there with water, put a crown of laurel on his head, took fire from the altar, and then hastened back to Platea, where he arrived before sunset, thus performing a journey of a thousand furlongs in one day. But having saluted his fellow-citizens, and delivered the fire, he fell down on the spot and presently expired. The Plateans carried him to the temple of Diana, surnamed Eueleia, and buried him there, putting this short inscription on his tomb: "Here lies Eueidas, who went to Delphi, and returned the same day."—PLUTARCH'S ARISTIDES.

2146. FIRE, Ignorance of. Pacific Islanders. The inhabitants of the Marian Islands, when they were discovered by Magellan in 1521, had, till that time, never seen fire, and expressed the utmost astonishment at it. They believed it to be an animal which fixed itself upon wood and fed upon it, and when approaching so near as to be burnt, they thought they were bit by it. The inhabitants of the Philippine and Canary Islands were, at their first discovery, in a state of equal ignorance.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 7, p. 59.

2148. FIRMNESS, Effect of. Alexander Severus. While the emperor lay at Antioch, in his Persian expedition, the particulars of which we shall hereafter relate, the punishment of some soldiers, who had been discovered in the baths of women, excited a sedition in the legion to which they belonged. Alexander ascended his tribunal, and with a modest firmness represented to the armed multitude the absolute necessity, as well as his inflexible resolution, of correcting the vices introduced by his impure predecessor, and of maintaining the discipline, which could not be relaxed without the ruin of the Roman name and empire. Their clamors interrupted his mild expostulation. "Reserve your shout," said the undaunted emperor, "till you take the field against the Persians, the Germans, and the Sarmatians. Be silent in the presence of your sovereign and benefactor, who bestows upon you the corn, the clothing, and the money of the provinces. Be silent, or I shall no longer style you soldiers, but citizens, if those indeed who disclaim the laws of Rome deserve to be ranked among the meanest of the people." His menaces inflamed the fury of the legion, and their brandished arms already threatened his person. "Your courage . . . would be more nobly displayed on the field of battle; me you may destroy, you cannot intimidate; and the severe justice of the republic would punish your crime and revenge my death." . . . The emperor pronounced the decisive sentence, "Citizens, lay down your arms!" [They were overwhelmed with shame and repentance.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6, p. 188.

2149. FISHING, Fraud in. Antony. [When visiting Cleopatra in Egypt he was guilty of many follies.] He was a fishing one day with Cleopatra, and had ill success, which, in the presence of his mistress, he looked upon as a disgrace; he therefore ordered one of his assistants to dive and put on his hook such as had been taken before. This scheme he put in practice three or four times, and Cleopatra perceived it. She affected, however, to be surprised at his success; expressed her wonder to the people about her; and the day following invited them to see fresh proofs of it. When the day following came, the vessel was crowded with people; and as soon as Antony had let down his line, she ordered one of her divers immediately to put a salt fish on his hook. When Antony found he had caught his fish, he drew up his line; and this, as may be supposed, occasioned no small mirth among the spectators. "Go, general!" said Cleopatra; "leave fishing to us petty princes of Pharos and Canopus; your game is cities, kingdoms, and provinces."—PLUTARCH'S ANTONY.

2150. FLAG, A despised. United States. [During the war with England in 1812.] In the course of the year 250 British ships, carrying 3000 sailors and cargoes of immense value, were captured by American cruisers. . . . France was well pleased. . . . For awhile the English themselves were well-nigh paralyzed. The British newspapers burst forth raging, and declared that the time-honored flag of England had been disgraced "by a piece of striped bunting flying at the mast-head of a few fir-built frigates manned by a handful of . . . outlaws!" And the comment, though stated in unpleasant language, was true!—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 49, p. 398.

2151. FLAG, Devotion to the. Sergeant Jasper. For eight hours [June 28, 1776] the vessels of the [British] fleet poured a tempest of balls upon the fort [Sullivan, South Carolina]; but the walls, built of the spongy palmetto, were little injured. The 400 militiamen who composed the garrison fought like veterans.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 39, p. 308. In the fort, William Jasper, a sergeant, perceived that the flag had been cut down by a ball from the enemy, and had fallen over the ramparts. "Colonel," said he to Moultrie, "don't let us fight without a flag." "What can you do?" asked Moultrie; "the staff is broken off." "Then," said Jasper, "I'll fix it on a halberd, and place it on the merlon of the bastion next the enemy;" and leaping through an embrasure, and braving the thickest fire from the ship, he took up the flag, returned with it in safety, and planted it, as he had promised, on the summit of the merlon.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 66.

2152. FLATTERY, Artful. Captive Queen Zenobia. When the Syrian queen was brought into the presence of Aurelian, he sternly asked her how she had presumed to rise in arms against the emperors of Rome. The answer of Zenobia was a prudent mixture of respect and firmness. "Because I disdained to consider as Roman emperors an Aureolus or a Gallienus. You alone I acknowledge as my conqueror and my sovereign."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 11, p. 357.

2153. FLATTERY, False. Henry VIII. [Rich, the] Speaker of the House of Commons in 1537, compared Henry [VIII.] to Solomon for prudence, to Samson for strength, and to Absalom for beauty—the very sun which warmed and enlightened the universe. [History distinguishes him as the licentious tyrant and infamous husband of six successive wives.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 23, p. 380.

2156. FLATTERY, resented. Alexander. While sailing down the Hydaspes, Aristobulus, a mean sycophant, who had composed a narration of the king's battles, was reading to him for his amusement the accounts of the Indian expedition, in which the writer had exaggerated in many circumstances palpably beyond the truth.

Alexander seized the book, and threw it with indignation into the river, telling the author that he merited the same treatment for having absurdly endeavored to magnify by fiction those deeds which needed no embellishment to attract the admiration of mankind.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4, p. 192.

2157. FLATTERY rewarded. Excessive. One of his flatterers . . . procured a decree that Demetrius, whenever he visited Athens, should be received with the same honors that were paid to Ceres and Bacchus; and that whoever exceeded the rest in the splendor and magnificence of the reception he gave that prince should have money out of the treasury to enable him to set up some pious memorial of his success. These instances of adulation concluded with their changing the name of the month Munyichion to Demetrian, with calling the last day of every month Demetrias; and the Dionysia, or feasts of Bacchus, Demetria.—PLUTARCH'S DEMETRIUS.

2159. FLOGGING, Comfort under. Rev. Samuel Johnson. [He had written tracts against Roman Catholicism. Reign of James II.] The day appointed for the flogging came. A whip of nine lashes was used. Three hundred and seventeen stripes were inflicted; but the sufferer never winced. He afterward said that the pain was cruel, but that, as he was dragged at the tail of the cart, he remembered how patiently the cross had been borne up Mount Calvary, and was so much supported by the thought that, but for the fear of incurring the suspicion of vainglory, he would have sung a psalm with as firm and cheerful a voice as if he had been worshipping God in the congregation.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 99.

2160. FLOGGING, Excessive. Titus Oates. [Titus Oates, the infamous scoundrel and perjurer, was flogged seventeen hundred lashes in two days.] Flogging under the government of James II. became a favorite punishment.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 24, p. 387.

2161. FLOWER, Mysterious. Golden Rose. The mission of Miltitz was to deprive Luther of his patron's support, and then to lead him away to Rome. To this end the papal ambassador appeared before the Elector, presenting him with a distinguished emblem of gracious favor, the golden rose. This was "a very precious and mysterious present," which the pope was accustomed annually to bestow upon that eminent Christian prince who had rendered good service to the apostolic authority, the Pope at Rome. Miltitz was commissioned to present this golden rose to the Elector of Saxony, to the intent that the divine fragrance of this flower should penetrate the heart of Frederick, so that he might receive the requests of the ambassador with a pious regard, and be disposed with glowing ardor to carry out the sacred wishes of the Pope. At least this much was expected in Rome from the fragrance of the golden rose. Irreverent wits remarked, that if the rose had arrived sooner in Wittenberg its perfume would have been more agreeable; for it had lost its fragrance on the long and wearisome journey!—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 5, p. 58.

2162. FLOWERS in Blood. War of the Roses. [Gloucester had been adverse to the marriage of Margaret of Anjou to Henry VII.] The Duke of Gloucester was arrested soon after on an accusation of treason, and was next morning found dead in his bed. These outrageous proceedings produced the greatest disgust in the minds of the people against the queen and the cardinal of Winchester, and rendered the king's name, who was supposed at least to countenance these enormities, both odious and despicable. It was the time for a competitor to start forth and to avail himself of this general disaffection to the prince on the throne. This competitor was Richard, duke of York, a descendant, by the mother's side, from Lionel, who was one of the sons of Edward III., and elder brother to John of Gaunt, from whom the present monarch was descended. Richard, therefore, stood plainly in right of succession before Henry. He bore for his ensign a white rose, while Henry bore a red one; and this circumstance gave the name to the two factions which deluged England in blood.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 14.

2163. FLOWERS, Influence of. Wordsworth. [The poet's mother died when he was eight years old.] I remember my mother only in some few situations, one of which was her pinning a nosegay to my breast when I was going to catechism in the church, as was customary before Easter.—MYER'S WORDSWORTH, ch. 1.

2165. FOGYISM an Obstacle. Manufactures. An act of 1668 recites, that the wood and timber of the crown in the forest of Dean had become totally destroyed. The manufacture of iron was unpopular. Many said, "It were well if there were no iron works in England, and it was better when no iron was made in England; the iron works destroy all the woods, and foreign iron from Spain will do better and last longer."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 1, p. 12.

2166. FOGYISM unveiled. British. It is natural that, being dissatisfied with the present, we should form a too favorable estimate of the past. . . . It is now the fashion to place the golden age of England in times when noblemen were destitute of comforts the want of which would be intolerable to a modern footman; when farmers and shop-keepers breakfasted on loaves the very sight of which would raise a riot in a modern work-house; when men died faster in the purest country air than they now die in the most pestilential lanes of our towns; and when men died faster in the lanes of our towns than they now die on the coast of Guiana.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 396.

2167. FOLLOWER, An inferior. Greek Emperor. I should perhaps compare the Emperor Alexius to the jackal, who is said to follow the steps and to devour the leavings of the lion. Whatever had been his fears and toils in the passage of the first crusade, they were amply recompensed by the subsequent benefits which he derived from the exploits of the Franks.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 59, p. 1.

2169. FOLLY incurable. James II. James, as usual, came to the help of his enemies. A letter from him to the convention had just arrived in London. . . . No member of either house ventured to propose that a paper which came from such a quarter should be read. The contents, however, were well known to all the town. His Majesty exhorted the Lords and Commons not to despair of his clemency, and graciously assured them that he would pardon those who had betrayed him, some few excepted, whom he did not name. How was it possible to do anything for a prince who, vanquished, deserted, banished, living on alms, told those who were the arbiters of his fate that, if they would set him on his throne again, he would only hang a few of them. [After the overthrow of James a convention met to dispose of the throne.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 594.

2170. FOLLY, Learned. Disputes. [Pericles was abused by his son Xanthippus in this manner:] He exposed and ridiculed the company he kept in his house and the conversations he held with the philosophers. He said that Epitimus, the Pharsalian, having undesignedly killed a horse with a javelin which he threw at the public games, his father spent a whole day in disputing with Protogorus which might be properly deemed the cause of his death—the javelin, or the man that threw it, or the president of the games.—PLUTARCH'S PERICLES.

2172. FOLLY, Religious. Egyptians. The extravagant length to which the Egyptians carried their veneration for their consecrated animals exceeds all belief. The sacred crocodile, the dog, or the cat were kept in an enclosed space set apart, adjoining to the temples dedicated to their worship. They were constantly attended by men of the highest rank, whose business was to provide them with the choicest victuals, which they were at pains to dress in the manner they supposed most agreeable to their palate. They washed them in warm baths, and anointed them with the richest perfumes. The finest carpets were spread for them to lie on; chains of gold and circlets of precious stones were hung around their legs and necks; and when the stupid animal, insensible of the honors that were bestowed on him, died like the rest of his kind, the whole province was filled with lamentation; and not only the fortunes of the priests but the public revenue was without scruple expended in the performance of the most sumptuous funeral obsequies.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4.

Michaelmas. But in the course of two centuries an improvement had taken place; and under Charles II. it was not till the beginning of November that families laid in their stock of salt provisions, then called Martinmas beef.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 293.

2176. FOOD, Chosen. Lord Palmerston. It is reported of Lord Palmerston, the late prime minister of England, that whenever he engaged a new cook he used to say to him: "I wish you to prepare what is called a good table for my guests; but for me there must always be a leg of mutton and an apple-pie." . . . A life like this Lord Palmerston led for fifty-seven years, supporting the animal man on such fare as roast mutton and apple-pie. He could not have done it on turtle and venison, still less on our American hot bread, buckwheat cakes, and fried meat.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 499.

2177. FOOD, Dangerous. Poison Yuca. The Indians . . . brought . . . cakes of a kind of bread called cassava, which constituted a principal part of their food, and was afterward an important article of provisions with the Spaniards. It was formed from a great root called yuca, which they cultivated in fields. This they cut into small morsels, which they grated or scraped, and strained in a press, making a broad thin cake, which was afterward dried hard, and would keep for a long time, being steeped in water when eaten. It was insipid, but nourishing, though the water strained from it in the preparation was a deadly poison. There was another kind of yuca destitute of this poisonous quality which was eaten in the root, either boiled or roasted.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 4, ch. 15.

2178. FOOD, Extravagance in. Singing Birds. Æsopus Clodius, a famous Roman actor, lived in the most luxurious manner, and once served up a dish of singing birds that cost $4000 at a banquet.—AM. CYCLOPEDIA, "ÆSOPUS."

2180. FOOD, Mind affected by. Mahomet. [The Arabs relate that the king of Persia, hearing the renown of Mahomet,] asked: "What aliment is he fed upon?" "Bread and cheese," it was replied. "So I thought," rejoined the monarch, "for milk and dates could not produce this subtlety."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 66.

2181. FOOD, Poor. England. Meat was also cheaper, but was still so dear that there were hundreds of thousands of families who scarcely knew the taste of it. In the cost of wheat there has been very little change. The average price of the quarter, during the last twelve years of Charles II., was fifty shillings. Bread, therefore, such as is now given to the inmates of a work-house, was then seldom seen, even on the trencher of a yeoman or of a shopkeeper. The great majority of the nation lived almost entirely on rye, barley, and oats.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 391.

2182. FOOD, Public. Spartan Tables. The whole citizens of the republic were divided into vicinages of fifteen families, and each vicinage had a common table, where all were obliged to dine . . . without distinction of ranks—the kings, senators, and magistrates, indiscriminately with the people. Here all partook of the same homely fare, dressed in the simplest and most frugal manner. At those public tables the youth not only learned moderation and temperance, but wisdom and good morals. The conversation was regulated and prescribed. It turned solely on such subjects as tended to instil into the minds of the rising generation the principles of virtue, and that affection for their country which characterizes the worthy citizens of every government, but was peculiarly eminent under the Spartan constitution.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 9.

2184. FOOD, Suspicious. Watering-place. England, however, was not, in the seventeenth century, destitute of watering-places. The gentry of Derbyshire and of the neighboring counties repaired to Buxton, where they were crowded into low wooden sheds, and regaled with oat-cake and with a viand which the hosts called mutton, but which the guests strongly suspected to be dog.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 322.

2186. FOOD, Wonder in. London. The greatest wonder that London presented to a New Zealander, who was brought to England some years ago, was the mystery of feeding an immense population, as he saw neither cattle nor crops.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 22, p. 388.

2187. FORCE, Distinguished by. Charles Martel. [The deliverer of Europe from the Saracens.] The Arabian fleet might have sailed without a naval combat into the mouth of the Thames. Perhaps the interpretation of the Koran would now be taught in the schools of Oxford, and her pulpits might demonstrate to a circumcised people the sanctity and truth of the revelation of Mabrouet. From such calamities was Christendom delivered by the genius and fortune of one man. Charles, the illegitimate son of the elder Pepin, was content with the titles of mayor or duke of the Franks; but he deserved to become the father of a line of kings. . . . The epithet of Martel, the Hammer, which has been added to the name of Charles, is expressive of his weighty and irresistible strokes. — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51.

2108. FORCE, Fictitious. Queen of Scots. Some days after the 24th of April, while returning from Stirling, where she had been visiting her son, Bothwell, with a body of his friends, awaited her at Almond Bridge, six miles from Edinburgh. He dismounted from his horse, respectfully took hold of the bridal of the queen's palfry, feigned a slight compulsion, and conducted his voluntary captive to the castle of Dunbar, of which he was governor, as warden of the borders. There she passed with him eight days, as if suffering violence, and returned on the 8th of May with him to Edinburgh, "resigned," she said, "to marry with her consent him who had disposed of her by force." This comedy deceived no one, but saved Mary from the open accusation of espousing from choice the assassin of her husband. Bothwell . . . had three other wives living. By gold or threats he got rid of two, and he divorced the third; . . . to secure this divorce, he consented to be found guilty of adultery. — LAMARTINE'S MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, p. 31.

2109. FOREIGNERS, Antipathy to. Egyptians. We have seen the Egyptians, a people remarkable for their early civilization, for the antiquity of their government, the systematic order of their civil policy, the wisdom of many of their laws, and their singular progress in the arts, at a period when almost all the nations of the earth were sunk in ignorance and barbarism. It must, therefore, without doubt, appear extraordinary that, with all these advantages, the character of this people was held extremely low, and even despicable among the contemporary nations of antiquity. This peculiarity may, perhaps, be traced up to a single cause. They were a people who chose to sequester themselves from the rest of mankind, and obstinately or fastidiously refused all correspondence with other nations. They were not known to them by their conquests; they had no connection with them by their commerce; and they had a rooted antipathy to the manners, and even to the persons of all strangers. — TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4.

2190. FOREIGNERS dishonored. Athens. It was a law at Athens, that every citizen who had a foreigner to his mother should be deemed a bastard, though born in wedlock, and should consequently be incapable of inheriting his father's estate. — PLUTARCH'S THEMISTOCLES, LANGHORNE'S NOTE.

2191. FOREIGNERS feared. Sparta. [Lycurgus forbid strangers] to resort to Sparta who could not assign a good reason for their coming; not, as Thucydides says, out of fear they should imitate the constitution of that city, and make improvements in virtue, but lest they should teach his own people some evil. For along with foreigners come new subjects of discourse; new discourse produces new opinions; and from these there necessarily spring new passions and desires, which, like discords in music, would disturb the established government. He therefore thought it more expedient for the city to keep out of it corrupt customs and manners, than even to prevent the introduction of a pestilence. — PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

2193. FORGERY, Convenient. Roman Emperor Carinus. A confidential secretary, who had acquired uncommon skill in the art of forgery, delivered the indolent emperor, with his own consent, from the irksome duty of signing his name. — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12.

2194. FORGERY, A delusive. William of Orange. [He had invaded England. A manifesto appeared under the apparent hand and seal of the prince.] Vengeance alien from the usages of Christian and civilized nations was denounced against all papists who should dare to espouse the royal cause. They should be treated, not as soldiers or gentlemen, but as freebooters. The ferocity and licentiousness of the invading army, which had hitherto been restrained with a strong hand, should be let loose on them. Good Protestants, and especially those who inhabited the capital, were adjured, as they valued all that was dear to them, and commanded, on peril of the prince's highest displeasure, to seize, disarm, and imprison their Roman Catholic neighbors. This document, it is said, was found by a Whig bookseller one morning under his shop door. He made haste to print it. Many copies were dispersed by the post, and passed rapidly from hand to hand. Discerning men had no difficulty in pronouncing it a forgery devised by some unquiet and unprincipled adventurer, such as, in troubled times, are always busy in the foulest and darkest offices of faction. But the multitude was completely duped.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 491.

2195. FORGERY, Perilous. Paris. A.D. 1812. [When Napoleon was retreating from Moscow,] an officer by the name of Mallet forged an account of the death of Napoleon. Availing himself of the panic which the announcement caused, he gathered around him a few hundred of the National Guard, and made the most audacious attempt to take into his own hands the reigns of power. The conspirator, however, was soon arrested and shot.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 14.

2196. FORGETFULNESS desired. Themistocles. When Simonides offered to teach Themistocles the art of memory, he answered, "Ah! rather teach me the art of forgetting; for I often remember what I would not, and cannot forget what I would."—PLUTARCH'S THEMISTOCLES, LANGHORNE'S NOTE.

2197. FORGIVENESS, Christian. The Turk. [Romanus] the successor of Constantine, in a plebeian habit, was led into the Turkish divan, and commanded to kiss the ground before the lord of Asia. He reluctantly obeyed; and Alp Arslan, starting from his throne, is said to have planted his foot on the neck of the Roman emperor. . . . In the preliminaries of negotiation, Alp Arslan asked him what treatment he expected to receive, and the calm indifference of the emperor displays the freedom of his mind. "If you are cruel," said he, "you will take my life; if you listen to pride, you will drag me at your chariot-wheels; if you consult your interest, you will accept a ransom, and restore me to my country." "And what," continued the sultan, "would have been your own behavior had fortune smiled on your arms?" The reply of the Greek betrays a sentiment which prudence, and even gratitude, should have taught him to suppress. "Had I vanquished," he fiercely said, "I would have inflicted on thy body many a stripe." The Turkish conqueror smiled at the insolence of his captive; observed that the Christian law inculcated the love of enemies and forgiveness of injuries; and nobly declared that he would not imitate an example which he condemned.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 57.

2198. FORGIVENESS for the Dead. Napoleon I. [At the battle of Wagram] Napoleon recognized among the slain a colonel who had given him cause for displeasure. He stopped and gazed for a moment upon his sadly mutilated body stretched upon the gory field, and said, with emotions which every generous heart will understand, "I regret not having been able to speak to him before the battle, in order to tell him that I had long forgotten everything."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 9.

2199. FORGIVENESS, Generous. John Wesley. Joseph Bradford was for many years the travelling companion of the Rev. John Wesley, and considered no assistance to him too servile, but was subject to changes of temper. Wesley directed him to carry a package of letters to the post; Bradford wished to hear his sermon first; Wesley was urgent and insisted; Bradford refused. "Then," said Wesley, "you and I must part." "Very good, sir," replied Bradford. . . . They slept over it. On rising the next morning Wesley accosted his old friend and asked if he had considered what he had said, that "they must part." "Yes, sir," replied Bradford. "And must we part?" inquired Wesley. "Please yourself, sir," was the reply. "Will you ask my pardon?" rejoined Wesley. "No, sir." "You won't?" "No, sir." "Then I will ask yours!" replied the great man. Bradford melted under the example, and wept like a child.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 2, p. 386.

2200. ——. Louis XII. [When Louis XII. was made king the] magistrates of Orleans, who sent a deputation to ask pardon. . . . for indignities which he had suffered while a prisoner in that city, were dismissed with the generous and celebrated answer that "it did not become the King of France to resent the injuries of the Duke of Orleans."—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 13, § 1.

2201. FORGIVENESS impossible. Divorce of Josephine. It is the great and the ineffable stain which rests upon the character of Napoleon. Josephine the gentle, the loving, the magnanimous, forgave him. The world never can. . . . Napoleon himself was constrained to confess that it was the greatest calamity of his life.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 3.

2202. FORGIVENESS, Prospective. Frederick William. [On his death-bed the minister reminded him of the need of confession of sin.] "Well—is there anything more? Out with it, then; better now than too late!" [And certain building operations of an oppressive character come under review.] . . . "And then there is forgiveness of enemies; your Majesty is bound to forgive all men, or how can you ask to be forgiven?" "Well, I will; I do. You Feekin [his wife, Queen Sophie], write to your brother (unforgiveablest of beings), after I am dead, that I forgave him, died in peace with him." "Better her Majesty should write at once," suggests Roloff. "No, after I am dead," persists the son of nature, "that will be safer!" An unwedgeable and gnarled big block of manhood and simplicity and sincerity; such as we rarely get sight of among the modern sons of Adam, among the crowned sons nearly never. At parting he said to Roloff, "You (Er, He) do not spare me; it is right. You do your duty like an honest Christian man."—CARLYLE'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, vol. 2, pp. 681–683.

2203. FORSAKEN, Justly. James II. On the morning of the 26th [his Protestant daughter] Anne's apartment was found empty; the consternation was great in Whitehall. The ladies of her bed-chamber ran up and down the courts of the palace, screaming and wringing their hands. . . . In the midst of this distress and terror arrived the news of Prince George's flight. The courier who brought these evil tidings was fast followed by the king himself. The evening was closing in when James arrived, and was informed that his daughter had disappeared. After all that he had suffered, this affliction forced a cry from his lips. "God help me," he said; "my own children have forsaken me!"—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 480.

2204. FORTITUDE, Esteem for. Mucius. [He entered into the camp of Porsena, a powerful Italian prince, to assassinate him. Not knowing which man was Porsena, he killed the wrong man.] Upon this he was seized and examined. Meantime, as there happened to be a portable altar there, with fire upon it, where the king was about to offer sacrifice, Mucius thrust his right hand into it; and as the flesh was burning, he kept looking upon Porsena with a firm and menacing aspect, until the king, astonished at his fortitude, returned him his sword with his own hand. He received it with his left hand, from whence we are told he had the surname of Scævola, which signifies left-handed; and thus addressed himself to Porsena: "Your threatenings I regarded not, but am conquered by your generosity, and out of gratitude will declare to you what no force should have wrested from me. There are three hundred Romans that have taken the same resolution with mine, who now walk about your camp, watching their opportunity. It was my lot to make the first attempt, and I am not sorry that my sword was directed by fortune against another, instead of a man of so much honor, who, as such, should rather be a friend than an enemy to the Romans." Porsena believed this account, and was more inclined to hearken to terms, not so much in my opinion through fear of three hundred assassins, as admiration of the dignity of the Roman valor.—PLUTARCH'S PUBLICOLA.

2205. FORTITUDE, Paritanic. Hugh Peter's. [Once minister of Salem. Condemned to regicide—death of Charles I.] He was allowed no council. . . . At the gallows he was compelled to wait while the body of his friend Cooke, who had just been hanged, was cut down and quartered before his eyes. "How like you this?" cried the executioner, rubbing his bloody hands. "I thank God," replied the martyr, "I am not terrified at it; you may do your worst." To his friends he said, "Weep not for me; my heart is full of comfort."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 11.

2206. FORTUNE, Change of. Columbus. Great was the agitation of the inhabitants, therefore, when they beheld one of the ships standing up the river; but when they learned that she returned in triumph from the discovery of a world, the whole community broke forth into transports of joy. The bells were rung, the shops shut, all business was suspended; for a time there was nothing but hurry and tumult. Some were anxious to know the fate of a relative, others of a friend, and all to learn the particulars of so wonderful a voyage. When Columbus landed, the multitude thronged to see and welcome him, and a grand procession was formed to the principal church, to return thanks to God for so signal a discovery made by the people of that place—forgetting, in their exultation, the thousand difficulties they had thrown in the way of the enterprise. Wherever Columbus passed he was hailed with shouts and acclamations. What a contrast to his departure a few months before, followed by murmurs and execrations; or, rather, what a contrast to his first arrival at Palos, a poor pedestrian, craving bread and water for his child at the gate of a convent! —IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 5, ch. 5.

2207. FORTUNE, Contrasts in. Inheritance. "How different," said the younger Andronicus, "is my situation from that of the son of Philip! Alexander might complain that his father would leave him nothing to conquer; alas! my grand-sire will leave me nothing to lose."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 63.

2208. FORTUNE, Favors of. Charles V. The siege of Metz is one of the most memorable episodes in the struggle between the rival houses of France and Austria. For two months the Imperialists . . . battered the walls with a ceaseless cannonade, and exhausted all other resources of the art of war, with a total want of success. The defenders repaired by night the breaches effected by the enemy during the day. . . . Thousands were slain by the well-directed fire from the ramparts; and as the winter advanced, the besiegers suffered still greater losses from the pitiless severity of the weather, from sickness, hardship, and famine. The siege became at length evidently hopeless; and Charles, bitterly observing that "Fortune, like the rest of her sex, favored the young and neglected those advanced in years," gave orders to abandon it.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 15, § 4.

2209. FORTUNE, Forsaken by. Louis XIV. Louis received the news of the disheartening reverses [of his forces at Blenheim and Ramillies] with unmoved composure. His behavior to the unfortunate marshal Villeroy was magnanimous. "Monsieur le Maréchal," said the king, when he made his appearance at Versailles, "at our age one is no longer fortunate."—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 22, § 8.

2210. FORTUNE reversed. Duke of Exeter. [After the triumph of the Yorkists Edward IV. was crowned, and Lancastrians went into exile and poverty.] "Some of them," says Comines, "were reduced to such extremity of want before the Duke of Burgundy received them, that no common beggar could have been in greater. I saw one of them, who was Duke of Exeter, but who concealed his name, following the Duke of Burgundy's train bare-foot and bare-legged, begging his bread from door to door. This man was next of the house of Lancaster; had married King Edward's sister; and being afterward known, had a small pension allowed him for his subsistence."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 10, p. 151.

2211. ———. Nicetas. [Sacking of Constantinople by crusaders.] His stately palace had been reduced to ashes . . . and the senator [Nicetas], with his family and friends, found an obscure shelter in another house, which he possessed near the church of St. Sophia. It was the door of this mean habitation that his friend, the Venetian merchant, guarded in the disguise of a soldier, till Nicetas could save, by a precipitate flight, the relics of his fortune and the chastity of his daughter. In a cold, wintry season, these fugitives, nursed in the lap of prosperity, departed on foot; his wife was with child; the desertion of their slaves compelled them to carry their baggage on their shoulders; and their women, whom they placed in the centre, were exhorted to conceal their beauty with dirt, instead of adorning it with paint and jewels. Every step was exposed to insult and danger.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 60.

2214. FRAUD, Gigantic. South Sea Scheme. [In July of 1720] . . . the crowds of those that possess the redeemable annuities is so great that the bank . . . has been forced to set tables with clerks in the streets. The £100 shares went up to £1000 in August. [The company sought to lessen the number of their competitors. A panic ensued.] By the middle of September holders of South Sea Stock were crowding the Exchange, not as buyers, but as more eager sellers. The stock was at 850 on the 18th of August; in a month it had fallen to 410. . . . On the 29th of September . . . it was 175. [The consternation was inexpressible; thousands of families were reduced to beggary;] merchants, lawyers, physicians, clergy, passed from their dream of fabulous wealth and from their wonted comforts into poverty. Some died of broken hearts, others withdrew to remote parts of the world, and never returned. [The sufferers reproached every one but themselves who sought sudden wealth by gambling rather than by work.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 3, p. 40.

2215. FRAUD, Governmental. Charles II. The first object of Charles was to obtain from the Commons supplies which might be employed in executing the secret treaty [with France]. . . . It was necessary to have recourse to fraud. The king accordingly professed great zeal for the principles of the Triple Alliance, and pretended that, in order to hold the ambition of France in check, it would be necessary to augment the fleet. The Commons fell into the snare, and voted a grant of £800,000. The Parliament was instantly prorogued; and the court, thus emancipated from control, proceeded to the execution of the great design.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 201.

2216. FRAUD, Suspicions of. First Cable. This was placed upon two ships, which were to meet in mid-ocean. They did meet; the two ends of the cable were joined and laid down successfully. At the Newfoundland end four hundred messages were received from Europe, when the current became weaker and weaker, and finally ceased to make any mechanical movement. On this side people were sceptical; few believed that any message had been sent at all; they looked upon the whole thing as a gigantic humbug.—LESTER'S LIFE OF PETER COOPER, p. 26.

2218. FREEDOM, Determined for. William Wallace. Wallace in September, 1297, encamped near Stirling, the pass between the north and the south, and awaited the English advance. It was here that he was found by the English army. The offers of John of Warenne were scornfully rejected. "We have come," said the Scottish leader, "not to make peace, but to free our country." The position of Wallace behind a loop of Forth was, in fact, chosen with consummate skill. The one bridge which crossed the river was only broad enough to admit two horsemen abreast; and though the English army had been passing from daybreak, but half its force was across at noon, when Wallace closed on it and cut it, after a short combat, to pieces in sight of its comrades.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 291.

2220. FRIEND, Chosen. Alexander's. Hephæstion was the constant companion of his pleasures, and dear to him through the sweetness of his nature; they were nearly of the same age, but Hephæstion was the more handsome. When Sysigambis, the captive mother of Darius, entered Alexander's tent, she threw herself at Hephæstion's feet; he modestly retired, and the empress felt abashed at her mistake. The generous conqueror said, "You have not erred, madam, for he too is Alexander."

2221. FRIEND or Foe. Agésilas. When the [King of Sparta] had crossed the Hellespont, he marched through Thrace without asking leave of any of the barbarians. He only desired to know of each people whether they would have him pass as a friend or as an enemy. All the rest received him with tokens of friendship, and showed him all the civilities in their power on his way; but the Trallians, of whom Xerxes is said to have bought a passage, demanded of Agesilaus 100 talents of silver, and as many women. He answered the messenger ironically, "Why did not they then come to receive them?" At the same time, he marched forward, and finding them drawn up to oppose him, he gave them battle, and routed them with great slaughter. He sent some of his people to put the same question to the King of Macedon, who answered, "I will consider of it." "Let him consider," said he; "in the mean time we march." The king, surprised and awed by his spirit, desired him to pass as a friend.—PLUTARCH'S AGESILAUS.

2222. FRIEND, Obsequious. Cæsar's. One obsequious senator proposed that every woman in Rome should be at his disposition, and filthy libels against him were set floating under the surface. The object, he perfectly understood, "was to draw him into a position more and more invidious, that he might the sooner perish."—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 26.

2223. FRIEND in Sickness, A. Prince of Orange. [Seized by the small-pox.] The public consternation was great. . . . His escape was attributed partly to his own singular equanimity, and partly to the intrepid and indefatigable friendship of Bentinck [a noble Batavian]. From the hands of Bentinck alone William took food and medicine. By Bentinck alone William was lifted from bed and laid down in it. "Whether Bentinck slept or not while I was ill," said William to Temple, with great tenderness, "I know not; but this I know, that, through sixteen days and nights, I never once called for anything but that Bentinck was instantly at my side. [Bentinck took the disease, but recovered.] [See No. 2235.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 157.

2224. FRIEND, A sordid. Oliver Goldsmith's. [He went out to see the world, and fell short of cash to return home. Called on an old "friend."] I again renewed the tale of my mistress, and asked "how he thought I could travel above a hundred miles upon one half crown?" I begged to borrow a single guinea, which I assured him would be repaid with thanks. "And you know, sir," said I, "it is no more than I have done for you." To which he firmly answered, "Why, look you, Mr. Goldsmith, that is neither here nor there. I have paid you all you ever lent me, and this sickness of mine has left me bare of cash. But I have be-thought myself of a conveyance for you; sell your horse, and I will furnish you a much better one to ride on." I readily grasped at his proposal, and begged to see the nag; on which he led me to his bed-chamber, and from under the bed he pulled out a stout oak stick. "Here he is," said he; "take this in your hand, and it will carry you to your mother's with more safety than such a horse as you ride." I was in doubt, when I got it into my hand, whether I should net, in the first place, apply it to his pate.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 3, p. 34.

2225. FRIEND, A welcome. Lafayette. At last the Republicans of France, displeased with the double-dealing of their government, began to embark for America. Foremost of all came the gallant young Marquis of Lafayette. Though the [French] king withheld permission, though the British minister protested, though family and home and kindred beckoned the youthful nobleman to return, he left all to fight the battle of freedom in another land. Fitting a vessel at his own expense, he eluded the officers, and with the brave De Kalb and a small company of followers reached Georgetown, South Carolina, in April of 1777.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 40, p. 320.

2226. FRIEND, A wounded. Stonewall Jackson. [On the 2d of May, 1863, he led a destructive attack on the right wing of General Hooker's Union army.] As night came on, with ruin impending over the Federal army, the brave Confederate leader, riding through the gathering darkness, received a volley from his own lines, and fell mortally wounded.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 65, p. 518.

2227. FRIENDS in Battle. Locked their Shields. Being placed together among the heavy-armed infantry, and fighting with the Arcadians, that wing of the Lacedæmonians in which they were gave way, and was broken; whereupon Pelopidas and Epaminondas locked their shields together, and repulsed all that attacked them, until at last Pelopidas, having received seven large wounds, fell upon a heap of friends and enemies who lay dead together. Epaminondas, though he thought there was no life left in him, yet stood forward to defend his body and his arms, and being determined to die rather than leave his companion in the power of his enemies, he engaged with numbers at once. He was now in extreme danger, being wounded in the breast with a spear and in the arm with a sword, when Agesipolis, King of the Lacedæmonians, brought succors from the other wing, and, beyond all expectation, delivered them both.—PLUTARCH'S PELOPIDAS.

2229. FRIENDS, Discouraging. Luther's. "Go to your cell and pray, my brother, that the Lord will have mercy upon you"—thus said many a one that thought so vast an undertaking by an insignificant monk against the pope—of whose might and influence kings were afraid—would surely come to grief. "My dear Brother Martin," said an aged Westphalian clergyman, "if you can do away with purgatory and the traffic in indulgences, you are indeed a great man!" . . . Luther's prior and sub-prior came and entreated him not to bring reproach upon his order, for the other orders were already leaping with joy, saying that they were not the only ones guilty of offences, but that now the Augustinians were also in the fire and bearers of shame. Luther replied to them, "Dear fathers, if this work has not been begun in God's name, it will soon come to naught; but if it has been begun in His name, then let Him rule as He will!"—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 4, p. 47.

2230. FRIENDS, Faults of. Napoleon I. [During his captivity at St. Helena a paper was presented] to all the companions [who had chosen to go into exile with him] and the domestics of the Emperor, stating that they were at liberty to leave St. Helena and return to Europe if they wished to do so. If they desired to remain . . . they were required to submit to all the restrictions which might be imposed upon the emperor, . . . and remaining on the dreary rock during the lifetime of the emperor. All promptly signed it [to remain] but General Bertrand. His hesitation wounded the feelings of the emperor. He simply remarked, however, "Bertrand is always the same. Although he constantly speaks of going, when the time comes he will not have the courage to leave. We must be able to love our friends with all their faults."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON, vol. 2, ch. 31.

2231. FRIENDS, Unlike. Halifax—Burnet. Halifax and Burnet had long been on terms of friendship. No two men, indeed, could resemble each other less. Burnet was utterly destitute of delicacy and tact. Halifax's taste was fastidious, and his sense of the ludicrous morbidly quick. Burnet viewed every act and every character through a medium distorted and colored by party spirit. The tendency of Halifax's mind was always to see the faults of his allies more strongly than the faults of his opponents. Burnet was, with all his infirmities, and through all the vicissitudes of a life passed in circumstances not very favorable to piety, a sincerely pious man. The sceptical and sarcastic Halifax lay under the imputation of infidelity. Halifax, therefore, often incurred Burnet's indignant censure, and Burnet was often the butt of Halifax's keen and polished pleasantry. Yet they were drawn to each other by a mutual attraction, liked each other's conversation, appreciated each other's abilities, interchanged opinions freely, and interchanged also good offices in perilous times. [Lord Halifax was a statesman, and Bishop Burnet the religious adviser of Queen Mary.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 499.

2232. FRIENDSHIP applauded. Napoleon I. [In 1808 there was a notable meeting of kings and emperors at Erfurth. Princes and courtiers were numerous.] The town was illuminated. A tragedy developing the noblest traits of human nature was performed by the most accomplished actors of France. [Emperor Alexander [of Russia] sat by the side of Napoleon. As the sentiment was expressed from the stage, "The friendship of a great man is a gift from the gods!"]

Alexander gracefully rose, took the hand of Napoleon, and bowing said, "I experience the truth of that sentiment to-day." An instinctive burst of applause from a pit full of princes, nobles, and kings shook the walls of the theatre.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 3.

2233. FRIENDSHIP, Commanding. Reign of James II. Ever since the reign of Edward III. the Talbotts had sat among the peers of the realm. . . . [The Earl of Shrewsbury was Charles Talbot.] His person was pleasing, his temper singularly sweet, his parts such as, if he had been born in a humble rank, might well have raised him to the height of civil greatness. All these advantages he had so improved, that before he was of age he was allowed to be one of the finest gentlemen and finest scholars of his time, . . . though his principles were unsteady, his impulses were so generous, his temper so bland, his manners so gracious and easy, that it was impossible not to love him. He was early called the King of Hearts, and never, through a long, eventful, and checkered life, lost his right to that name.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 296.

ever so good, must be confirmed by presents.”—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 8, p. 123.

2237. FRIENDSHIP by Contrast. Frederick the Great. [The infidel] . . . Marquess D'Argens was among the king's favorite companions, on account, as it would seem, of the strong opposition between their characters. The parts of D'Argens were good and his manners those of a finished French gentleman; but his whole soul was dissolved in sloth, timidity, and self-indulgence. . . . He was the slave of dreams and omens—would not sit down to the table with thirteen in company, turned pale if the salt fell toward him, begged his guests not to cross their knives and forks on their plates, and would not for the world commence a journey on Friday. His health was a subject of constant anxiety to him. Whenever his head ached or his pulse beat quick, his dastardly fears and effeminate precautions were the jest of all Berlin. All this suited the king's purpose admirably. He wanted somebody by whom he might be amused, and whom he might despise. When he wished to pass half an hour in easy, polished conversation, D'Argens was an excellent companion; when he wanted to vent his spleen and contempt, D'Argens was an excellent butt.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 55.

2238. FRIENDSHIP, Controlling. Alexander Pope. Pope resembled one of the inferior bodies of the solar system, whose orbit is dependent upon that of some more massive planet; and having been a satellite of Swift, he was now swept into the train of the more imposing Bolingbroke.—MYER'S WORDSWORTH, ch. 7.

2239. FRIENDSHIP, Inseparable. Napoleon I. [After his burial at St. Helena] the devoted household of Napoleon sadly embarked for Europe. . . . One of their number, however, Sergeant Hubert, in the enthusiasm of his deathless devotion, refused to abandon even the grave of the emperor. For nineteen years he continued at St. Helena, daily guarding the solitary tomb; and when . . . they were removed to repose on the banks of the Seine, beneath the dome of the Invalides, . . . this faithful servant followed them to their last resting-place.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 34.

2240. FRIENDSHIP, Perilous. Robert Burns. [With smugglers and adventurers at Irving.] Among these he contracted, says Gilbert, “some acquaintance of a freer manner of thinking and living than he had been used to, whose society prepared him for overleaping the bonds of rigid virtue which had hitherto restrained him.” One companion, a sailor-lad of wild life and loose and irregular habits, had a wonderful fascination for Burns, who admired him for what he thought his independence and magnanimity. “He was,” says Burns, “the only man I ever knew who was a greater fool than myself where woman was the presiding star; but he spoke of lawless love with levity, which hitherto I had regarded with horror. Here his friendship did me a mischief.”—SHAIRP'S BURNS, ch. 1.

2241. FRIENDSHIP repaired. Samuel Johnson. He said to Sir Joshua Reynolds: “If a man does not make new acquaintance as he advances through life, he will soon find himself left alone. A man, sir, should keep his friendship in constant repair.”—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 80.

2242. FRIENDSHIP, Schoolboy's. Byron. We have one of his school letters, in which he reproaches one of his friends for beginning his last letter “My dear Byron,” instead of “My dearest Byron.” In the defence of his friends he was a very valiant champion. One of them being weak from a recent sickness was ill-fitted to fight his way in a great concourse of rough boys, and Byron said to him: “Harness, if any one bullies you, tell me, and I'll thrash him if I can.” He kept his word, and the two boys remained fast friends for many years.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 292.

2243. FRIENDSHIP, Treacherous. James I. [In 1616 James I. ordered the arrest of the Earl of Somerset, once his favorite, on suspicion of a connection with the murder of Thomas Overbury, in the Tower.] The king had a loathsome way of lolling his arms about his favorites' necks, and kissing them. In this posture the messenger with the warrant found the king with Somerset, saying, “When shall I see thee again?” . . . Somerset exclaimed that never such an affront was offered to a peer of England in presence of the king. “Nay, man,” said the king; “if Coke” (the Lord Chief Justice) “sends for me, I must go;” and when he was gone: “Now may the Deel go with thee,” said the king, “for I will never see thy face any more.”—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 24, p. 365.

2245. FRUGALITY, Misapplied. Charles II. Our relations with foreign courts had been put on the most economical footing. In this frugality there was nothing laudable. Charles was, as usual, niggardly in the wrong place, and munificent in the wrong place. The public service was starved that courtiers might be pampered. The expense of the navy, of the ordnance, of pensions to needy old officers, of missions to foreign courts, must seem small indeed to the present generation; but the personal favorites of the sovereign, his ministers, and the creatures of those ministers were gorged with public money.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 287.

2246. FRUGALITY, Plan of. Irish Painter. [To Samuel Johnson.] His Ofellus, in the “Art of Living in London,” I have heard him relate, was an Irish painter, whom he knew at Birmingham, and who had practised his own precepts of economy for several years in the British capital. He assured Johnson, who, I suppose, was then meditating to try his fortune in London, but was apprehensive of the expense, “that £30 a year was enough to enable a man to live there without being contemptible. He allowed £10 for clothes and linen. He said a man might live in a garret at 18d. a week; few people would inquire where he lodged; and if they did, it was easy to say, “Sir, I am to be found at such a place.” By spending 3d. in a coffee-house he might be for some hours every day in very good company; he might dine for 6d., breakfast on bread and milk for a penny, and do without supper. On clean-shirt-day he went abroad and paid visits. —BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 23.

2247. FUNERAL criticised. Of Charles II. [Under reign of his brother James II.] The funeral called forth much censure. It would, indeed, hardly have been accounted worthy of a noble and opulent subject. The Tories gently blamed the new king's parsimony; the Whigs sneered at his want of natural affection; and the fiery Covenanters of Scotland exultingly proclaimed that the curse denounced of old against wicked princes had been signally fulfilled, and that the departed tyrant had been buried with the burial of an ass.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 413.

2249. FUNERAL, An expensive. Queen Mary's. The funeral [of Queen Mary] cost £50,000.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 11, p. 174.

2250. FUNERAL, Fatal. George Canning, Premier. The funeral of the Duke of York took place at Windsor on the night of the 20th of January. . . . The Cabinet ministers were marshalled by the heralds in the nave of St. George's Chapel two hours before the arrival of the funeral procession. The night was bitterly cold. As we ourselves looked down from the organ loft upon the greatest in the land, thus doomed to stand upon the unmatted pavement, shivering, and shifting their uneasy positions, we observed the oldest man in the Cabinet taking very wise precautions for his personal comfort and safety. One who was by the side of Mr. Canning attributes to his kindness of heart a suggestion to the chancellor that he should lay down his cocked hat and stand upon it. The chancellor's health was preserved by this precaution. The funeral of the duke proved fatal to Mr. Canning. He caught a cold there which resulted in an illness from which he never really recovered.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 11, p. 202.

2251. FUNERAL, Honors of. Julius Cæsar's. Part proposed to carry it to the Temple of Jupiter, in the Capitol, and to burn it under the eyes of the assassins; part to take it into the Senate house and use the meeting-place of the Optimates a second time as the pyre of the people's friend. A few legionaries, perhaps to spare the city a general conflagration, advised that it should be consumed where it lay. The platform was torn up and the broken timbers piled into a heap. Chairs and benches were thrown on to it, the whole crowd rushing wildly to add a chip or splinter. Actors flung in their dresses, musicians their instruments, soldiers their swords. Women added their necklaces and scarfs. Mothers brought up their children to contribute toys and playthings. On the pile so composed the body of Cæsar was reduced to ashes. The remains were collected with affectionate care and deposited in the tomb of the Cæsars, in the Campus Martius.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 27.

2252. ——. Egyptians. To be deprived of funeral rites they considered as one of the greatest calamities. The Egyptians did not, like most other nations, consign the bodies of the dead to destruction; they preserved them by embalming, and celebrated their obsequies with extraordinary solemnity. But these funeral honors were never bestowed unless in virtue of a solemn and judicial decree. A court composed of forty judges granted their warrant for every funeral. The character of the deceased was rigorously investigated, and if any criminal or improper conduct was proved, the customary honors were refused to him. If his life had been virtuous and exempt from all blame, a public panegyric was pronounced on his memory, and permission was granted for the usual embalming and obsequies. The most singular and at the same time the most admirable circumstance attending this custom was, that the sovereigns themselves, though venerated during their lives with an almost superstitious regard, which forbade all scrutiny into their actions, were yet after death subjected to the same rigorous and impartial inquest with the meanest of their subjects; and Diodorus assures us that some of the Egyptian kings had been deprived of funeral obsequies, and their memories thus consigned to infamy, by the judgment of that solemn tribunal.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4, p. 37.

2253. FUNERAL, Humble. Pompey. [His assassins] cut off his head and cast his naked body upon the sand, where a faithful slave who had attended him, stealing to the place during the silence of the night, made a small funeral pile from the fragments of a boat, and burnt the body, carrying the ashes to Cordelia.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 2, p. 410.

2255. FUNERAL, Impressive. Julius Cæsar's. Cæsar's body, after remaining till evening on the floor of the Senate-house, had been carried home in the dusk in a litter by three of his servants, and was now lying in his palace. If it was not to be thrown into the Tiber, what was to be done with it? . . . Though Cicero had advised in the Senate that the discussion whether Cæsar had deserved death should not be raised, yet it was plain to him and to every one that, unless Cæsar was held guilty of conspiring against the Constitution, the murder was and would be regarded as a most execrable crime. He dreaded the effect of a public funeral. . . . The body was brought down to the Forum and placed upon the Rostra. The dress had not been changed; the gown, gashed with daggers and soaked in blood, was still wrapped about it. The will was read first. Cicero said : . . . "Toward the gods he was High Priest. To you he was Consul ; to the army he was Imperator ; to the enemies of his country, Dictator. In sum he was Pater Patriæ. And this your father, your Pontifex, this hero, whose person was declared inviolable, lies dead—dead, not by disease or age, not by war or visitation of God, but here at home, by conspiracy within your own walls, slain in the Senate-house, the warrior unarmed, the peacemaker naked to his foes. The righteous judge in the seat of judgment. He whom no foreign enemy could hurt has been killed by his fellow-countrymen—he, who had so often shown mercy, by those whom he had spared. Where, Cæsar, is your love for mankind ? Where is the sacredness of your life ? Where are your laws ? Here you lie murdered—here in the Forum, through which so often you marched in triumph wreathed with garlands ; here upon the Rostra from which you were wont to address your people. Alas for your gray hairs dabbled in blood ! alas for this lacerated robe in which you were dressed for the sacrifice !" —FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 27.

2256. FUNERAL panegyrics. Criticised. It was an ancient custom in the funerals, as well as in the triumphs, of the Romans, that the voice of praise should be corrected by that of satire and ridicule ; and that, in the midst of the splendid pageants, which displayed the glory of the living or of the dead, their imperfections should not be concealed from the eyes of the world. This custom was practised in the funeral of Julian. The comedians, who resented his contempt and aversion for the theatre, exhibited, with the applause of a Christian audience, the lively and exaggerated representation of the faults and follies of the deceased emperor. His various character and singular manners afforded an ample scope for pleasantry and ridicule. In the exercise of his uncommon talents he often descended below the majesty of his rank. Alexander was transformed into Diogenes ; the philosopher was degraded into a priest. The purity of his virtue was sullied by excessive vanity ; his superstition disturbed the peace and endangered the safety of a mighty empire ; and his irregular sallies were the less entitled to indulgence, as they appeared to be the laborious efforts of art, or even of affectation. The remains of Julian were interred at Tarsus in Cilicia ; his stately tomb arose in that city, on the banks of the cold and limpid Cydnus.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 24.

ranks moved in procession from Liberty Tree to the Town House, and thence to the "burying-place." Soldiers and officers looked on with wounded pride.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 43.

2258. FUTURE LIFE, Belief in. Gauls. [With the Gauls] it was a common practice to contract debts with a stipulation that they should be payable in the next stage of existence. Hence, letters were thrown upon the funeral pile, that the deceased might carry to his relatives and friends in Paradise information of the wishes and proceedings of those who remained on earth. And thus, upon the death of a chieftain, whatever he had most valued in this life—armor, ornaments, horses, dogs, sometimes even his household servants—were either burned or interred with him, that he might resume his treasures at his entrance on a higher sphere.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 1, § 10.

2259. — — —. Persians. Man becomes subject to death in consequence of his sins ; but when the period arrives that the whole inhabitants of the earth shall be converted to the religion of Zoroaster, then shall be the resurrection of the dead, with their earthly bodies and souls. The just shall be separated from the unjust, the former to be translated to Paradise, where they shall enjoy the highest pleasures, both of soul and body ; the latter to be purified for an appointed space in burning metals, and cleansed from all their offences ; after which all created beings shall enjoy the most perfect happiness forever. Ahriman and his evil genii shall undergo the same purification ; and after his limited punishment even he shall partake of the joys of eternity, repeat the Zendavesta, and join with all beings in the praises of Ormuzd.—TYLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 11, p. 123.

2260. FUTURE overlooked. Ignorance. The Indian who fells the tree that he may gather the fruit, and the Arab who plunders the caravans of commerce, are actuated by the same impulse of savage nature, which overlooks the future in the present, and relinquishes for momentary rapine the long and secure possession of the most important blessings. And it was thus that the shrine of St. Peter was profaned by the thoughtless Romans, who pillaged the offerings and wounded the pilgrims, without computing the number and value of similar visits, which they prevented by their inhospitable sacrilege.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 69, p. 425.

2261. FUTURITY disclosed. Impostors. With a rude and unenlightened people there is no passion more strong than the desire of penetrating into futurity. It would seem that the less the human mind is aided by experience, or enabled from extensive knowledge to form probable conjectures of the future from the past, the more it is apt to wish for and to believe the possibility of some secret art or method of obtaining such anticipated views. All barbarous nations have their augurs, their sorcerers, or their oracles. The Canadian savages have in every tribe a few crafty impostors, who pretend to foretell future events by visions, which they have in their sleep, and who are thence termed dreamers. When the tribe marches to war, these dreamers constantly attend in the rear of the troop, and no measure is ventured upon till they are consulted. The African negroes have their Obi men and women, who deal in charms and incantations, and are firmly believed to have the power of dispensing good and evil fortune at their pleasure. The sorceries of the Laplander are well known, and the second-sight of the Scottish Highlanders; all proceed from the same source—ignorance and superstition.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 7, p. 64.

2263. GALLANTRY, Inconsiderate. Oliver Goldsmith. While strolling one day in these gardens, he met three females of the family of a respectable tradesman to whom he was under some obligation. With his prompt disposition to oblige, he conducted them about the garden, treated them to tea, and ran up a bill in the most open-handed manner imaginable; it was only when he came to pay that he found himself in one of his old dilemmas—he had not the wherewithal in his pocket. A scene of perplexity now took place between him and the waiter, in the midst of which came up some of his acquaintances, in whose eyes he wished to stand particularly well. This completed his mortification. There was no concealing the awkwardness of his position. The sneers of the waiter revealed it. His acquaintances amused themselves for some time at his expense, professing their inability to relieve him. When, however, they had enjoyed their banter, the waiter was paid, and poor Goldsmith enabled to convoy off the ladies with flying colors.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 12, p. 95.

2264. GALLANTRY, Proof of. Female Rulers. As Alexander [Severus] was a modest and dutiful youth, of only seventeen years of age, the reins of government were in the hands of two women—of his mother Mææa, and of Mæsa, his grandmother. . . . In hereditary monarchies, . . . especially those of modern Europe, the gallant spirit of chivalry and the law of succession have accustomed us to allow a singular exception [to the confinement of the female sex to domestic life]; and a woman is often acknowledged the absolute sovereign of a great kingdom, in which she would be deemed incapable of exercising the smallest employment, civil or military.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6, p. 175.

2266. ———. Earl of Sunderland. [Reign of James II.] His ill-luck at the hazard-table was such that his estates were daily becoming more and more encumbered. In the hope of extricating himself from his embarrassments, he betrayed to Barillon all the schemes adverse to France which had been meditated in the English cabinet, and hinted that a secretary of state could in such times render services for which it might be wise in Louis to pay largely. The ambassador told his master that 6000 guineas was the smallest gratification that could be offered to so important a minister. Louis consented to go as high as 25,000 crowns, equivalent to about £5600 sterling. It was agreed that Sunderland should receive this sum yearly, and that he should, in return, exert all his influence to prevent the reassembling of the Parliament.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 59.

2268. GAMBLING, Escape from. Wilberforce. [When young and rich, he went to London as Member of Parliament. He writes his experience:] The very first time I went to Booodle's I won 25 guineas of the Duke of Norfolk. I belonged at that time to five clubs. The first time I was at Brookes', scarcely knowing any one, I joined, from mere shyness, in play at the faro-table. A friend who knew my inexperience, and regarded me as a victim decked out for sacrifice, called out to me, "What, Wilberforce, is that you?" The bank-keeper resented the interference, and said, in his most expressive tone, "Oh sir, don't interrupt Mr. Wilberforce; he could not be better employed." Some time after he was persuaded to keep the bank at a faro-table of one of the clubs. "As the game grew deep," says his son, "he rose the winner of £600. Much of this was lost by those who were only heirs to future fortunes, and could not therefore meet such a call without inconvenience. The pain he felt at their annoyance cured him of a taste which seemed but too likely to become predominant."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6, p. 106.

2270. GAMBLING, Losses by. Gibbon. In July, 1776, he writes: "I have undone myself, and it is to no purpose to conceal from you my abominable madness and folly. I never lost so much in five times as I have to-night, and am in debt to the house for the whole." [He lost £10,000.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6, p. 104.

2272. GAMBLING, Pride in. High Life. High play was then the reigning pleasure of society in every country in Europe. Louis XIV. was not displeased when he heard that the Portuguese ambassador had won 1,800,000 francs of his niece in a single night. High play, he thought, became a princess of the royal house of France, and he was willing Europe should know on what a scale of grandeur gambling was done at his court. John Law, cool, adroit, calculating, found the careless nobles of the time an easy prey. A stout footman preceded him to the houses of his antagonists, carrying two heavy bags of gold, and the servant usually had a heavier load to carry home than the one he brought. In the course of a few years, besides living like a prince, he could produce in ready money a sum equal in our currency to $1,000,000. Indeed, such was his success, that he was suspected of cheating, and at last few ventured to play with him.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 451.

2273. GAMBLING, Ruinous. Oliver Goldsmith. [He had recently lost £30—all his earnings—in a short tour taken to “see the world.”] A new consultation was held among Goldsmith’s friends as to his future course, and it was determined he should try the law. His uncle Contarine agreed to advance the necessary funds, and actually furnished him with £50, with which he set off for London to enter on his studies at the Temple. Unfortunately, he fell in company at Dublin with a Roscommon acquaintance, one whose wits had been sharpened about town, who beguiled him into a gambling-house, and soon left him as penniless as when he bestrode the redoubtable Fiddle-back.—IRVING’S GOLDSMITH, ch. 4, p. 35.

2274. ———. English Gentry. [Henry St. John writes in 1766:] You ask me how play uses me this year? I am sorry to say very ill, as it has already, since October, taken £800 from me; nor am I in a likely way to reimburse myself soon by the emoluments of any place or military preferment, having voted the other evening in a minority. . . . If ruined, there were two resources against starvation—a place or a wife. Henry St. John became Lord Bolingbroke. In 1777 Charles Townshend writes of him: “He is gone to Bath in pursuit of a lady, who he proposes should recruit his finances. It is said she has accepted his proposal.”—KNIGHT’S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6, p. 103.

2275. GAMBLING, Universal. A.D. 1194. The passion of playing for money was so universal, that in the crusade, in which all ranks of men were engaged, the kings of England and France made the most stringent regulations to keep gambling within limits. No man in the army was to play at any kind of game for money, with the exception of knights and the clergy, and no knight or clerk was to lose more than 20s. in one day.—KNIGHT’S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 22, p. 326.

2276. GAMBLING, Vice of. Prolific. Petronius Maximus, a wealthy senator of the Anician family, who had been twice consul, was possessed of a chaste and beautiful wife; her obstinate resistance served only to irritate the desires of Valentinian; and he resolved to accomplish them either by stratagem or force. Deep gambling was one of the vices of the court; the emperor, who, by chance or contrivance, had gained from Maximus a considerable sum, uncourtously exacted his ring as a security for the debt, and sent it by a trusty messenger to his wife, with an order, in her husband’s name, that she should immediately attend the Empress Eudoxia. The unsuspecting wife of Maximus was conveyed in her litter to the Imperial palace; the emissaries of her impatient lover conducted her to a remote and silent bedchamber; and Valentinian violated, without remorse, the laws of hospitality. Her tears, when she returned home, her deep affliction, and her bitter reproaches against a husband whom she considered as the accomplice of his own shame, excited Maximus to a just revenge.—GIBBON’S ROME, ch. 35.

2277. GAME, Preservation of. Inhuman. The African lions, when pressed by hunger, infested the open villages and cultivated country; and they infested them with impunity. The royal beast was reserved for the pleasure of the emperor and the capital; and the unfortunate peasant who killed one of them, though in his own defence, incurred a very heavy penalty. This extraordinary game-law was mitigated by Honorius, and finally repealed by Justinian.—MILMAN’S NOTE, GIBBON’S ROME, ch. 4.

2278. GAMES, Beneficial. Ancient. In a political view, these public games were, during the first ages of their institution, of the most important consequence. Independently of their effect in promoting in the youth a hardy and vigorous conformation of body, and that activity and address in martial exercises and in single combat, which, according to the ancient system of war, were of the utmost importance, a most beneficial consequence of those public games was the frequent assembling together of the inhabitants of all the States of Greece, and thus promoting a national union; to which the difference of their governments, and their separate interests, were otherwise opposing a constant resistance. Assembled on these public occasions from motives of pleasure and amusement, to which was joined the notion of performing a duty of religion and indulging in every species of festivity, they could not avoid considering each other as brethren and fellow-citizens. Whatever were the political interferences of the several States, or their national animosities, every grudge of this kind was at least for the time obliterated. Thucydides informs us that all hostile operations between States actually at war were suspended during the performance of those solemnities. Another consequence of those meetings was the dissemination of knowledge, arts, science, and literature; for it must be observed, that although the chief contests in the sacred games were those in the martial and athletic exercises, there were likewise trials of skill in poetry, history, and music; and it is chiefly to these latter exercises of genius that we must attribute the eminence of the Greeks in those sciences above all the nations of antiquity.—TYTLER’S HIST., Book 1, ch. 7, p. 66.

2279. GAMES, Employment in. Military. In a long-continued war at a distance, as that of Troy, the winter season was spent in the camp, and there was a complete cessation of hostilities. Dictys of Crete informs us that the Greeks during the winter exercised themselves in a variety of games, which tended to relieve the anxiety of the troops, and keep up the martial spirit. The game of chess is said to have been invented by Palamedes during this tedious siege.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 8.

2280. GAMES, Passion for. Greeks. This passion of the Greeks for shows and games, extremely laudable, and even beneficial, when confined within due bounds, was carried, at length, to a most blamable and pernicious excess. The victor, in the Olympic games, who had gained the first prize at running, wrestling, or driving a chariot, was crowned with higher honors than the general who had gained a decisive battle. His praises were sung by the poets; he had statues, and even temples, dedicated to his name. Cicero remarks that among the Greeks it was accounted more glorious to carry off the palm at the Olympic games than among the Romans to have obtained the honors of a triumph. Of these nations it was easy to foretell which was doomed to be the master, and which the slave.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 8, p. 238.

2281. GAMES, Use of. Samuel Johnson. Johnson, I believe, did not play at draughts after leaving college, by which he suffered; for it would have afforded him an innocent, soothing relief from the melancholy which distressed him so often. I have heard him regret that he had not learned to play at cards; and the game of draughts we know is peculiarly calculated to fix the attention without straining it. There is a composure and gravity in draughts which insensibly tranquilizes the mind; and, accordingly, the Dutch are fond of it, as they are of smoking, of the sedative influence of which, though he himself never smoked, he had a high opinion. Besides, there is in draughts some exercise of the faculties; and, accordingly, Johnson wishing to dignify the subject in his Dedication with what is most estimable in it, observes: "Triflers may find or make anything a trifle; but since it is the great characteristic of a wise man to see events in their causes, to obviate consequences, and ascertain contingencies, your Lordship will think nothing a trifle by which the mind is inured to caution, foresight, and circumspection."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 85.

2282. GAMING condemned. Napoleon I. For gaming in all its branches he manifested . . . through the whole of his life the strongest disapproval. He ever refused to repose confidence in any one who was addicted to that vice.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 4.

2283. Generalization, Vicious. Sophists. As all the strength and skill of the Sophists lay in the application of general arguments to the questions which they canvassed, nothing more was necessary for their confutation than to bring them to particulars—to set out by some simple and self-evident proposition, which being granted, another followed equally undeniable, till the disputant was conducted, step by step, by his own confessions, to that side of the question on which lay the truth. No method could be devised more effectual than this for the detection of sophistry; and the Athenian logicians very soon found that their general aposatus of argument would not avail them against so subtle an antagonist. They lost all credit and reputation as philosophers.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 267.

2284. GENERALS, Too many. Macedonians. When Micion marched a considerable corps of Macedonians and mercenaries to Rhamnus, and ravaged the sea-coast and the adjacent country, Phocion advanced against him with a body of Athenians. On this occasion a number of them were very impertinent in pretending to dictate or advise him how to proceed. One counselled him to secure such an eminence, another to send his cavalry to such a post, and a third pointed out a place for a camp. "Heavens!" said Phocion, "how many generals we have, and how few soldiers!"—PLUTARCH'S PHOCTION.

2285. GENERALSHIP, Successful. Pompey. Rome had put out her real strength, and at once, as before, all opposition went down before her. Asia was completely conquered up to the line of the Euphrates. . . . A triumphal inscription in Rome declared that Pompey, the people's general, had in three years captured 1500 cities, and had slain, taken, or reduced to submission, 12,000,000 human beings. He justified what Cicero had foretold of his moral uprightness. In the midst of opportunities such as had fallen to no commander since Alexander, he outraged no woman's honor, and he kept his hands clean from "the accursed thing." When he returned to Rome, he returned, as he went, personally poor, but he filled the treasury to overflowing.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 10.

2286. GENEROSITY, Artful. Roman Emperor Tacitus. When Tacitus was elected by the Senate, he resigned his ample patrimony to the public service, an act of generosity specious in appearance, but which evidently disclosed his intention of transmitting the empire to his descendants.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12.

2287. GENEROSITY, Easy. Pope Alexander VI. Several causes impeded the career of English discovery during the greater part of the sixteenth century. The next year after the new world was found the pope, Alexander VI., drew an imaginary line north and south, three hundred miles west of the Azores, and issued a papal bull, giving all islands and countries west of that line to Spain. Henry VII. of England was himself a Catholic, and he did not care to begin a conflict with his Church by pressing his own claims to the newly found regions of the West. His son and successor, Henry VIII., at first adopted the same policy, and it was not till after the Reformation had been accomplished in England that the decision of the pope came to be disregarded, and finally despised and laughed at.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 6, p. 78.

2288. GENEROSITY, Example of. Rev. John Harvard. After struggling with disease for about a year, he died of consumption. When his will was opened, it was found that he had left his whole library of two hundred and sixty volumes and one half of his estate to the proposed college—his estate being worth nearly £1600 sterling. Provided thus with a fund of nearly £1200, the trustees went forward, erected a building, established the college, and conferred upon it the name of its first benefactor. The example of John Harvard was more beneficial even than the money which he bequeathed, for it inspired a large number of other persons with generous feelings toward the infant institution.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 583.

2289. GENEROSITY, Indiscreet. Mohammedan. A dispute had arisen, who, among the citizens of Mecca, was entitled to the prize of generosity; and a successive application was made to the three who were deemed most worthy of the trial. Abdallah, the son of Abbas, had undertaken a distant journey, and his foot was in the stirrup when he heard the voice of a suppliant, "O son of the uncle of the apostle of God, I am a traveller, and in distress!" He instantly dismounted to present the pilgrim with his camel, her rich caparison, and a purse of 4000 pieces of gold, excepting only the sword, either for its intrinsic value, or as the gift of an honored kinsman. The servant of Kais informed the second suppliant that his master was asleep; but he immediately added, "Here is a purse of 7000 pieces of gold (it is all we have in the house), and here is an order that will entitle you to a camel and a slave," the master, as soon as he awoke, praised and enfranchised his faithful steward, with a gentle reproof, that by respecting his slumbers he had stinted his bounty. The third of these heroes, the blind Arabah, at the hour of prayer, was supporting his steps on the shoulders of two slaves. "Alas!" he replied, "my coffers are empty! but these you may sell; if you refuse, I renounce them." At these words, pushing away the youths, he groped along the wall with his staff.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50.

2290. GENEROSITY, Noble. Benjamin Franklin. When, at the age of seventeen, he landed at Philadelphia, a runaway apprentice, he had one silver dollar and one shilling in copper coin. It was a fine Sunday morning, as probably the reader remembers, and he knew not a soul in the place. He asked the boatmen upon whose boat he had come down the Delaware how much he had to pay. They answered, Nothing, because he had helped them row. Franklin, however, insisted upon their taking his shilling's worth of coppers, and forced the money upon them. An hour after, having bought three rolls for his breakfast, he ate one, and gave the other two to a poor woman and her child, who had been his fellow-passengers. These were small things, you may say; but remember, he was a poor, ragged, dirty runaway, in a strange town.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 129.

2291. ——. Peter Cooper. [Erection of Cooper Institute.] He bought the first lot about thirty years before he began to build, and from that time continued to buy pieces of the ground as he could spare the money. In 1854 the whole block was his own, and he began to erect thereon a massive structure of stone, brick, and iron, six stories in height, and fire-proof in every part. It cost $700,000, which was all the fortune the founder possessed, except that invested in his business. In 1859 he delivered the property, with the joyful and proud consent of his wife and children, into the hands of trustees, and thus placed it forever beyond his control. Two thousand pupils immediately applied for admission, a number which has greatly increased every year, until now most of the departments are filled during the winter season with attentive students. From the beginning, as many as three thousand persons used the reading-room every week.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 579.

2292. GENEROSITY, Patriotic. North Carolina to Boston. A.D. 1774. At Wilmington . . . the sum of £2000 currency was raised in a few days; the women of the place gave liberally; Parker Quince offered his vessel to carry a load of provisions, freight free, and master and mariners volunteered to navigate her without wages.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 5.

2293. ——. South Carolina to Boston. A.D. 1774. [Boston port was closed by the Port Act, and the people began to suffer.] The colonies vied with each other in liberality. The record kept at Boston shows that "the patriotic and generous people" of South Carolina were the first to minister to the sufferers, sending early in June two hundred barrels of rice, and promising eight hundred more.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 5.

2294. GENEROSITY, Sincerity in. Cromwell. He was moved to tears when he heard of the sufferings of the people of the valleys. He sent immediately the sum of £2000 from his own purse to aid the exiles. He appointed a day of humiliation to be held throughout the kingdom, and a general collection on their behalf. The people heartily responded to his call, and testified their sympathy with their distressed brethren by raising the sum of £40,000 for distribution among them.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 16, p. 213.

2295. GENIUS, Advance of. Isaac Newton. This great man, whose genius far outshone all who have gone before him in the path of philosophy, and who has, perhaps, exhausted the most important discoveries of the law of nature, so as not to leave to posterity the possibility of eclipsing his fame, had, it is certain, made the greatest of his discoveries before he had attained the age of twenty-four. Before that early period of life he had discovered the theory of universal gravitation. Dr. Pemberton, who has given an excellent view of his philosophy, informs us that Newton, as he sat one day alone in a garden, fell into a reverie or speculation on the power of gravity. It occurred to him that as this power is not found sensibly to diminish at the remotest distance to which we can ascend from the centre of the earth—for instance, at the top of the highest mountains—it was not unreasonable to suppose that it might extend much farther than was usually thought. Why not (said he to himself) as high as the moon? and if so, her motion must be influenced by it. Perhaps it is that which retains her in her orbit! However, though the power of gravity is not sensibly weakened in the little change of distance at which we can place ourselves from the centre of the earth, yet it is very possible that so high as the moon this power may differ much in strength from what it is here. To make an estimate what might be the degree of the diminution, he considered with himself that if the moon be retained in her orbit by the force of gravity, no doubt the primary planets are carried round the sun by the like power; and by comparing the periods of the several planets with their distances from the sun, he found that if any power like gravity held them in their courses, its strength must decrease in the duplicate proportion of the increase of distance. Supposing, therefore, the power of gravity, when extended to the moon, to decrease in the same proportion, he computed whether that force would be sufficient to keep the moon in her orbit, and he found it would be sufficient. Newton had now the satisfaction to perceive that this inquiry, which an accidental thought had given rise to, led to the discovery of a universal law of nature, which solved the most striking of her phenomena. It is thus that genius proceeds, step by step, from the simplest principles to the most sublime conclusions.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 36, p. 490.

2296. GENIUS, Age of. Athenians. Athens, after her Persian triumphs, adopted the philosophy of Ionia and the rhetoric of Sicily; and these studies became the patrimony of a city whose inhabitants, about thirty thousand males, condensed, within the period of a single life, the genius of ages and millions. Our sense of the dignity of human nature is exalted by the simple recollection that Isocrates was the companion of Plato and Xenophon; that he assisted, perhaps, with the historian Thucydides, at the first representations of the Œdipus of Sophocles and the Iphigenia of Euripides; and that his pupils Æschines and Demosthenes contended for the crown of patriotism in the presence of Aristotle, the master of Theophrastus, who taught at Athens with the founders of the Stoic and Epicurean sects.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40.

2297. GENIUS, Ages of. Age of Leo X. There are periods in which the human genius seems to turn strongly to one particular direction. In one period the reasoning faculty seems chiefly to delight in contemplating its own powers, the nature and operations of the mind; in another, perhaps the imagination reigns predominant, and the general taste is attracted to works of fancy in poetry or romance. In another era the mechanic or the useful arts engross the general attention, and are cultivated with high success; in a fourth, as in the period of which we now treat, the popular taste delighted in the contemplation of the beautiful.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 23, p. 317.

2298. GENIUS by Ancestry. John Milton. A host of eminent men have traced the first impulse of their genius to their mother. Milton always acknowledged with just gratitude that it was to his father's discerning taste and fostering care that he owed the encouragement of his studies, and the leisure which rendered them possible. He has registered this gratitude in both prose and verse.—MILTON, by M. PATTISON, ch. 7.

2299. GENIUS, Ascendency of. William Pitt. [See No. 2835.] "I am sure," said he to the Duke of Devonshire, "I can save this country, and nobody else can." For eleven weeks England was without a ministry. [On his dismissal in April no man had dared to accept his place.] So long was the agony, so desperate the resistance, so reluctant the surrender. At last the king [George III.] and the aristocracy were alike compelled to recognize the ascendancy and yield to the guidance of the man whom the nation trusted and loved.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 12.

2300. GENIUS, Belated. William Cowper. [Mrs. Unwin, his best friend, took care of him while insane.] Mrs. Unwin, who had terrible reason for studying his case, saw that the thing most wanted was congenial employment for the mind, and she incited him to try his hand at poetry on a larger scale. He listened to her advice, and when he was nearly fifty years of age became a poet. He had acquired the faculty of verse-writing, as we have seen; he had even to some extent formed his manner when he was young. Age must by this time have quenched his fire and tamed his imagination, so that the didactic style would suit him best. In the length of the interval between his early poems and his great work he resembles Milton; but widely different in the two cases had been the current of the intervening years.—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 4.

2301. GENIUS in Childhood. Oliver Goldsmith. Before he was eight years old Goldsmith had contracted a habit of scribbling verses on small scraps of paper, which, in a little while, he would throw into the fire. A few of these sibylline leaves, however, were rescued from the flames and conveyed to his mother. The good woman read them with a mother's delight, and saw at once that her son was a genius and a poet. From that time she beset her husband with solicitations to give the boy an education suitable to his talents.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 1, p. 16.

2302. GENIUS, Constructive. Cæsar. [Having driven the Germans out of Gaul, he determined to terrify them by an invasion of their own country.] They begged Cæsar to show himself among them, though his stay might be but short, as a proof that he had power and will to protect them; and they offered him boats and barges to carry his army over. Cæsar decided to go, but to go with more ostentation. The object was to impress the German imagination; and boats and barges, which might not always be obtainable, would, if they seemed essential, diminish the effect. The legions were skilled workmen, able to turn their hand to anything. He determined to make a bridge, and he chose Bon for the site of it. The river was broad, deep, and rapid. The materials were still standing in the forest; yet in ten days from the first stroke that was delivered by an axe, a bridge had been made standing firmly on rows of piles with a road over it forty feet wide. A strong guard was left at each end. Cæsar marched across with the legions, and from all sides deputations from the astonished people poured in to beg for peace.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 16, p. 39.

2303. — —. Sir Isaac Newton. [In youth] he constructed also a four-wheeled carriage, propelled by the person sitting in it. To amuse his schoolfellows, he made very ingenious kites, to the tails of which he attached lanterns of crimped paper, which, being lighted by a candle and sent up in the evening, alarmed the rustics of the parish. Observing the shadows of the sun, he marked the hours and half hours by driving in pegs on the side of the house, and at length perfected the sun-dial which is still shown. Without an instructor he learned to draw so well as to adorn his room with the portraits of his schoolfellows and teachers, the frames of which were very elegantly made by his own hand. . . . For the young ladies of his acquaintance he was never weary of making little tables, chairs, cupboards, dolls, and trinkets.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 247.

2304. GENIUS, Co-operative. Isaac Newton. Suppose an apple should fall from the moon—then what? It appears to have been at this point that the great Conjecture occurred to his mind: Perhaps the same force that draws the apples to the ground holds the moon in its orbit! Now, but for the labors of the giants who had preceded him, this mighty thought would have remained a conjecture. Those giants, however, had learned the magnitude of the moon, its distance from the earth, and the force of the earth's attraction at any distance. Newton could, therefore, at once put his conjecture to the test of arithmetic. He could ascertain two things with the greatest exactness: 1, how much force was required to keep the moon in its orbit; and 2, with how much force the earth did attract the moon, supposing that the law of attraction, as established by Galileo, held good. If these two calculations agreed, his conjecture was a discovery. He tried them. They did not agree. Busy with other investigations, he laid aside this inquiry for nineteen years. He then learned that he, in common with all the English astronomers, was in error as to the distance of the moon from the earth. [His work now proved correct.]—PARTON'S NEWTON, p. 83.

2305. GENIUS, Creation of. Declaration of Independence. This immortal State paper, which for its composer [Thomas Jefferson] was the aurora of enduring fame, was "the genuine effluence of the soul of the country at that time," the revelation of its mind, when in its youth, its enthusiasm, its sublime confronting of danger, it rose to the highest creative powers of which man is capable.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 70.

2306. GENIUS disdained. Robert Fulton. In September, 1807, the famous Clermont, one hundred and sixty tons, was completed. Monday, September 10, was the day appointed for a grand trial trip to Albany, and by noon a vast crowd had assembled on the wharf to witness the performance of what was popularly called "Fulton's Folly." Fulton himself declares that, at noon on that day, not thirty persons in the city had the slightest faith in the success of the steamboat; and that, as the boat was putting off, he heard many "sarcastic remarks." At one o'clock, however, she moved from the dock, vomiting smoke and sparks from her pine-wood fires, and casting up clouds of spray from her uncovered paddle-wheels. As her speed increased, the jeers of the incredulous were silenced, and soon the departing voyagers caught the sound of cheers.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 157.

2307. ———. John Fitch. It usually requires several generations to perfect a great invention. The steamboat was still very imperfect; it frequently got out of order and made no money. Poor John Fitch formed another company, and began another steamboat; but the faith and the money of his coadjutors gave out before it was finished. He petitioned Congress for help. He sought the aid of State legislatures. He even went to France. All was in vain. No one believed the steamboat would ever pay, and few could see in this poor scarecrow, this pallid, gaunt, and ragged Yankee, one of the ablest natural mechanics that ever lived. He used to slink, in his dirt and rags, about Philadelphia, an object of compassion to some, and to others an object of derision and contempt. But start the darling topic of the steamboat, and the whole man was changed. Fire sparkled in his eye, eloquence flowed from his tongue. Rising to his full stature, and lifting his long, lean arm, he would exclaim: "You and I will not live to see the day, but the time will come when steamboats will be preferred to all other modes of conveyance; when steamboats will ascend the western rivers from New Orleans to Wheeling; when steamboats will cross the ocean! Johnny Fitch will be forgotten, but other men will carry out his ideas, and grow rich and great upon them." Those who listened to such harangues as these would exchange glances, as if to say, "He is a good fellow enough; what a pity he is mad!"—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 151.

2308. GENIUS disparaged. George Washington. The march thither [to winter quarters at Valley Forge] occupied four days. Thousands of the soldiers were without shoes, and the frozen ground was marked with bloody footprints. . . . Log cabins were built for the soldiers; . . . it was a long and dreary winter; moaning and anguish were heard in the camp, and the echo fell heavily upon the soul of the commander. These were the darkest days of Washington's life. Congress in a measure abandoned him; the people withheld their sympathies. The brilliant success of the army of the North was unjustly compared with the reverses of the army of the South. Many men high in military and civil station left the great leader unsupported in the hour of his grief; even Samuel Adams, impatient under calamity, withdrew his confidence. There was a miserable conspiracy headed by generals Gates, Conway and Mifflin. Washington was to be superseded, and Gates or Lee [who proved either a crank or a traitor (see No. 1645)] was to be made commander-in-chief. But the alienation was only for a moment; the allegiance of the army remained unshaken, and the nation's confidence in the troubled chieftain became stronger than ever.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 40, p. 327.

2309. GENIUS, Eccentricity of. Samuel Johnson. Mr. Hogarth came one day to see Richardson, soon after the execution of Dr. Cameron, for having taken arms for the house of Stuart in 1745-46; and being a warm partisan of George II., he observed to Richardson that certainly there must have been some very unfavorable circumstances lately discovered in this particular case, which had induced the king to approve of an execution for rebellion so long after the time when it was committed, as this had the appearance of putting a man to death in cold blood, and was very unlike his Majesty's usual clemency. While he was talking, he perceived a person standing at a window in the room, shaking his head, and rolling himself about in a strange, ridiculous manner. He concluded that he was an idiot, whom his relations had put under the care of Mr. Richardson, as a very good man. To his great surprise, however, this figure stalked forward to where he and Mr. Richardson were sitting, and all at once took up the argument, and burst out into an invective against George II.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 35.

2310. ——. Samuel Johnson. One instance of his absence and particularity, as it is characteristic of the man, may be worth relating. When he and I took a journey together into the West, we visited the late Mr. Banks, of Dorsetshire; the conversation turning upon pictures, which Johnson could not well see, he retired to a corner of the room, stretching out his right leg as far as he could reach before him, then bringing up his left leg, and stretching his right still further on. The old gentleman observing him, went up to him, and in a very courteous manner assured him, though it was not a new house, the flooring was perfectly safe. The Doctor started from his reverie, like a person waked out of his sleep, but spoke not a word.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 35.

2311. ——. Samuel Johnson. While talking or even musing as he sat in his chair, he commonly held his head to one side toward his right shoulder, and shook it in a tremulous manner, moving his body backward and forward, and rubbing his left knee in the same direction, with the palm of his hand. In the intervals of articulating he made various sounds with his mouth, sometimes as if ruminating, or what is called chewing the cud, sometimes giving half a whistle, sometimes making his tongue play backward from the roof of his mouth, as if clucking like a hen, and sometimes protruding it against his upper gums in front, as if pronouncing quickly under his breath, too, too, too—all this accompanied sometimes with a thoughtful look, but more frequently with a smile. Generally when he had concluded a period, in the course of a dispute, by which time he was a good deal exhausted by violence and vociferation, he used to blow out his breath like a whale. This I suppose was a relief to his lungs, and seemed in him to be a contemptuous mode of expression, as if he had made the arguments of his opponent fly like chaff before the wind.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 135.

2312. ——. Samuel Johnson. He received me very courteously; but it must be confessed that his apartment and furniture and morning dress were sufficiently uncouth. His brown suit of clothes looked very rusty; he had on a little old shrivelled unpowdered wig, which was too small for his head; his shirt-neck and knees of his breeches were loose; his black worsted stockings ill drawn up; and he had a pair of unbuckled shoes by way of slippers. But all these slovenly particularities were forgotten the moment that he began to talk.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 109.

2313. GENIUS, Enterprise of. Cromwell. England had never been more than a third-rate power in Europe; and the other nations were in the height and heat of their grandeur and fame. Spain, with a population of about thirty millions—it had declined recently; in the time of Charles V. its population had been about thirty-six millions; and the population of England at this time could not have been six millions—[Spain] was the kingdom of the Inquisition, the chief land of the Romish power; with her continents of golden isles in the west, her possessions of gold in her own country—haughty, defiant, and strong. Spain Cromwell determined to crush. France was powerful. Only recently had she known the monarchy of Henry of Navarre and the statesmanship of Richelieu. Her destinies were now guided by the wildest man and most fox-like statesman in Europe, Cardinal Mazarin. Him Cromwell treated as a valet or a footman, and his power lay humbled and stricken before the genius of the bluff farmer statesman.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 16, p. 210.

2314. GENIUS, Failures of. Youthful Poets. Shelley now began to yearn for fame and publicity. Miss Shelley speaks of a play written by her brother and her sister Elizabeth which was sent to Matthews the comedian, and courteously returned as unfit for acting. . . . Medwin gives a long account of a poem . . . composed by him in concert with Shelley. . . . They sent the manuscript to Thomas Campbell, who returned it with the observation that it contained but two good lines—

"It seem'd as if an angel's sigh Had breathed the plaintive symphony."

—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 2.

2315. GENIUS, Hereditary. James Watt. It is said to require three generations to make a gentleman. We sometimes find it has taken three generations to make a genius. The grandfather of James Watt was a teacher of navigation, well skilled in mathematics, and a very ingenious and worthy man. The father of the great inventor was a shipwright, noted for his skill and enterprise.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 141.

2316. GENIUS, Imitation of. Columbus. A shallow courtier present, impatient of the honors paid to Columbus, and meanly jealous of him as a foreigner, abruptly asked him whether he thought that, in case he had not discovered the Indies, there were not other men in Spain who would have been capable of the enterprise? To this Columbus made no immediate reply, but, taking an egg, invited the company to make it stand on one end. Every one attempted it, but in vain; whereupon he struck it upon the table so as to break the end, and left it standing on the broken part; illustrating in this simple manner that when he had once shown the way to the New World nothing was easier than to follow it.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 5, ch. 7.

2317. GENIUS impoverished. Homer. Homer, of whose birth both the place and the era are very uncertain, is, according to the most probable opinion, believed to have been a native of Ionia, and to have flourished . . . nine hundred and seventy years before the birth of Christ. This illustrious man, the father of poetry, was probably a wandering minstrel, who earned his subsistence by strolling from one city to another, and frequenting public festivals and the tables of the great, where his music and verses procured him a welcome reception. . . . It has been justly remarked that from the poems of Homer, as from the fountain of knowledge, the principal authors among the ancients have derived useful information in almost every department—moral, political, and scientific.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 8, p. 238.

2318. GENIUS, Late evidence of. Sir Walter Scott. Scott's genius flowered late. "Cadyow Castle," the first of his poems, I think, that has indisputable genius plainly stamped on its terse and fiery lines, was composed in 1802, when he was already thirty-one years of age. It was in the same year that he wrote the first canto of his first great romance in verse, "The Lay of the Last Minstrel," a poem which did not appear till 1805, when he was thirty-four.—HUTTON'S LIFE OF SCOTT, ch. 5.

2319. GENIUS, Manifest. Napoleon I. "Singular destiny," exclaims Thiers, after perusing volumes of manuscripts from his pen, "of that prodigious man, to be the greatest writer of his time, while he was its greatest captain, its greatest legislator, its greatest administrator."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 38.

2320. GENIUS, Merit of. Cromwell. The wisest, who have been disposed to form an opinion adverse to the great English Protector, have confessed themselves compelled to pause before pronouncing; others again have ransacked the archives of State paper offices, the heaps of dingy family letters and scrolls, every shred of paper bearing Oliver's name that could be brought to light has been produced; and the result is, that no name, perhaps, in all history stands forth so transparent and clear, so consistent throughout. It is the most royal name in English history, rivalling in its splendor that of Elizabeth, the Edwards, and the Henrys; outshining the proudest names of the Norman, the Plantagenet, or the Tudor.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 1, p. 20.

2321. GENIUS misdirected. Audubon the Ornithologist. He engaged . . . in various branches of commerce, none of which succeeded with him, his mind being preoccupied by his favorite study. His friends called him "fool"—all excepting his wife and children. At last, irritated by the remarks of relatives and others, he broke entirely away from the pursuits of trade, and gave himself up wholly to natural history. He ransacked the woods, the lakes, the prairies, and the shores of the Atlantic, spending years away from his home and family.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 175.

2322. GENIUS misjudged. Thomas Gray. [Author of the "Elegy."] I dined with Johnson at Mr. Thrale's. He attacked Gray, calling him "a dull fellow." BOSWELL: "I understand he was reserved, and might appear dull in company; but surely he was not dull in poetry." JOHNSON: "Sir, he was dull in company, dull in his closet, dull everywhere. He was dull in a new way, and that made many people think him great. He was a mechanical poet." He then repeated some ludicrous lines, which have escaped my memory, and said, "Is not that great, like his Odes?"—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 241.

2323. GENIUS, Mortality of. Early Death. Such reflections are forced upon us by the lives of three great English poets of this century. Byron died when he was thirty-six, Keats when he was twenty-five, and Shelley when he was on the point of completing his thirtieth year. Of the three Keats enjoyed the briefest space for the development of his extraordinary powers. His achievement, perfect as it is in some poetic qualities, remains so immature and incomplete that no conjecture can be hazarded about his future. Byron lived longer, yet he was extinguished when his genius was still ascendant. . . . Shelley's early death is more to be regretted. Unlike Keats and Byron, he died by a mere accident. His faculties were far more complex, and his aims were more ambitious than theirs. He therefore needed length of years for their co-ordination; and if a fuller life had been allotted him, we have the certainty that from the discords of his youth he would have wrought a clear and lucid harmony.—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 1.

2324. GENIUS originating. Blaise Pascal. [Inventor of the arithmetical calculating machine and of the omnibus system, adopted by cities.] A kind of club of geometers met at the Pascal home every week, and there was continued conversation upon problems of geometry at the table in the evening. To thwart the awakened curiosity of his son, the father abstained from such conversation, locked up all the mathematical books, and endeavored in every way to keep the boy from so much as knowing what geometry was. These precautions were unavailing. The inkling of knowledge, which the lad could not but gather in such a house, so inflamed his desire for more, that he employed his leisure in contriving a system of geometry for himself, aided only by a piece of charcoal and some boards. His father, coming into his room one day, found him so deeply absorbed in this pursuit that the boy heard nothing of his approach, but continued poring over his triangles and circles until he was startled into consciousness by hearing his father ask, "What are you doing, my son?" Father and son were equally moved—the son to be detected in devouring forbidden fruit, the father to discover that this youth of thirteen had effected a demonstration of the thirty-second proposition of the first book of Euclid. Without even knowing the names of the figures, he had advanced so far. He called a circle a "round," and a line a "bar," but he understood the rudimental principles of science.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 99.

2325. GENIUS overlooked. John Milton. The neglect of the merit of Milton during his own life is sufficiently known. Hume, in his "History of England," . . . marks the small regard that was had for this great poet, even by the party to whose service he had devoted his talents. Whitelock, in his Memorials, talks of one Milton, a blind man, who was employed in translating a treaty with Sweden into Latin!—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 36.

2326. GENIUS, Perils of. Jonathan Swift (Dean). In his latter years [Swift] looked some time on his first great work, and then, shutting the book, exclaimed, "Good God! what a genius I had when I wrote that!" A genius indeed; but how fatal a possession! What miseries of disappointed ambition, and then what horrors of crushed misanthropy it brought with it!—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 28.

2327. GENIUS, Power of. Oliver Cromwell. Cromwell was one of those rare men whom even his enemies cannot name without acknowledging his genius. The farmer of Huntingdon, accustomed only to rural occupations, unnoticed until he was more than forty years old, engaged in no higher plots than how to improve the returns of his farm and fill his orchard with choice fruit, of a sudden became the best officer in the British army and the greatest statesman of his time; subverted the English constitution, which had been the work of centuries; held in his own grasp the liberties which the English people had fixed in their affections, and cast the kingdoms into a new mould. Religious peace, such as England till now had never seen, flourished under his calm mediation; justice found its way even among the remotest Highlands of Scotland; commerce filled the English marts with prosperous activity under his powerful protection; his fleets rode triumphant in the West Indies; Nova Scotia submitted to his orders without a struggle; the Dutch begged of him for peace as for a boon; Louis XIV. was humiliated; the pride of Spain was humbled; the Protestants of Piedmont breathed their prayers in security; the glory of the English name was spread throughout the world.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 11.

2328. GENIUS, Practical. Peter the Great. He resolved to go himself to Holland, England, and Italy, to acquire a better knowledge of the mechanic arts. He was twenty-five years of age—tall, strongly built, of fresh complexion, and of very easy, familiar manners, though in his mien and bearing “every inch a king.” Le Fort, his old tutor, and now his Lord High Admiral, accompanied him. The czar, on this occasion, travelled incognito, passing as a mere member of a grand embassy, which was composed of three ambassadors (Le Fort was one of them), four chief secretaries, twelve gentlemen, six pages, one company of the imperial guards, fifty in number, and several servants—the whole cortege numbering two hundred and fifteen persons. In this company the czar was nothing but an attaché, and was attended only by one valet, one footman, and a dwarf with whom he used to amuse himself. I need not dwell upon this memorable journey of a year and a half; who does not know that the czar labored with his own hands at Amsterdam as a ship carpenter, and that he travelled over half of Europe, visiting workshops, factories, hospitals, and everything that could instruct a monarch of such a country as Russia was in 1697?—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 430.

2329. GENIUS, Precocious. William Cullen Bryant. William Cullen, a boy of thirteen, who, young as he was, was already somewhat famous in his native county as a poet. At nine he had written harmonious verses, and at ten he had composed a poem for a school exhibition, which was thought good enough for publication, and was actually published in the county paper. And now this gifted boy, moved by what he heard of the terrible embargo, and the more terrible Jefferson and the Democratic party, wrote a poem, in the heroic measure, entitled “The Embargo,” in which he endeavored to express the feeling of New England respecting the course of the general government. The poem was published in pamphlet form, and was so well received in the county that, a year after, it was republished in a little thin volume. . . . The lad was nearly fifteen years of age when this volume of thirty-six pages saw the light. It contained poems so extraordinary, that it was thought necessary in the preface to print a kind of certificate, declaring that the author was really only a boy!—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 730.

2330. GENIUS, Prodigious. Napoleon I. Napoleon, having thus made his arrangements for the terrific conflict of the ensuing day [the battle of Jena and Auerstadt], retired to his tent, about midnight, and calmly sat down to draw up a plan of study and of discipline for Madame Campan's female school.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 35.

2331. GENIUS, Proof of. Benjamin Franklin. The author of the first treaty made between the United States and a foreign nation [was the son] . . . of a manufacturer of soap and candles; . . . the walls of a candleshop were too narrow for his aspiring genius. At the age of twelve he was apprenticed to his brother to learn the art of printing; but the brother beat him, and he ran off to New York. There he found no employment. In 1723 he repaired to Philadelphia . . . and rose to distinction. . . . He founded the first circulating library in America; became a man of science; edited Poor Richard's Almanac; originated the American Philosophical Society; discovered the identity of electricity and lightning; made himself known to both hemispheres; espoused the cause of the patriots; and devoted the unimpaired energies of his old age to perfecting the American Union. The name of Franklin is one of the brightest in the history of any nation.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 41, p. 330.

2332. GENIUS, Remarkable. Benjamin Franklin. The genius of Dr. Franklin shone with a peculiar lustre. At the gay court of Louis XVI. he stood as the representative of his country. No nation ever had an ambassador of greater wisdom or sagacity. His reputation for learning had preceded him; the dignity of his demeanor and the simplicity of his manners added to his fame. Whether as philosopher or diplomatist, no man in that great city of fashion was the equal of the venerable American patriot. His wit and genial humor made him admired; his talents and courtesy commanded respect; his patience and perseverance gave him final success.—RIDPATH'S HIST., ch. 41, p. 329.

2333. GENIUS, Resources in. Cæsar. Resource in difficulties is the distinction of great generals. He had observed in Britain that the coast fishermen used boats made out of frames of wicker covered with skins. The river banks were fringed with willows. There were hides in abundance on the carcasses of the animals in the camp. Swiftly in these vessels the swollen waters of the Segre were crossed; the convoys were rescued. The broken bridges were repaired. The communications of the Pompeians were threatened in turn, and they tried to fall back over the Ebro; but they left their position only to be intercepted, and after a few feeble struggles laid down their arms.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 22.

2334. GENIUS, Rewards of. Dr. Morton. [Practical use of ether was discovered by him.] This great discovery brought upon the discoverer, during the rest of his life, little but vexation and bitterness. As the process could not be patented, he wasted many years and many thousands of dollars in trying to induce Congress to make him a grant of public money. He did not succeed; and although he received considerable sums from hospitals and medical colleges in recognition of his right, he became at last a bankrupt, and the sheriff held his estate. His circumstances afterward improved, but he died upon his farm in Massachusetts, a few years ago, a comparatively poor man.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 642.

2335. GENIUS, Subjects for. Milton. Mrs. Kennicot related a living saying of Dr. Johnson to Miss Hannah More, who had expressed a wonder that the poet who had written "Paradise Lost" should write such poor sonnets; "Milton, madam, was a genius that could cut a Colossus from a rock, but could not carve heads upon cherry-stones."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 526.

2336. GENIUS, Success by. Son of Edward III. The Black Prince, with an army of 12,000 men, was sent into France, and carried devastation into the heart of the kingdom. John took the field against him with 60,000 men, and advanced toward Poitiers with the design of surrounding and cutting him off at once. The military skill displayed by the prince in the arrangement of his little army was admirable. He contrived to give them the appearance of numbers, while he even diminished them in reality, by placing a considerable body of his troops in ambuscade. The French had to march through a lane to the attack. The Black Prince with one division opposed them on the front, while his main body, divided into two, poured down upon their lengthened flank. The confusion of the enemy was completed by the troops in ambuscade, and this immense army was dispersed and cut to pieces. King John himself, with one of his sons, was taken. The moderation of the Prince of Wales was equal to his heroism. He treated the captive monarch with every distinction due to his rank; he refused to be seated in his presence; and when he conducted his royal prisoner to London amid the acclamations of the people, he rode himself on the left hand on a small black palfrey, while John upon the right was mounted on a horse remarkable for his beauty and rich accoutrements. Thus, two monarchs were at the same time prisoners in London—David of Scotland and John of France.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 12, p. 199.

2337. GENIUS, Successful. Turk. Orkhan, the chief of a petty tribe of Turkish shepherds, came to conquer without artillery that capital of Nice, which 500,000 Latin crusaders, commanded by the first princes and the first captains of Christendom, had not been able to conquer after seven weeks' storming, with all the appliances of Europe.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 215.

2338. GENIUS, Superstition of. Samuel Johnson. It appeared to me some superstitious habit which he had contracted early, and from which he had never called upon his reason to disentangle him. This was his anxious care to go out or in at a door or passage by a certain number of steps from a certain point, or at least so as that either his right or his left foot (I am not certain which) should constantly make the first actual movement when he came close to the door or passage. Thus I conjecture; for I have, upon innumerable occasions, observed him suddenly stop, and then seem to count his steps with a deep earnestness; and when he had neglected or gone wrong in this sort of magical movement, I have seen him go back again, put himself in a proper posture to begin the ceremony, and, having gone through it, break from his abstraction, walk briskly on, and join his companion.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON.

2339. GENIUS, Time for. Revival. On the revival of letters the youthful vigor of the imagination, after a long repose, national emulation, a new religion, new languages, and a new world, called forth the genius of Europe.—GIBBON'S ROME, vol. 1, ch. 2, p. 72.

2340. GENIUS, Timely. Isaac Newton. In no other mind have the demonstrative faculty and the inductive faculty co-existed in . . . supreme excellence and perfect harmony. Perhaps in an age of Scotists and Thomists even his intellect might have run to waste, as many intellects ran to waste which were inferior only to his. Happily, the spirit of the age on which his lot was cast gave the right direction to his mind; and his mind reacted with tenfold force on the spirit of the age. In the year 1685 his fame, though splendid, was only dawning; but his genius was in the meridian.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 383.

2341. GENIUS, Toils of. Virgil. Seven years the poet is said to have expended in the composition of the Georgics, and they could all be printed in about seven columns of an ordinary newspaper. Tradition reports that he was in the habit of composing a few lines in the morning, and spending the rest of the day in polishing them. Campbell used to say that if a poet made one good line a week, he did very well; but Moore thought that if a poet did his duty he could get a line done every day. Virgil seems to have accomplished about four lines a week; but then they have lasted eighteen hundred years, and will last eighteen hundred years more.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 139.

2342. GENIUS, unappreciated. Washington. A.D. 1777. [Victorious at Brandywine, the British were advancing on Philadelphia.] John Adams blamed Washington without stint. . . . "O Heaven, grant us one great soul! One leading mind would extricate the best cause from that ruin which seems to await it."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 23.

2343. GENIUS uncontrolled. Edmund Burke. No man had a better heart or more thoroughly hated oppression; but he possessed neither experience in affairs nor tranquil judgment nor the rule over his own spirit, so that his genius, under the impulse of his bewildering passions, wrought much evil to his country and to Europe, even while he rendered noble service to the cause of commercial freedom, to Ireland and to America.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 15.

2344. GENIUS, Undiscovered. Columbus. He applied himself first to the State of Genoa, of which he was a subject, and humbly solicited the public aid for assistance to attempt some discoveries in the western seas. He was treated as a visionary by his countrymen, and with the same ill success he made application to the courts of Portugal and of England. He then betook himself to Spain, where, after fruitless solicitation for several years, he at length obtained [help] from Ferdinand and Isabella.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 21, p. 305.

2345. — — —. Admiral Blake. Such was Robert Blake, when, at fifty years of age, he was called forth to an entirely new world of work, and from a general on the field to tread the deck as an admiral on the seas. Excellent as the service was which he had rendered as a soldier, we should scarcely have heard his name but that he added to all that had gone before the renown of a sailor whose name shines as an equal by the side of Drake, Nelson, Collingwood, and Hood; and yet how strange it seems that he should rise to the rank of a first-rate English seaman after his fiftieth year! strange that he should have been equal to such victorious fights! and yet probably in our day he would not have passed either a civil or an uncivil service examination.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 16, p. 205.

2346. GENIUS, Work of. Epaminondas. The ancient historians have ranked him among the greatest heroes and most illustrious characters of antiquity. . . . As a general, there needs no other criterion of his merit than to compare the situation in which he found his country—enslaved, oppressed, weak, and inconsiderable—with that in which he left it—the most formidable power in Greece. As a private citizen, his social virtues, the generosity of his disposition, a total disregard of wealth, which his high employments gave him an easy opportunity of accumulating, his eminent philosophical and literary genius, and, above all, a modest simplicity of demeanor, which added lustre to all his numerous accomplishments, were the distinguishing features of his character. With him the glory of his country may be said to have been born and to have died; for from the inauspicious day of his death the Theban power vanished at once, and that Boeotian republic sunk again into its original obscurity.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3, p. 167.

2347. — — —. Lycurgus. "He appeared," says Plato, "like a god among men." He realized and actually executed what the greatest philosophers have scarcely dared to imagine: to raise men above the passion of interest, above pain, above pleasure; to extinguish in them the strongest propensities of nature, and to fill their whole souls with the love of glory and of their country.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 9, p. 68.

2348. GENTILITY by Restraint. Samuel Johnson. An elegant manner and easiness of behavior are acquired gradually and imperceptibly. No man can say, "I'll be genteel." There are ten genteel women for one genteel man, because they are more restrained. A man without some degree of restraint is insufferable; but we are all less restrained than women. Were a woman sitting in company to put out her legs before her as most men do, we should be tempted to kick them in.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 303.

2349. GENTILITY, Vicious. Samuel Johnson. BOSWELL: . . . The genteel characters are often the most immoral. Does not Lord Chesterfield give precepts for uniting wickedness and the graces? A man, indeed, is not genteel when he gets drunk; but most vices may be committed very genteelly: a man may debauch his friend's wife genteelly; he may cheat at cards genteelly." HICKY: "I do not think that is genteel." Bos-

WELL: "Sir, it may not be like a gentleman, but it may be genteel." JOHNSON: "You are meaning two different things. One means exterior grace; the other, honor. It is certain that a man may be very immoral with exterior grace. Lovelace, in 'Clarissa,' is a very genteel and a very wicked character. Tom Hervey, who died t'other day, though a vicious man, was one of the genteel men that ever lived." Tom Davies instanced Charles II.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 245.

2350. GENTLENESS, Power of. Christian. Mr. Marsh, of Monsul, relates of an Armenian, named John, that when living at Constantinople he was hired by persecuting Armenians to strike a watchmaker. The latter, upon receiving the blow, nobly prayed, "May God bless you." This remarkable answer was effectual; "for," said John, in allusion to the affair, "I could not strike again, and at night I said to the money, 'Instead of my eating you, you will eat me?'"

2351. — — —. Exhibited. Before his conversion Rev. Matthias Joyce was a fearfully wicked man. When fifteen years old he came near murdering the child of his master with a pair of shears; when nineteen he ran from home to enlist on a man-of-war, and made an attempt to kill himself. He became a gambler, and attempted to murder a young man whom he had led into vice; he sank into drunkenness which nearly caused his death. He was drawn by the crowd to hear Mr. Wesley preach, who obtained great power over his mind by one of his simple and characteristic acts of tenderness toward a child. He says: "What endeared him still more to me was seeing him stoop down and kiss a little child that sat on the stairs of the pulpit." For thirty years he was a pure, devout, and successful minister.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 2, p. 303.

2352. GESTICULATION a Specialty. Ancient Actors. The ancient actors used in their performance a great deal of gesticulation, which was requisite, from the immense size of their theatres, in order to supply the defect of the voice. . . . A violent and strongly marked gesticulation was therefore in some degree necessary; and this led to a very extraordinary practice in the latter period of the Roman theatre—namely, that there were two persons employed in the representation of one character. Livy, the historian, relates the particular incident which gave rise to this practice. The poet Livius Andronicus, in acting upon the stage in one of his own plays, was called by the plaudits of the audience to repeat some favorite passages so frequently, that his voice became inaudible through hoarseness, and he requested that a boy might be allowed to stand in front of the musicians and recite the part, while he himself performed the consonant gesticulation. It was remarked, says the historian, that his action was much more free and forcible from being relieved of the labor of utterance; and hence it became customary, adds Livy, to allow this practice in monologues, or soliloquies, and to require both voice and gesture from the same actor only in the colloquial parts. We have it on the authority of Lucian that the same practice came to be introduced upon the Greek stage. Formerly, says that author, the same actors both recited and gesticu-fated ; but as it was observed that the continual motion, by affecting the breathing of the actor, was an impediment to distinct recitation, it was judged better to make one actor recite and another gesticulate.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 8, p. 250.

2353. GHOST, An improvised. Oliver Goldsmith. At another of these meetings there was an earnest dispute on the question of ghosts, some being firm believers in the possibility of departed spirits returning to visit their friends and familiar haunts. One of the disputants set sail the next day for London, but the vessel put back through stress of weather. His return was unknown except to one of the believers in ghosts, who concerted with him a trick to be played off on the opposite party. In the evening, at a meeting of the students, the discussion was renewed ; and one of the most strenuous opposers of ghosts was asked whether he considered himself proof against ocular demonstration ? He persisted in his scoffing. Some solemn process of conjuration was performed, and the comrade supposed to be on his way to London made his appearance. The effect was fatal. The unbeliever fainted at the sight, and ultimately went mad.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 4, p. 39.

2354. GHOSTS, Belief in. Samuel Johnson. Of John Wesley, he said : "He can talk well on any subject." BOSWELL : "Pray, sir, what has he made of his story of the ghost ?" JOHNSON : "Why, sir, he believes it ; but not on sufficient authority. He did not take time enough to examine the girl. It was at Newcastle, where the ghost was said to have appeared to a young woman several times, mentioning something about the right to an old house, advising application to be made to an attorney, which was done ; and at the same time saying the attorney would do nothing, which proved to be the fact. 'This,' says John, 'is a proof that a ghost knows our thoughts.' Now (laughing) it is not necessary to know our thoughts to tell that an attorney will sometimes do nothing. Charles Wesley, who is a more stationary man, does not believe the story. I am sorry that John did not take more pains to inquire into the evidence for it." MISS SEWARD (with an incredulous smile) : "What, sir ! about a ghost ?" JOHNSON (with solemn vehemence) : "Yes, madam ; this is a question which, after five thousand years, is yet undecided—a question, whether in theology or philosophy, one of the most important that can come before the human understanding."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 382.

2355. GHOSTS, Fear of. In Siam. [When a death occurs], after a day or two the coffin is removed, not through the door, but through an opening specially made in the wall, and is escorted thrice around the house at full speed, in order that the dead, forgetting the way through which he has passed, may not return to molest the living.—GENERAL GRANT'S TRAVELS, p. 332.

2356. GIFT, A dangerous. Samuel Johnson. Tom Hervey had a great liking for Johnson, and in his will had left him a legacy of £50. One day he said to me, "Johnson may want this money now more than afterward. I have a mind to give it him directly. Will you be so good as to carry a £50 note from me to him ?" This I positively refused to do, as he might, perhaps, have knocked me down for insulting him, and have afterward put the note in his pocket. But I said if Hervey would write him a letter, and enclose a £50 note, I should take care to deliver it.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 149.

2357. GIFT, A rejected. Napoleon I. [The Duke of Modena sued for peace.] When, in treaty with the Duke of Modena, the Commissary of the French army came to Napoleon and said, "The brother of the duke is here with $800,000 in gold. . . . He comes in the name of the duke to beg you to accept them, and I advise you to do so. The money belongs to you. Take it without scruple." . . . "I thank you," replied Napoleon, coolly ; "I shall not, for that sum, place myself in the power of the Duke of Modena." The whole contribution went into the army chest.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 5.

2358. GIFTS of Affection. Napoleon I. [After his restoration to the throne he visited the school he had established] at Ecouen for the orphan daughters of the members of the Legion of Honor. [He was received with intense enthusiasm.] . . . One of the young ladies ventured to slip a ring upon Napoleon's finger. Encouraged by the smile of the emperor, the rest, rushing upon him, seized his hands and covered them with these pledges of love and gratitude. "Young ladies," said the emperor, "they shall be as precious to me as the jewels of my crown." On retiring to his carriage he exclaimed, with moistened eyes, "This is the height of happiness ; these are the most delightful moments of my life !" —ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 26.

2359. GIFTS, Bridal. Of Placidia. The marriage of Adolphus and Placidia was consummated before the Goths retired from Italy ; and the solemn, perhaps the anniversary, day of their nuptials was afterward celebrated in the house of Ingenuus, one of the most illustrious citizens of Narbonne in Gaul. The bride, attired and adorned like a Roman empress, was placed on a throne of state ; and the king of the Goths, who assumed, on this occasion, the Roman habit, contented himself with a less honorable seat by her side. The nuptial gift, which, according to the custom of his nation, was offered to Placidia, consisted of the rare and magnificent spoils of her country. Fifty beautiful youths, in silken robes, carried a basin in each hand ; and one of these basins was filled with pieces of gold, the other with precious stones of an inestimable value.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31.

2360. GIFTS, Fictitious. Siege of Rome. The Goths were apprehensive of disturbing, by any rash hostilities, the negotiation to which Belisarius had craftily listened. They credulously believed that they saw no more than the vanguard of a fleet and army, which already covered the Ionian Sea and the plains of Campania ; and the illusion was supported by the haughty language of [Belisarius] the Roman general, when he gave audience to the ambassadors of Vitiges. After a specious discourse to vindicate the justice of his cause, they declared that, for the sake of peace, they were disposed to renounce the possession of Sicily. "The emperor is not less generous," replied his lieutenant, with a disdainful smile, "in return for a gift which you can longer possess ; he presents you with an ancient province of the empire ; he resigns to the Goths the sovereignty of the British island."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41.

2361. GIFTS, Rare. To Royalty. The gifts which a rich and generous matron of Peloponnesus presented to the Emperor Basil, her adopted son, were doubtless fabricated in the Grecian looms. Danielis bestowed a carpet of fine wool, of a pattern which imitated the spots of a peacock's tail, of a magnitude to overspread the floor of a new church, erected in the triple name of Christ, of Michael the archangel, and of the prophet Elijah. She gave six hundred pieces of silk and linen, of various use and denomination ; the silk was painted with the Tyrian dye, and adorned by the labors of the needie ; and the linen was so exquisitely fine, that an entire piece might be rolled in the hollow of a cane.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53.

2362. GLORY departed. Portuguese. In the court of a Portuguese king the compass was first seriously studied. There, too, were constructed the first tables of the sun's declinations, for sailors' use ; and there was first disclosed the modern mode of taking observations of the sun. By Portuguese navigators the islands lying off the African coast—the Azores, Madeiras, Cape Verdes, and others—were discovered. Portuguese sailors first ventured down along the coast of Africa ; first visited the negro in his native home ; first saw the elephant ; first brought to Europe pepper, ivory, and gold dust from the shores of Guinea ; first planted the cross upon those distant coasts ; first saw that remote headland which was afterward named the Cape of Good Hope ; first doubled the cape, and so reached by sea the East Indies. These were great achievements, second in importance only to the discovery of a new continent, and surpassing even that in difficulty and danger.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 233.

2363. GLORY, Enduring. Goodness. [Agesilaus, the Lacedæmonian king] might have led Tigranes, King of Armenia, captive at the wheels of his chariot ; he rather chose to make him an ally ; on which occasion he made use of that memorable expression, "I prefer the glory that will last forever to that of a day."—PLUTARCH.

2364. GLORY, False. Edward III. The reign of Edward III., which was of fifty-one years' duration, is, on the whole, certainly one of the most glorious in the annals of England ; nor is it alone the splendor of his foreign victories which has contributed to render the memory of this king great and illustrious. His foreign wars, though most eminently successful, were neither founded in justice nor productive of any substantial benefit to the nation. But England in his time enjoyed domestic tranquillity. His nobles were overawed by the spirit and valor of their sovereign, and his people attached to him on account of his acts of munificence and his salutary laws.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 12.

2365. GLORY forgotten. Pyramids. Of the purpose for which those obelisks were reared we can only form conjectures, as the ancient writers give us no information. It has been supposed that they were intended to serve as gnomons for astronomical purposes, or to determine the length of the solar year by the measure of the meridian shadows ; but their situation upon uneven ground, and the number of them, sometimes three or four erected in the same place, give no countenance to that idea ; . . . was probably to commemorate or record either public events in the history of the nation, or to be registers of the season as affected by the periodical inundations of the Nile. . . . But neither the age nor the builders of those structures are known with any degree of certainty ; a just reward, as Pliny well remarks, of the vanity of such undertakings.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4, p. 38.

2366. GLORY to God only. Cromwell. [Cromwell, in announcing the victory at the battle of Naseby to the Speaker of the House of Commons, added :] "Sir, this is none other but the hand of God, and to Him alone give the glory, wherein none are to share with Him."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 3, p. 42.

2367. GLORY, Military. Trajan. Trajan was ambitious of fame ; and as long as mankind shall continue to bestow more liberal applause on their destroyers than on their benefactors, the thirst of military glory will ever be the vice of the most exalted characters. The praises of Alexander, transmitted by a succession of poets and historians, had kindled a dangerous emulation in the mind of Trajan. Like him, the Roman emperor undertook an expedition against the nations of the East ; but he lamented with a sigh that his advanced age scarcely left him any hopes of equalling the renown of the son of Philip. Yet the success of Trajan, however transient, was rapid and specious—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1.

2368. GOD, Conception of. American Indians. The God of the savage was what the metaphysician endeavors to express by the word substance. The red man, unaccustomed to generalization, obtained no conception of an absolute substance, of a self-existent being, but saw a divinity in every power. Wherever there was being, motion, or action, there to him was a spirit. . . . When he feels his pulse throb or his heart beat he knows that it is a spirit. . . . Faith in the Great Spirit . . . infused itself into the heart of the remotest tribes.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

2369. ———. General La Hire. [Joan of Arc found rough soldiers in the army of Charles VII.] These brigands, it is true, hit upon strange means of reconciling religion and robbery. One of them, the Gascon La Hire, gave vent to the original remark : "Were God to turn man-at-arms, He would be a plunderer ;" and when he went on a foray, he offered up his little Gascon prayer without entering too minutely into his wants, conceiving that God would take a hint : "Sire God, I pray thee to do for La Hire what La Hire would do for thee wert thou a captain and wert La Hire God."—MICHELLET'S JOAN OF ARC, p. 12.

2370. GOD, Existence of. Atheists. [During the Reign of Terror the French were declared to be a nation of atheists by the National Assembly ; but a brief experience convinced them that a nation of atheists could not long exist. Robespierre then] proclaimed in the Convention that belief in the existence of a God was necessary to those principles of virtue and morality upon which the republic was founded; and on the 7th of May the national representatives, who had so lately prostrated themselves before the Goddess of Reason, voted by acclamation that "the French people acknowledge the existence of the Supreme Being, and the immortality of the soul."—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 27, § 6.

2371. GOD our Father. Egyptians. Alexander the Great went to hear Psaimmo, an Egyptian philosopher; and the saying of his that pleased him most was that all men are governed by God, for in everything that which rules or governs is divine. But Alexander's own maxim was more agreeable to sound philosophy; he said: "God is the common Father of men, but more particularly of the good and the virtuous."—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

2372. GOD, First for. Thomas More. Young as he was, More no sooner quitted the university than he was known throughout Europe as one of the foremost figures in the new movement. . . . In a higher, because in a sweeter and more lovable form than Colet, More is the representative of the religious tendency of the new learning of England. The young law student who laughed at the superstition and asceticism of the monks of his day wore a hair shirt next his skin, and schooled himself by penances for the cell he desired among the Carthusians. It was characteristic of the man that among all the gay, profligate scholars of the Italian Renaissance, he chose as the object of his admiration the disciple of Savonarola, Pico di Mirandola. Free-thinker as the bigots who listened to his daring speculations termed him, his eye would brighten and his tongue falter as he spoke with friends of heaven and the after-life. When he took office, it was with the open stipulation, "First to look to God, and after God to the king."—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 519.

2373. GOD, Ideas of. Philosophers. Of the four most celebrated schools, the Stoics and the Platonists endeavored to reconcile the jarring interests of reason and piety. They have left us the most sublime proofs of the existence and perfections of the first cause; but as it was impossible for them to conceive the creation of matter, the workman in the Stoic philosophy was not sufficiently distinguished from the work; while, on the contrary, the spiritual God of Plato and his disciples resembled an idea rather than a substance.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2.

2374. GOD, Ignorance of. Sage. [Zayd, one of the sages of Mecca,] broke openly with the religion of his country; he blasphemed heroically the gods of the Khoreishites; he wished to travel into foreign lands and to take counsel of their sages. His family caused him to be kept by force at Mecca, closely watched by his wife Saphyâ. He sighed under the constraint he was thus subjected to. He was sometimes overheard, with his back against the wall of the temple, to say with bitterness to the unknown God who was agitating his conscience: "Lord, if I only knew how thou wouldst be served and adored, I would obey thy will; but I am in ignorance." . . . He then prostrated his face against the ground and moistened the place with his tears.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 60.

2375. GOD invisible. Revealed. [The Ishmaelite Arabs have a tradition, which says Abraham was concealed in a cave when an infant, because of the persecution of Nimrod. There he was] nursed by the angels, grew in strength and intellect in his cavern. His first egression from it was by night. The firmament of Chaldea, filled with luminous creatures that floated in the ether, revealed to him God. Only he was not yet able to distinguish Him from His works. A star resplendent beyond the others first arrested his dazzled eyes: "There is my God!" exclaimed he to himself. Presently the star descended and disappeared in the horizon. "No," said he, "that cannot be the God whom I adore." So with several other constellations. Afterward the moon arose: "There is my God," cried he. And it set. "No, it is not my God." In fine, the sun arose majestically in the East, at the border of the forest. "Here, truly, is my God," said he; "it is large and dazzling beyond all others." The sun accomplished his career, and went down in the horizon, leaving the mantle of night upon the earth. "That is not still the God I look for to adore," muttered pensively the infant destined for the adoration of the divinity invisible, immovable, and eternal. He returned to his cavern to seek his God in his own soul.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 41.

2376. GOD, A political. East Indian. The religion and government of Thibet form one of the most extraordinary phenomena in the history of mankind. The kingdom of Thibet is governed by a young man personating a living god, who is called the Great Lama, or Dalai Lama. He resides in a pagoda or temple upon a mountain, where he is seen continually sitting in a cross-legged posture, without speaking or moving, except sometimes lifting his hand, when he approves of the addresses of his votaries. He appears to be a young man of a fair complexion, between twenty and thirty years of age. Not only the people of Thibet, but the neighboring princes, resort to the shrine of the lama, and bring thither the most magnificent presents. The lama is both the national god and the sovereign. He appoints deputies under him, the chief of whom is called the Tipa, who manages the temporal affairs of the kingdom, which it is beneath the dignity of the lama ever to attend to. The creation of this prince or god is kept a most mysterious secret by the priests. When it is the misfortune of this poor image of divinity and sovereignty to fall sick, or to lose his youthful appearance, he is put to death by the priests, who have always another young man whom they have privately educated and properly trained to supply his place. Thus the religion of the lama is nothing else than an artful contrivance of the priests of Thibet to engross to themselves the sovereignty and absolute government of the country.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 23, p. 333.

2377. GOD, Presence of. Mahomet. Three days Mahomet and [Ali] his companion were concealed in the cave of Thor, at the distance of a league from Mecca; and in the close of each evening they received from the son and daughter of Abubeker a secret supply of intelligence and food. The diligence of the Koreish explored every haunt in the neighborhood of the city; they arrived at the entrance of the cavern; but the providential deceit of a spider's web and a pigeon's nest is supposed to convince them that the place was solitary and inviolate. "We are only two," said the trembling Abubeker. "There is a third," replied the prophet; "it is God himself." No sooner was the pursuit abated than the two fugitives issued from the rock and mounted their camels.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50.

2378. ——. Huron Chief. [Brebœuf, the Jesuit missionary, visited the Hurons.] Before you came to this country (the great warrior Ahasistari) . . . would say, When I have incurred the greatest perils, and have alone escaped, I have said to myself, "Some powerful spirit has the guardianship of my days;" and he professed his belief in Jesus as the good genius and protector whom he had unconsciously adored.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 20.

2379. GOD required. The Soul. [Timour the Tartar desired a universal conquest, saying the earth was too small for more than one master.] "It is too small to satisfy the ambition of a great soul." "The ambition of a great soul," said one day to him the Sheik of Samarcand, "is not to be satisfied by the possession of a morsel of earth added to another, but by the possession of God, alone sufficiently great to fill up an infinite thought."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 310.

2380. GOD, Severity of. Scandinavians. Odin . . . was their principal divinity; . . . to him they attributed every character that could inspire fear and horror, without any mixture of the amiable or merciful. He is called in the Edda the terrible and severe God, the father of carnage, the avenger, the deity who marks out those who are destined to be slain. This terrible God was held to be the creator and father of the universe.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 6.

2381. GOD, Sons of. Christians. How decisive a proof is this of Cromwell's genius, this enlisting the religious enthusiasm of the country on the side of the Parliament; thus fronting the idea of lofty birth with Divine ancestry—loyalty to the king with loyalty to God—immense possessions with heirship to a Divine inheritance—and obedience to the laws and prerogative of the monarch with obedience to those truths engraven on the "tables of stone," but written by the Divine Spirit on "the fleshly table of the heart," in the heroism of discipline and faith and prayer.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 6, p. 100.

2382. GOD, Views of. Comforting. On one occasion he required a Saxon peasant to repeat the Creed. He began, "I believe in God the Father Almighty," when Luther stopped him and asked, "What is Almighty?" The peasant replied, "I do not know." "You are right, my dear fellow," responded Luther; "neither I nor all the learned men can tell what God's power and might is. But do you continue to believe in all simplicity that God is your beloved and faithful Father, who as the Only Wise can and will help your wife and children in every hour of need."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 16, p. 149.

2383. GOD, Vision of. American Indians. On approaching maturity, the young Chippewa, anxious to behold God, blackens his face with charcoal, and building a lodge of cedar boughs, it may be on the summit of a hill, there begins his fast in solitude. The fast endures, perhaps, ten days, sometimes even without water, till, excited by the severest irritation of thirst, watchfulness, and famine, he beholds the vision of God, and knows it to be his guardian spirit.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

2384. GOD, Voice of. Joan of Arc. Her own words describe them best. "At the age of thirteen a voice from God came to her to help her in ruling herself, and that the voice came to her about the hour of noon, in summer time, while she was in her father's garden. And she had fasted the day before. And she heard the voice on her right, in the direction of the church; and when she heard the voice, she saw also a bright light." Afterward St. Michael and St. Margaret and St. Catharine appeared to her. They were always in a halo of glory; she could see that their heads were crowned with jewels; and she heard their voices, which were sweet and mild. She did not distinguish their arms or limbs. She heard them more frequently than she saw them; and the usual time when she heard them was when the church bells were sounding for prayer.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 373.

2385. GOD, Will of. Crusaders. From the synod of Placentia, the rumor of his great design had gone forth among the nations; the clergy on their return had preached in every diocese the merit and glory of the deliverance of the Holy Land; and when the pope ascended a lofty scaffold in the market-place of Clermont, his eloquence was addressed to a well-prepared and impatient audience. His topics were obvious, his exhortation was vehement, his success inevitable. The orator was interrupted by the shout of thousands, who with one voice, and in their rustic idiom, exclaimed aloud, "God wills it, God wills it." "It is indeed the will of God," replied the pope; "and let this memorable word, the inspiration surely of the Holy Spirit, be forever adopted as your cry of battle, to animate the devotion and courage of the champions of Christ. His cross is the symbol of your salvation; wear it, a red, a bloody cross, as an external mark, on your breasts or shoulders, as a pledge of your sacred and irrevocable engagement." The proposal was joyfully accepted; great numbers, both of the clergy and laity, impressed on their garments the sign of the cross, and solicited the pope to march at their head.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58, p. 543.

2386. GODS, Descent from. Spurious. There was a woman in Pontus who gave it out that she was pregnant by Apollo. . . . When she was delivered of a son . . . gave him the name of Silenus. Lysander took this miraculous birth for a foundation, and raised all his building upon it. He made choice of such assistants as might bring the story into reputation, and put it beyond suspicion. Then he got another story propagated at Delphi and spread at Sparta, that certain ancient oracles were kept in the private registers of the priests, which it was not lawful to touch or to look upon, until in some future age a person should arise who could clearly prove himself the son of Apollo, and he was to interpret and publish those oracles. The way thus prepared, Silenus was to make his appearance, as the son of Apollo, and demand the oracles. The priests, who were in combination, were to inquire into every article, and examine him strictly as to his birth. At last they were to pretend to be convinced of his divine parentage, and to show him the books. Silenus then was to read in public all those prophecies, particularly that for which the whole design was set on foot—namely, that it would be more for the honor and interest of Sparta to set aside the present race of kings, and choose others out of the best and most worthy of men in the commonwealth. But when Silenus was grown up, and came to undertake his part, Lysander had the mortification to see his piece miscarry by the cowardice of one of the actors, whose heart failed him just as the thing was going to be put in execution. However, nothing of this was discovered while Lysander lived.—PLUTARCH'S LYSANDER.

2387. GODS, Great. Persuasion—Force. [Themistocles said to the Adrians when he wished to exhort money from them:] He brought two gods along with him—Persuasion and Force. They replied they had also two great gods on their side—Poverty and Despair, who forbade them to satisfy him.—PLUTARCH'S THEMISTOCLES.

2388. GOLD, Craze for. Emigrants to Jamestown. [Second lot of emigrants.] The newcomers were chiefly vagabond gentlemen and goldsmiths, who, in spite of the remonstrances of Smith, . . . believed they had discovered grains of gold in a glittering earth. . . . "There was now no talk, no hope, no work, but to dig gold, wash gold, refine gold." Newport, the commander, . . . believed himself immeasurably rich, as he embarked for England with a freight of worthless earth.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., ch. 4.

2389. GOLD, Delusion of. Londoners. One of Frobisher's ships . . . proceeded to the northwest [seeking a passage to India north of Hudson's Strait]; . . . he came upon an island which he supposed to be the mainland of Asia; to this he gave the name Meta Incognita. North of this island he entered the [Frobisher's] Strait, . . . carrying home with him . . . a stone which was declared by the English refiners to contain gold. London was greatly excited. Queen Elizabeth herself added a vessel to the new fleet which in . . . 1577 departed for Meta Incognita to gather the precious metal by the shipload. . . . The summer was unfavorable. [The ships returned empty after passing great perils.] Were the English gold-hunters satisfied? Not at all. Fifteen new vessels were immediately fitted out. . . . In 1578 . . . the third voyage was begun. This time a colony was to be planted in the gold-regions, . . . twelve of the ships were to be freighted with gold-ore and return to London. . . . They encountered icebergs more terrible than ever. The vessels finally reached Meta Incognita and took on cargoes of dirt. . . . The provision ship now slipped away and returned to London. . . . The colony which was to be planted was no longer thought of. Faith in the shining earth which they had stored in the holds gave way, and so, with . . . several tons of the spurious ore, . . . the ships set sail for home. The El Dorado of the Esquimaux had proved an utter failure.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 6, p. 80.

2390. ———. Spaniards. In the year 1526 Charles V. appointed the unprincipled Panfilo de Narvaez governor of Florida, . . . with the usual privilege of conquest, . . . His force consisted of 260 soldiers and forty horsemen. The natives treated them with suspicion, and, anxious to be rid of the intruders, began to hold up their trinkets and to point to the north. The hint was eagerly taken by the avaricious Spaniards. . . . They struck boldly into the forests, expecting to find cities and empires, and found instead swamps and savages. . . . A squalid village of forty cabins . . . was the mighty city to which their guides had directed them. . . . They reached the sea at the harbor of St. Mark's. . . . With great labor they constructed brigantines, and put to sea in the vain hope of reaching the Spanish settlements in Mexico. . . . They were thrown upon the shore, drowned, slain by the savages, . . . until finally four miserable men, of all the adventurous company, . . . were rescued at . . . San Miguel on the Pacific coast. . . . The story can hardly be paralleled in the annals of suffering and peril.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 4, p. 63.

2391. GOLD vs. Labor. Hernando Cortez. Being then nineteen, he took passage in a merchant vessel, and after a most tempestuous passage reached the island of Hispaniola, then the seat of Spanish power in America. He was at that time a very handsome young man, graceful, self-confident, a superior swordsman and horseman, and highly accomplished in all warlike exercises. On leaving the ship he went at once to the house of the governor, a friend of his family. The governor being absent upon an expedition, his secretary received Cortez with politeness, and, by way of encouraging a newcomer, assured him that the governor, upon his return, would doubtless allot to him a liberal tract of land. "Land!" said Cortez, "I come to find gold, not to plough the ground like a peasant."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 318.

2392. GOLD, Ruined by. John A. Sutter. [The discoverer of gold in California.] People often say what they would do if they should find a gold mine, evidently supposing that a man who finds a gold mine is made rich of course. But this, it appears, is not always the case. Neither the man who discovered gold in California nor the man upon whose land it was discovered have been benefited by it. On the contrary, the discovery ruined them both, and both are to-day poor men.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 522.

2393. GOOD, Doing. Daily. [Alexander the Great found in Persia] philosophers, [who were] so called for their going naked. [They] were divided into two sects—the Brachmani and the Germani. The Brachmani were most esteemed because there was a consistency in their principles. Apuleius tells us that not only the scholars but the younger pupils were assembled about dinner time, and examined what good they had done that day; and such as could not point out some act of humanity or useful pursuit that they had been engaged in were not allowed any dinner.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER, LANGHORNE'S NOTE.

2394. GOODNESS, False. Charilaus. [The Grecian] was so remarkable for the gentleness of his disposition, that Archelaus, his partner in the throne, is reported to have said to some that were praising the young king: "Yes, Charilaus is a good man to be sure, who cannot find in his heart to punish the bad."—PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

2395. GOODNESS, Greatness of. Pericles. When he was at the point of death his surviving friends and the principal citizens sitting about his bed discoursed together concerning his extraordinary virtue and the great authority he had enjoyed, and enumerated his various exploits and the number of his victories; for while he was commander-in-chief he had erected no less than nine trophies to the honor of Athens. These things they talked of, supposing that he attended not to what they said, but that his senses were gone. He took notice, however, of every word they had spoken, and thereupon delivered himself audibly as follows: "I am surprised, that while you dwell upon and extol these acts of mine, though fortune had her share in them, and many other generals have performed the like, you take no notice of the greatest and most honorable part of my character, that no Athenian, through my means, ever put on mourning."—PLUTARCH'S PERICLES.

2396. — Puritans. Those who hated the Commonwealth acknowledged that England never stood higher than when she demanded justice for a few poor cultivators of the Alps—those who had kept the truth
"When all our fathers worshipped stocks and stones."

[Cromwell, by envoy extraordinary, had remonstrated against the cruelties to the Vaudois. By his firmness and earnestness he secured to them their ancient liberties.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 13, p. 198.

2397. GOODNESS, Terrified by. Henry III. [In July of 1261 Henry III.] was at Westminster; and being in his pleasure barge on the Thames a thunder-storm came on, at which he was alarmed, and landed in the garden of the Bishop of Durham. De Montfort was in the palace of the bishop, and went forward to meet the king. "What do you fear, sir?" said the earl; "the storm has passed over." The king replied, "I fear thunder and lightning beyond measure; but by God's head! I fear you more than all the thunder and lightning in the world." [The earl was a patriot and the foremost man of his times.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 24, p. 372.

2398. GOSPEL, Heavenly. Sailor. [John Tunnell, one of the early Methodist preachers of that church in America, was so pale he resembled a dead man; but his voice was strong and musical, and his style was eloquent. A sailor was one day passing where he was preaching. He stopped to listen, and was observed to be much affected. Afterward meeting with his companions, he said:] "I have been listening to a man who has been dead, and in heaven; but he has returned, and is telling the people all about that world."—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 2, ch. 6, p. 38.

2400. GOSSIP, Serviceable. Omar. [One of Mahomet's converts, named] Omar, wishing to let his conversion transpire among the Khoreishites without avowing it himself, went, on leaving the meeting, to the house of a Khoreishite notorious as a newsmonger and for his impotence to keep a secret. "Listen," said he to him, "but do not betray me; I have just made a secret profession of faith to Islamism." The newsmonger runs immediately to the vestibule of the Kaaba, the habitual resort of the idlers of Mecca, crying aloud that Omar had apostatized the idols, and was become perverted like the others. "Thou liest," said Omar to him, coming up behind him; "I am not perverted, I am converted, I am a Mussulman, I make confession that there are no other gods but the only God, and that Mahomet is the revealer of that God."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 90.

2401. GOVERNMENT, Arbitrary. British. The most general cause of the American Revolution was the right of arbitrary government, claimed by Great Britain and denied by the colonies. So long as this claim was asserted by England only as a theory, the conflict was postponed; when the English Government began to enforce the principle in practice, the colonies resisted. . . . There were also many subordinate causes tending to bring on a conflict.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 37, p. 285.

2402. GOVERNMENT, Art of. Diocletian. Nor were the vices of Maximian less useful to his benefactor. Insensible to pity, and fearless of consequences, he was the ready instrument of every act of cruelty which the policy of that artful prince might at once suggest and disclaim. As soon as a bloody sacrifice had been offered to prudence or to revenge, Diocletian, by his seasonable intercession, saved the remaining few whom he had never designed to punish, gently censured the severity of his stern colleague, and enjoyed the comparison of a golden and an iron age, which was universally applied to their opposite maxims of government. Notwithstanding the difference of their characters, the two emperors maintained, on the throne, that friendship which they had contracted in a private station. The haughty, turbulent spirit of Maximian, so fatal afterward to himself and to the public peace, was accustomed to respect the genius of Diocletian, and confessed the ascendancy of reason over brutal violence.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 13, p. 405.

2403. GOVERNMENT, Atrocious. Reign of James II. A.D. 1685. The history of our colonization is the history of the crimes of Europe. Thus did Jeffreys contribute [by condemning to transportation and sale of convicts] to people the New World. . . . Kidnapping had become common in Bristol; and not felons only, but young persons and others, were hurried across the Atlantic and sold for money. At Bristol the mayor and the justices would intimidate small rogues and pilferers, who, under the terror of being hanged, prayed for transportation as the only means of safety, and were then divided among the members of the court [who sold them]. The trade was exceedingly profitable—far more so than the slave-trade—and had been conducted for years.—BANCROFT'S U. S., ch. 14.

2404. GOVERNMENT, Coerced. Charles I. There was yet one last expedient which, as the king flattered himself, might save him from the misery of facing another House of Commons. . . . Departing from the uninterrupted practice of centuries, he called a great council consisting of peers alone. But the lords were too prudent to assume the unconstitutional functions with which he wished to invest them. Without money, without credit, without authority even in his own camp, he yielded to the pressure of necessity. The houses were convoked, and the elections proved that, since the spring, the distrust and hatred with which the government was regarded had made fearful progress. — MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 89.

2405. GOVERNMENT, Complex. Holland. [William of Orange meditated an invasion of England.] It seemed very doubtful whether he would be able to obtain the assistance of a single battalion. Of all the difficulties with which he had to struggle, the greatest, though little noticed by English historians, arose from the constitution of the Batavian republic. No great society has ever existed during a long course of years under a polity so inconvenient. The States-General could not make war or peace, could not conclude any alliance or levy any tax, without the consent of the States of every province. The States of a province could not give such consent without the consent of every municipality which had a share in the representation. — MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 381.

2406. GOVERNMENT, Concentrated. Reign of George III. [It was resolved to tax and otherwise oppress the American colonies.] It would seem that the execution of so momentous a design must have engaged the attention of the whole people of England and of the civilized world. But so entirely was the British Government of that day in the hands of the few, and so much was their curiosity engrossed by what would give influence at court or secure votes in the House of Commons, that the most eventful measures ever adopted in that country were entered upon without any observation on the part of historians and writers of memoirs at the time. The ministry itself was not aware of what it was doing. — BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 5.

2407. — — — Louis XIV. Louis imbibed the most extravagant ideas of the nature and extent of the royal prerogative. . . . He aimed to concentrate in himself individually all the powers and functions of government. The sovereign, in his view, was . . . the fountain and author of all law and all justice. This theory he was accustomed to express in the well-known apothegm, "The State is myself." — STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 21, § 1.

2408. GOVERNMENT confused. New Jersey. It was almost impossible to tell to whom the jurisdiction of the territory rightfully belonged. So far as the eastern province was concerned, the representatives of Carteret claimed it; the Governor of New York claimed it; Penn and his associates claimed it. As to the western province, the heirs of Byllinge claimed it; Lucas, Laurie, and Penn claimed it; the Governor of New York claimed it. Over all these stood the paramount claim of the English king. From 1689 to 1692 there was no settled form of government in the territory. And for ten years thereafter the colony was vexed and distracted with the presence of more rulers than any one province could accommodate. — RIDPATH'S U. S. ch. 24, p. 207.

2409. GOVERNMENT, Dangerous. Decemvirs. Whatever we may judge of the designs of these decemvirs, it is certain that they endeavored to maintain their authority by extreme violence, and as certain that they became almost immediately the objects of public indignation. From their first appearance in the forum, they were preceded by twelve lictors, who constantly carried the fasces armed with axes. Their suite was commonly composed of a number of the most licentious patricians; profligates loaded with debt or stained with crimes; men whose pleasure lay in every species of disorder, and who contributed a desperate aid to those ministers whose power protected them in their lawless excesses. . . . Such was the miserable situation of Rome under her new governors, that many of the principal citizens betook themselves for refuge to the allied states. — GIBBON'S ROME, Book 3, ch. 5, p. 336.

2410. GOVERNMENT, Demoralizing. Bad. The horrid practice, so familiar to the ancients, of exposing or murdering their new-born infants, was become every day more frequent in the provinces, and especially in Italy. It was the effect of distress; and the distress was principally occasioned by the intolerable burden of taxes, and by the vexatious as well as cruel prosecutions of the officers of the revenue against their insolvent debtors. The less opulent or less industrious part of mankind, instead of rejoicing in an increase of family, deemed it an act of paternal tenderness to release their children from the impending miseries of a life which they themselves were unable to support. [Such was the condition of the Roman people early in the fourth century.] — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 3, p. 94.

2411. GOVERNMENT, Destitute of. New Jersey. For twelve years the whole province was not in a settled condition. From June, 1689, to August, 1692, east New Jersey had no government whatever, being, in time of war, without military officers, as well as without magistrates; and afterward commissions were issued by two sets of proprietors, of which each had its adherents; while a third party, swayed by disgust at the confusion, . . . rejected the proprietaries altogether. — BANCROFT'S U. S., ch. 19, vol. 3.

2412. GOVERNMENT detested. Charles II. The roar of foreign guns was heard, for the first and last time, by the citizens of London. In the council it was seriously proposed that, if the enemy advanced, the Tower should be abandoned. Great multitudes of people assembled in the streets, crying out that England was bought and sold. The houses and carriages of the ministers were attacked by the populace; and it seemed likely that the government would have to deal at once with an invasion and with an insurrection. The extreme danger, it is true, soon passed by. — MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 180.

2413. GOVERNMENT, Dictatorial. Gustavus III. He declared that, in future, the king alone should have power to convene and dissolve the legislature; that the king should have the absolute command of army and navy, and the power to appoint and remove all officers, military, naval, and civil; that, in case of necessity, of which the king alone was to be the judge, he should impose taxes without consulting the Senate; that the Senate should discuss no subjects except those proposed by the king; but that no offensive war should be undertaken without their consent. He then declared the Senate dissolved, and its members dismissed from all their employments. He concluded by taking a psalm-book from his pocket, and gave out a thanksgiving hymn, which the whole assembly rose and sang. . . . The king's triumph was complete. In two days Sweden, from being the most strictly limited monarchy in Europe, became one of the most absolute.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 343.

2414. GOVERNMENT difficult. Scots. Though the Scottish Parliament was obsequious, the Scottish people had always been singularly turbulent and ungovernable. They had butchered their first James in his bedchamber; they had repeatedly arrayed themselves in arms against James II.; they had slain James III. on the field of battle; their disobedience had broken the heart of James V.; they had deposed and imprisoned Mary; they had led her son captive; and their temper was still as untractable as ever. Their habits were rude and martial. All along the southern border and all along between the Highlands and the Lowlands ranged an incessant and predatory war.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 87.

2415. GOVERNMENT, Discordant. Acre. [Under the Crusaders.] After the loss of Jerusalem, Acre, which is distant about seventy miles, became the metropolis of the Latin Christians, and was adorned with strong and stately buildings, with aqueducts, an artificial port, and a double wall. The population was increased by the incessant streams of pilgrims and fugitives; in the pauses of hostility the trade of the East and West was attracted to this convenient station; and the market could offer the produce of every clime and the interpreters of every tongue. But in this conflux of nations every vice was propagated and practised; of all the disciples of Jesus and Mahomet, the male and female inhabitants of Acre were esteemed the most corrupt; nor could the abuse of religion be corrected by the discipline of law. The city had many sovereigns, and no government. The kings of Jerusalem and Cyprus, of the house of Lusignan, the princes of Antioch, the counts of Tripoli and Sidon, the great masters of the hospital, the temple, and the Teutonic order, the republics of Venice, Genoa, and Pisa, the pope's legate, the kings of France and England, assumed an independent command; seventeen tribunals exercised the power of life and death; every criminal was protected in the adjacent quarter; and the perpetual jealousy of the nations often burst forth in acts of violence and blood.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 59, p. 46.

2416. GOVERNMENT disgraced. George Villiers. George Villiers, afterward Duke of Buckingham, on whom the king, in the space of a few years, lavished all possible honors, . . . was devoid of every talent of a minister; he was headstrong in his passions, imprudent, impolitic, and capricious. He was distinguished by a romantic spirit, which led him into the most extravagant excesses; and the indulgence of his favorite passions had their influence even upon the public measures of the nation. He projected an absurd expedition of Charles, the Prince of Wales, into Spain, on a visit, in disguise, to the Infanta, the daughter of Philip IV., who had been proposed to him as a desirable match. Their adventures on this expedition have more the air of romance than of history; but Buckingham was the hero of the piece. He filled all Madrid with his intrigues, his amours, serenades, challenges, and jealousies. He insulted the prime-minister Olivarez by openly making love to his wife, as he did afterward, with still more folly and insolence, to the Queen of France; in short, the projected match with the Infanta seemed to be the least object of Buckingham's journey, and it accordingly was never concluded.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 29, p. 398.

2417. GOVERNMENT, Disordered. Reign of Commodus. The negligence of the public administration was betrayed, soon afterward, by a new disorder, which arose from the smallest beginnings. A spirit of desertion began to prevail among the troops; and the deserters, instead of seeking their safety in flight or concealment, infested the highways. Maternus, a private soldier, of a daring boldness above his station, collected these bands of robbers into a little army, set open the prisons, invited the slaves to assert their freedom, and plundered with impunity the rich and defenceless cities of Gaul and Spain. The governors of the provinces, who had long been the spectators, and perhaps the partners, of his depredations, were at length roused from their supine indolence by the threatening commands of the emperor.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4, p. 107.

2418. GOVERNMENT, Divine. Royal. It was gravely maintained that the Supreme Being regarded hereditary monarchy, as opposed to other forms of government, with peculiar favor; that the rule of succession in order of primogeniture was a divine institution, anterior to the Christian, and even to the Mosaic dispensation; that no human power, not even that of the whole Legislature—no length of adverse possession, though it extended to ten centuries, could deprive the legitimate prince of his rights; that his authority was necessarily always despotic; that the laws by which, in England and in other countries, the prerogative was limited, were to be regarded merely as concessions which the sovereign had freely made and might at his pleasure resume; and that any treaty into which a king might enter with his people was merely a declaration of his present intentions, and not a contract of which the performance could be demanded. [Reign of James I.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 66.

2419. GOVERNMENT, The earliest. Monarchy. We may, therefore, fairly presume that a limited monarchy was the earliest form of regular government among the ancient nations. The scriptures, as well as the profane historians, bear evidence to this fact. A republic is an idea too refined and too complex for a rude people to form; and despotic monarchies arise only after extensive conquests, and a great enlargement of empire.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 1, p. 20.

2420. GOVERNMENT, Economical. Washington. When Washington came to the Presidency, one of the first acts was to name the young West Indian—then but thirty-three years of age—to the most difficult post in his administration—that of secretary of the treasury. Albert Gallatin, who became secretary of the treasury twenty years after, said that Alexander Hamilton had so regulated the business of the office as to make it a sinecure for his successors; and I have been informed that as late as 1860 the business continued to be done upon the plans and methods established by Hamilton at the beginning of the government. From this position, after four years of service, he was compelled to retire, because the salary would not support his family.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 474.

2421. GOVERNMENT, Farical. Constantine. Some of these official ensigns were really exhibited in their hall of audience; others preceded their pompous march whenever they appeared in public; and every circumstance of their demeanor, their dress, their ornaments, and their train was calculated to inspire a deep reverence for the representatives of supreme majesty. By a philosophic observer, the system of the Roman government might have been mistaken for a splendid theatre, filled with players of every character and degree, who repeated the language and imitated the passions of their original model.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 17, p. 108.

2422. GOVERNMENT, Fraudulent. Cromwell's. After a debate of three days the Parliament, of whom a great majority were now most sincerely desirous of an accommodation, passed a vote, by which it was declared that the king's concessions were a reasonable foundation for the House to proceed upon in the settlement of the kingdom. The vote was no sooner heard than Cromwell marched into London, surrounded the House of Commons, and suffering none to enter but his own party, excluded about two hundred of the members. Thus there remained about sixty of the independent party, sure and unanimous in their intended measures. The vote agreeing to the king's concessions was now rescinded, and another passed, declaring it treason in a king to levy war against his Parliament, and appointing a high court of justice to take trial of Charles' treason. This vote being sent up to the House of Lords was rejected without a dissenting voice. But this mockery of a Parliament was not thus to be stopped in their career. The next vote was that the Commons of England have the supreme authority of the nation, independent of either king or peers. Cromwell himself was ashamed of the glaring illegality of these proceedings, and apologized for his conduct by declaring that he had a divine impulse that the king had been abandoned by Heaven.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 30, p. 408.

2423. GOVERNMENT, Genius for. Alfred the Great. Alfred divided all England into counties; these he subdivided into hundreds; and the hundreds again into tithings. Ten neighboring householders formed a tithing, a fribourg, or decennery, over which one man was appointed to preside, called a tithingman or borgholder. Every householder was answerable for the conduct of his family, and the borgholder for the conduct of all within his district. Every man was punished as an outlaw who did not register himself in some tithing; and none could change their habitation without a warrant from the tithingman or borgholder. When any person was accused of a crime, the borgholder was summoned to answer for him; if he declined to become his security, the criminal was committed to prison till trial. If he escaped before trial, the borgholder was subjected to a penalty. The borgholder, in deciding disputes or small lawsuits, summoned his whole decennary or tithing to assist him. In matters of greater importance, in appeals from the decennary, or in controversies arising between members of different decennaries, the cause was brought before the hundred, which consisted of ten decennaries, or one hundred families of freemen, and which was regularly assembled every four weeks for the deciding of causes. Their method of deciding deserves particularly to be noticed as being the origin of juries, that inestimable privilege of Britons.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 5, p. 110.

glory and influence over all Europe.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 32, p. 443.

2425. GOVERNMENT, Growth of. Necessary. What fiction can be more absurd and incredible than to suppose an ignorant and rude youth, the leader of a gang of banditti, or the chief of a troop of shepherds, immediately after he had reared the turf walls of his projected city, calling together his followers, and delivering a labored and methodical oration on the nature of the different kinds of government, such as he had heard existed in Greece and other nations, desiring his hearers seriously to weigh the advantages and defects of those different political constitutions, and modestly concluding with a declaration that he is ready to accede with cheerfulness to whatever form they, in their aggregate wisdom, may decree? On this absurd fiction Dionysius rears the structure of a finely attempered constitution, all at once framed and adopted by this troop of barbarians. [Romulus founding Rome.]—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 2, p. 303.

2426. GOVERNMENT, Imperfections of. British. The English long enjoyed a large measure of freedom and happiness. Though during the feeble reign of Henry VI. the State was torn first by factions and at length by civil war; though Edward IV. was a prince of dissolute and imperious character; though Richard III. has generally been represented as a monster of depravity; though the exactions of Henry VII. caused great repining, it is certain that our ancestors, under those kings, were far better governed than the Belgians under Philip, surnamed the Good, or the French under that Louis who was styled the father of his people.—MACAULAY'S HIST., ch. 1, p. 35.

2427. GOVERNMENT, Impracticable. James II. James was the instrument of his own misfortunes, and ran headlong to destruction. In a government where the people have a determined share of power and a capacity of legally resisting every measure which they apprehend to be to their disadvantage, every attempt to change, in opposition to their general desire, the religion or civil constitution of the country, must be impracticable. The Roman Catholics in England were not at this time one hundredth part of the nation. How absurd, then (as Sir William Temple told his sovereign)—how contrary to common-sense was it to imagine that one part should govern ninety-nine who were of opposite sentiments and opinions! Yet James was weak enough to make that absurd and desperate attempt. The nobility of the kingdom, by natural right the counsellors of the sovereign, were obliged to give place to a set of Romish priests, who directed all his measures; and James, as if he was determined to neglect nothing which might tend to his own destruction, began his reign by levying, without the authority of Parliament, all the taxes which had been raised by his predecessor; he showed a further contempt of the constitution and of all national feeling by going openly to mass; and though in his first Parliament he solemnly promised to observe the laws and to maintain the Protestant religion, he, at the same time, hinted in pretty strong terms that if he found them at all refractory or backward in granting such supplies as he should require, he could easily dispense with calling any more such assemblies.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 30, p. 424.

2428. GOVERNMENT, Indiscreet. James I. During two hundred years all the sovereigns who had ruled England, with the single exception of the unfortunate Henry VI., had been strong-minded, high-spirited, courageous, and of princely bearing. Almost all had possessed abilities above the ordinary level. It was no light thing that, on the very eve of the decisive struggle between our kings and their Parliaments, royalty should be exhibited to the world stammering, slobbering, shedding unmanly tears, trembling at a drawn sword, and talking in the style alternately of a buffoon and of a pedagogue.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 68.

2429. GOVERNMENT, Insulted. Citizen Genet. The Jacobins of France had beheaded the king and abolished the monarchy. Citizen Genet was sent by the new French republic as minister to the United States. . . . He was greeted with unbounded enthusiasm. Taking advantage of his popularity, the ambassador began to abuse his authority, fitted out privateers to prey on the commerce of Great Britain, planned expeditions against Louisiana, and although the President had already issued a proclamation of neutrality, demanded an alliance with the government. Washington and his Cabinet firmly refused, and the audacious minister threatened to appeal to the people. In this outrageous conduct he was sustained by the Anti-Federal party, and for a while the government was endangered. But Washington stood unmoved, declared the course of the French minister an insult to the sovereignty of the United States, and demanded his recall, and Genet was superseded.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 46, p. 368.

2430. GOVERNMENT without Law. American Indians. There can be no society without government; but among the Indian tribes . . . there was not only no written law—there was no traditional expression of law; government rested upon opinion and usage, and the motives for usage were never embodied in language. No ancient legislator believed that human society could be maintained with so little artifice.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

2431. GOVERNMENT of Majority. Rhode Island Colony. All the powers of the colonial government were intrusted to the people. A simple agreement was made and signed by the settlers, that in all matters not affecting the conscience they would yield a cheerful obedience to such rules as the majority might make for the public welfare. In questions of religion the individual conscience should be to every man a guide. When Massachusetts objected that such a democracy would leave nothing for the magistrates to do, Rhode Island answered that magistrates were wellnigh useless.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 22, p. 194.

2432. GOVERNMENT, Menace of. Charles II. The moderation of this assembly [the Parliament of 1640] has been highly extolled by the most distinguished Royalists, and seems to have caused no small vexation and disappointment to the chiefs of the opposition; but it was the uniform practice of Charles—a practice equally impolitic and ungenerous—to refuse all compliance with the desires of his people till those desires were expressed in a menacing tone.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 89.

2433. GOVERNMENT, Military. Cromwell's. In the summer of 1647, about twelve months after the last fortress of the Cavaliers had submitted to the Parliament, the Parliament was compelled to submit to its own soldiers. Thirteen years followed, during which England was, under various names and forms, really governed by the sword. Never before that time or since that time was the civil power in our country subjected to military dictation.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 112.

2434. GOVERNMENT misdirected. Piracy. Captain John Nutt was one of the most daring sea-devils of that lawless time. He was an untakable man. . . . [While a pardon without restitution was in progress, Admiral] Elliot did manage to get possession of him. . . . The pirate was more powerful than the admiral. . . . Such a buccaneer as Nutt—an immensely wealthy man, a daring, resolute man—had friends at court. . . . It is marvellous to relate that Nutt was permitted to become the accuser of the admiral—that admiral who had first been congratulated by Conway the Secretary of State, . . . who had been told by letter that he was to receive the king's thanks and to kiss the king's hand in acknowledgment of his rescue of the western counties and seas from Nutt's piracy, plunder, and murder. That admiral, . . . for that very transaction of seizing that pirate, the month following lay in the Marshalsea prison upon some frivolous pretences; while the happy, blithe-hearted pirate and plunderer stepped forth with a free and unconditional pardon to renew his pleasant adventures upon the seas.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 3, p. 51.

2435. GOVERNMENT mismanaged. Colony. In September, 1609, there remained at Jamestown a colony of four hundred and ninety persons, well armed, well supplied, and well sheltered. But such was the viciousness and profligacy of the greater number, and such the insubordination and want of proper leadership, after [John] Smith's departure, that by the beginning of winter the settlement was face to face with starvation. . . . Cold and hunger completed the terrors of a winter long remembered with a shudder, and called the starving time. By the last of March there were only sixty persons alive, and these, if help had not come speedily, could hardly have lived a fortnight.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 10, p. 106.

2436. GOVERNMENT, A model. North Carolina. The philosopher John Locke was employed by Sir Astley [Cooper, Earl of Shaftesbury] and his associates to prepare the constitution. The legislation of the world furnishes no parallel for the pompous absurdity of Locke's performance. From March until July of 1669 the philosopher worked away in the preparation of his grand model. . . . Political rights were made dependent upon hereditary wealth. The officers were put beyond the reach of the people. There were two grand orders of nobility. There were dukes, earls, and marquises; knights, lords, and esquires; baronial courts, heraldic ceremony, and every sort of feudal nonsense, . . . for a few colonists who lived on venison and potatoes, and paid their debts in tobacco. . . . After twenty years . . . they concluded that an empire . . . was impossible.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 27, p. 225.

2437. GOVERNMENT, Moral. Optimism. The fashionable philosophy then was that of Pope's "Essay on Man;" . . . it was continually quoted in society. It was very common to hear such expressions as, "Whatever is, is right;" "Partial evil is the general good;" "This is the best of possible worlds;" "Each creature is as happy as is consistent with the happiness of the whole." Sentiments of this kind we now call "Optimism." In the midst of all this shallow talk came the tidings of an appalling catastrophe [the earthquake at Lisbon], which struck every soul with amazement and terror, as if to show the futility of all human attempts to form a consistent theory respecting the government of the universe.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BROG., p. 31.

2438. GOVERNMENT, Municipal. Origin of. In the next place, the towns or boroughs, which were then tied down by a sort of vassalage and clientship to the nobles, began now to purchase their immunity; and instead of being entirely governed by these nobles, to whom the magistrates were no more than servants and stewards, while they exercised themselves the supreme civil and criminal authority, and imposed what taxes or exactions they thought fit, the towns now acquired a right of choosing their own magistrates, who were responsible to the public; they freed themselves from those arbitrary impositions, and were governed by their own municipal statutes, subordinate to the public laws of the kingdom. Thus the municipal government began, in many of the towns of Europe, to take the place of the feudal.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 10, p. 165.

2439. GOVERNMENT needless. North Carolina. The people, without molestation, enjoyed their wild independence. It was the liberty of freemen in the woods. "North Carolina," like ancient Rome, was famed "as the sanctuary of runaways;" seventy years after its origin Spotswood describes it as "a country where there is scarce any form of government;" and it long continued to be said, with but slight exaggeration, that "in Carolina every one did what was right in his own eyes, paying tribute neither to God nor to Caesar."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 19.

2440. GOVERNMENT, Neglect of. Pirates. During the recess of 1625 Eliot travelled to the West. As he passed along, news reached him of the cruel mischief inflicted by Turkish pirates, who, from under forts and castles left helpless and unguarded, sprung on English ships. The western sea, with all the villages lining its coasts, was entirely at their mercy; all trade was interrupted, and the number of Christians captured to be sold into slavery during the outrages of three months could not be less than twelve hundred. There were wallings for fathers and sons, for brothers, for husbands and wives. Meantime the ships of the nation lay in harbor, men and provisions on board, and government careless of the inflictions on its subjects.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 3, p. 57.

2441. GOVERNMENT, Nominal. Monarch of England. The king reigned, but by the theory of the constitution was not to govern. He appeared in the Privy Council on occasions of state; but Queen Anne was the last of the English monarchs to attend the debates of the House of Lords, or to preside at a meeting of the ministry.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 3.

2442. GOVERNMENT, Odious. Rump Parliament. The long parliament of five years' duration, christened, by one of those contemptuous designations which mark popular disgust, The Rump, a term suggested by its apparently interminable sessions upon the benches of Westminster, had thoroughly wearied out the people of England. The long harangues of the Puritans, the bigoted discourses of the saints, the personal unpopularity of the demagogues, the anti-social absurdities of the Levellers, the murder of an innocent and heroic monarch, which penetrated the conscience of the nation with remorse, the imposts and slaughters of the civil war, finally, the heaviness of that anonymous tyranny which the people endured more impatiently than the autocracy of a glorious name—all these combined objections fell back in accumulated odium and ridicule on the Parliament.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 57.

2443. GOVERNMENT, Outrages of. Virginia Colony. An aristocratic party which had arisen in the colony obtained control of the House of Burgesses. . . . Episcopalianism was again established as the State religion. A proscriptive ordinance was passed against the Baptists, and the peace-loving Quakers were fined, persecuted, and imprisoned. Burdensome taxes were laid on personal property and polls; the holders of large estates were exempt, and the poorer people afflicted. . . . The biennial election of burgesses was abolished, so that the existing assembly continued indefinitely in power. . . . The tyranny outdied England; . . . then came open resistance.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 12, p. 119.

2444. GOVERNMENT, Paradoxical. Republic. It may, indeed, be confidently asserted that there never was that government called a republic, which was not ultimately ruled by a single will, and, therefore (however bold may seem the paradox), virtually and substantially a monarchy. The only difference between governments, with respect to the political freedom of the subject, consists in the greater or the smaller number of restraints by which the regulating will is controlled.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 6, p. 216.

2445. GOVERNMENT, Patriotic. Cleomenes. He began by the judicious measure of attaching the army to his interest, securing the confidence and allegiance of all the principal officers, and dextrously removing from command such as he judged to be unfriendly to the revolutionary design. Several of the richer citizens, and even some of the Ephori, from whom he expected opposition, were on various pretences banished or put to death. Trusting to the ready co-operation of the lower orders, he then assembled the people, and detailing the great benefits to be expected from a complete change of system, proclaimed the abolition of all the debts, and beginning by divesting himself of the whole of his property, made a new partition of the lands of the republic, and restored the ancient plan of education, the institution of the public tables, and, in a word, as nearly as possible, the long-forgotten regimen of Lycurgus. Cleomenes was hailed the second founder and father of his country, and Greece resounded with his praise.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 5, p. 209.

2446. GOVERNMENT, Powerless. Colony of Virginia. The burgesses had many privileges, but very little power. They might discuss the affairs of the colony, but could not control them; pass laws, but could not enforce them; declare their rights, but could not secure them. . . . No law was binding until ratified by the company in England. Only one great benefit was gained—the freedom of debate. Wherever that is recognized, liberty must soon follow.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 11, p. 110.

2447. GOVERNMENT, Provisional. Flight of James II. The peers repaired to Guildhall, and were received there with all honor by the magistracy of the city. In strictness of law, they were no better entitled than any other set of persons to assume the executive administration. But it was necessary to the public safety that there should be a provisional government, and the eyes of men naturally turned to the hereditary magnates of the realm. The extremity of the danger drew Sancroft forth from his palace. He took the chair; and under his presidency the new Archbishop of York, five bishops, and twenty-two temporal lords determined to draw up, subscribe, and publish a declaration. [They took the responsibility of temporarily conducting the government.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 511.

2448. GOVERNMENT, Reaction in. George III. A.D. 1766. [The Stamp Act was repealed by Parliament.] The king, who regarded the repeal of the Stamp Act as "a fatal compliance," which had forever "wounded the majesty" of England, and "planted thorns" under his pillow, preferred the hazard of losing the colonies to tempering the British claim of absolute authority. . . . "The coming hour" was foretold "when the British Augustus would grieve for the obscuring of the glories of his reign by the loss, not of a province, but of an empire more extensive than that of Rome; not of three legions, but of whole nations." No party in England could prevent an instantaneous reaction.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 25.

2449. GOVERNMENT, Restraints of. Flight of James II. Legitimate authority there was none. All those evil passions which it is the office of government to restrain, and which the best governments restrain but imperfectly, were on a sudden emancipated from control; avarice, licentiousness, revenge, the hatred of sect to sect, the hatred of nation to nation. On such occasions it will ever be found that the human vermin which, neglected by ministers of State and ministers of religion, barbarous in the midst of civilization, heathen in the midst of Christianity, burrows, among all physical and all moral pollution, in the cellars and garrets of great cities, will at once rise into a terrible importance. So it was now in London.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 514.

2450. GOVERNMENT revolutionized. Roman. The creation of the Tribunes of the people is the era of a change in the Roman constitution. The Valerian law had given a severe blow to the aristocracy, or party of the patricians; and the creation of popular magistrates with such high powers had now plainly converted the government into a democracy. . . . But the immediate cause of things coming to an open rupture was, as we have seen, the intolerable burden of the debts owing by the poor to the rich. This grievance became at length so general, from the frequency of the military campaigns, in which every soldier was obliged to serve at his own charges, and from the ravages committed on the lands by the hostile armies, which reduced the poorer sort entirely to beggary, that the plebeians began to look upon their order as born to a state of hereditary servitude. Hence that desperate measure of abandoning the city and encamping in arms upon the Mons Sacer. All that the people at this time desired was not power, but a relief from oppression and cruelty. And had this just claim been readily listened to, and a relief granted to them, if not by an entire abolition of the debts, at least by repressing the enormous usury, and taking away the inhuman rights of slavery and of corporal punishment, this people would, in all probability, have cheerfully returned to order and submission, and the Roman constitution might long have remained, what we have seen it was at first, aristocratical. But a torrent imprudently resisted will in time acquire that impetuous force which carries everything before it. The patricians, sensible that they had pushed matters to a most alarming extreme, and now thoroughly intimidated, were obliged to grant the demand of creating popular magistrates.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 3, p. 316.

2451. GOVERNMENT, Ridiculous. Hereditary Monarchy. Of the various forms of government which have prevailed in the world, an hereditary monarchy seems to present the fairest scope for ridicule. Is it possible to relate without an indignant smile that, on the father's decease, the property of a nation, like that of a drove of oxen, descends to his infant son, as yet unknown to mankind and to himself; and that the bravest warriors and the wisest statesmen, relinquishing their natural right to empire, approach the royal cradle with bended knees and protestations of inviolable fidelity?—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 7, p. 18.

2452. GOVERNMENT, Rights of. New York Colony. [New York had been reconquered from the Dutch, and Sir Edmund Andros appointed governor.] The principles of arbitrary government were openly avowed. Taxes were levied without authority of law, and the appeals and protests of the people were treated with derision. The clamor for a popular assembly had been so great that Andros was on the point of yielding. . . . The Duke [of York wrote] . . . popular assemblies were seditious and dangerous; that they only fostered discontent and disturbed the peace of the government; and, finally, that he did not see any use of them.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 20, p. 174.

2453. GOVERNMENT, Ruinous. Roman. The agriculture of the Roman provinces was insensibly ruined, and, in the progress of despotism, which tends to disappoint its own purpose, the emperors were obliged to derive some merit from the forgiveness of debts or the remission of tributes, which their subjects were utterly incapable of paying. According to the new division of Italy, the fertile and happy province of Campania, the scene of the early victories and of the delicious retirements of the citizens of Rome, extended between the sea and the Apennine from the Tiber to the Silarus. Within sixty years after the death of Constantine, and on the evidence of an actual survey, an exemption was granted in favor of 330,000 English acres of desert and uncultivated land, which amounted to one eighth of the whole surface of the province. As the footsteps of the barbarians had not yet been seen in Italy, the cause of this amazing desolation, which is recorded in the laws, can be ascribed only to the administration of the Roman emperors.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 17, p. 144.

2454. GOVERNMENT, Scriptural. New Haven Colony. The first year there was no government except a simple covenant, into which the settlers entered, that all would be obedient to the rules of Scripture. In June, 1639, the leading men of New Haven held a convention in a barn and formally adopted the Bible as the constitution of the State. Everything was conformed to the religious standard. The government was called the House of Wisdom, of which . . . [seven men] were the seven pillars. None but church-members were admitted to the rights of citizenship.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 21, p. 188.

2455. GOVERNMENT, Spirit of. Honor—Fear—Virtue. The author of the "Spirit of Laws" [Dr. Adam Ferguson], a work which must ever be regarded as the production of a most enlightened mind, has built a great deal of plausible and ingenious reasoning on this general idea, that the three distinct forms of government, the monarchical, the despotic, and the republican, are influenced by three separate principles, upon which the whole system in each form is constructed, and on which it must depend for its support. "The principle of the monarchical form," says Montesquieu, "is honor; of the despotical, fear; and of the republican, virtue." a position which, if true, would at once determine to which of the three forms the preference ought to be given in speculating on their comparative degrees of merit.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 6, p. 218.

2456. GOVERNMENT, Strife in. English Barons. For the first and last time in her history England was in the hands of the baronage, and their outrages showed from what horrors the stern rule of the Norman kings had saved her. Castles sprang up everywhere. "They filled the land with castles," says the terrible annalist of the time. "They greatly oppressed the wretched people by making them work at these castles, and when they were finished they filled them with devils and armed men." In each of these robber-holds a petty tyrant ruled like a king. The strife for the crown had broken into a medley of feuds between baron and baron, for none could brook an equal or a superior in his fellow. "They fought among themselves with deadly hatred, they spoiled the fairest lands with fire and rapine; in what had been the most fertile of counties they destroyed almost all the provision of bread." For, fight as they might with one another, all were at one in the plunder of the land. Towns were put to ransom. Villages were sacked and burned. All who were deemed to have goods, whether men or women, were carried off and flung into dungeons and tortured till they yielded up their wealth. No ghastlier picture of a nation's misery has ever been painted. . . . "They hanged up men by their feet and smoked them with foul smoke. Some were hanged up by their thumbs, others by the head, and burning things were hung on to their feet. They put knotted strings about men's heads, and writhed them till they went to the brain. They put men into prisons where adders and snakes and toads were crawling, and so they tormented them. Some they put into a chest, short and narrow, and not deep, and that had sharp stones within, and forced men therein so that they broke all their limbs."—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 129.

2457. GOVERNMENT, A strong. Cromwell's. While he lived his power stood firm, an object of mingled aversion, admiration, and dread to his subjects. Few, indeed, loved his government; but those who hated it most hated it less than they feared it. Had it been a worse government, it might, perhaps, have been overthrown in spite of all its strength. Had it been a weaker government, it would certainly have been overthrown in spite of all its merits. But it had moderation enough to abstain from those oppressions which drive men mad; and it had a force and energy which none but men driven mad by oppression would venture to encounter.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 130.

2458. GOVERNMENT, Succession in. American Indians. The succession depended on birth, and was inherited through the female line. Even among the Narragansetts, the colleague of Canonicus was his nephew. This rule of descent, which sprung from the general licentiousness, and was known throughout various families of tribes, was widely observed.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

2459. GOVERNMENT, Trifles in. Time of the Revolution. During twenty years the chief employment of busy and ingenious men had been to frame constitutions with first magistrates, without first magistrates, with hereditary senates, with senates appointed by lot, with annual senates, with perpetual senates. In these plans nothing was omitted. All the detail, all the nomenclature, all the ceremonial of the imaginary government was fully set forth, Polemarchs and Phylarchs, Tribes and Galaxies, the Lord Archon and the Lord Strategus; which ballot-boxes were to be green and which red; which balls were to be of gold and which of silver; which magistrates were to wear hats and which black velvet caps with peaks; how the mace was to be carried, and when the heralds were to uncover—these and a hundred more such trifles were gravely considered and arranged by men of no common capacity and learning.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 378.

2460. GOVERNMENT, Unfitted for. Richard I. Richard I., surnamed Cœur de Lion, had all those qualities which gain the admiration of a romantic age, but few that could conduce to the happiness of his subjects or command the approbation of posterity. The whole of his reign was a tale of romance, intrepid valor, imprudence, and misfortune. All Europe was at that time infected with the enthusiasm of the holy wars, and Richard, immediately upon his accession, prepared to signalize himself in an expedition to Palestine, which his conscience, or rather his romantic turn of mind, represented to him as the only field of real glory for a Christian prince. Little regardful of the interests of his people, he raised an immense sum of money, by all the various methods of arbitrary enforcement, and forming a league with Philip Augustus, King of France, who possessed somewhat of his own disposition, though with less generosity, the two sovereigns agreed to join their forces in an expedition against the infidels.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 8, p. 144.

2461. GOVERNMENT, Venal. Fourteenth Parliament. A.D. 1774. Excess had impoverished many even of the heirs of the largest estates, and lords as well as commoners offered themselves at market; so that "if America," said [Benjamin] Franklin, "would save for three or four years the money she spends in the fashions and fineries and fopperies of this country, she might buy the whole Parliament, ministry and all. [This was the Parliament to which the Continental Congress appealed.]—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 16.

2462. GOVERNMENT, Weakness of. Roman. Cicero . . . told Catiline that under the powers which the Senate had conferred on him he might order his instant execution. He detailed Catiline's past enormities, which he had forgotten when he sought his friendship, and he ended in bidding him leave the city, go and join Manlius and his army. Never had Cicero been greater, and never did oratory end in a more absurd conclusion. He dared not arrest Catiline. He confessed that he dared not. There was not a doubt that Catiline was meditating a revolution—but a revolution was precisely what half the world was wishing for: Rightly read, those sounding paragraphs, those moral denunciations, those appeals to history and patriotic sentiment, were the funeral knell of the Roman Commonwealth.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 11.

2463. GRADUATION, Dishonorable. Hugh Miller. He was becoming a big, wild, insubordinate boy. . . . After a severe fight and wrestling-match with his schoolmaster, he left school [smarting under his defeat].—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 91.

2464. GRATITUDE expressed. Charles II. Richard Penderel, Charles introduced to his Court, saying, "The simplest rustic who serves his sovereign in the time of need to the utmost extent of his ability is as deserving of our commendation as the victorious leader of thousands. Friend Richard," continued the king, "I am glad to see thee; thou wert my preserver and conductor, the bright star that showed me to my Bethlehem, for which kindness I will engrave thy memory on the tablet of a faithful heart." Turning to the lords, the king said, "My lords, I pray you respect this good man for my sake. Master Richard, be bold and tell these lords what passed among us when I had quitted the oak at Boscobel to reach Pit Leason." [When Charles had been defeated he was aided in making his escape to France by Penderel.]—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 13, p. 174.

2465. ———. Samuel Johnson. Amid this cold obscurity, there was one brilliant circumstance to cheer him—he was well acquainted with Mr. Henry Hervey. . . . Not long before his death . . . he described his early friend, "Harry Hervey," thus : "He was a vicious man, but very kind to me. If you call a dog Hervey I will love him."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 21.

2466. GRATITUDE, Improvident. Oliver Goldsmith. He intended to proceed to Paris and pursue his studies [medical] there, and was furnished by his friend with money for the journey. Unluckily, he rambled into the garden of a florist just before quitting Leyden. The tulip mania was still prevalent in Holland, and some species of that splendid flower brought immense prices. In wandering through the garden Goldsmith recollected that his Uncle Contarine was a tulip-fancier. The thought suddenly struck him that here was an opportunity of testifying, in a delicate manner, his sense of that generous uncle's past kindnesses. In an instant his hand was in his pocket ; a number of choice and costly tulip-roots were purchased and packed up for Mr. Contarine ; and it was not until he had paid for them that he bethought himself that he had spent all the money borrowed for his travelling expenses. Too proud, however, to give up his journey, and too shamefaced to make another appeal to his friend's liberality, he determined to travel on foot, and depend upon chance and good-luck for the means of getting forward ; and it is said that he actually set off on a tour of the Continent, in February, 1755, with but one spare shirt, a flute, and a single guinea.—IRVING'S GOLD-SMITH, ch. 4, p. 47.

2467. GRAVE, Possession of. Harold II. [When William of Normandy invaded England Harold II., King of the Anglo-Saxons, met Tostig, his own brother, who had come to aid William.] Harold would have negotiated with his brother ; but when Tostig asked what the king of Norway should have, the Saxon answered, "Seven feet of earth for a grave." A.D. 1066.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 13, p. 180.

2468. GRAVITY by Discipline. Constantinus. From Milan to Rome . . . he approached within forty miles of the city ; the march of a prince who had never vanquished a foreign enemy assumed the appearance of a triumphal procession. His splendid train was composed of all the ministers of luxury ; but in a time of profound peace he was encompassed by the glittering arms of the numerous squadrons of his guards and cuirassiers. . . . Constantius sat alone in a lofty car, resplendent with gold and precious gems ; and except when he bowed his head to pass under the gates of the cities, he affected a stately demeanor of inflexible, and, as it might seem, of insensible gravity. The severe discipline of the Persian youth had been introduced by the eunuchs into the Imperial palace ; and such were the habits of patience which they had inculcated, that during a slow and sultry march he was never seen to move his hand toward his face, or to turn his eyes either to the right or to the left.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 19, p. 217.

2469. GREATNESS, Blot on. Dryden. Dryden was poor and impatient of poverty. He knew little and cared little about religion. If any sentiment was deeply fixed in him, that sentiment was an aversion to priests of all persuasions. . . . Finding that if he continued to call himself a Protestant his services would be overlooked, he declared himself a papist. The king's [James II.] parsimony instantly relaxed. Dryden was gratified with a pension of £100 a year, and was employed to defend his new religion both in prose and in verse. . . . There will always be a strong presumption against the sincerity of a conversion by which the convert is a direct gainer.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 188.

2470. GREATNESS burdensome. Oliver Cromwell. [When Cromwell was in the height of his success as Protector of England, he was apprehensive for the safety of his life. His aged mother at the sound of a musket would often be afraid her son was shot, and could not be satisfied unless she saw him once a day at least. In a burst of disappointment amid the contentions around him he said, "I had rather keep a flock of sheep." ]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 12, p. 188.

2471. GREATNESS, Buried. Alexander the Great. Finding the tomb of Cyrus broken open, he put the author of that sacrilege to death, though a native of Pella, and a person of some distinction. His name was Polymachus. After he had read the epitaph, which was in the Persian language, he ordered it to be inscribed also in Greek. It was as follows : "O MAN ! WHOSOEVER THOU ART, AND WHENSOEVER THOU COMEST (FOR COME I KNOW THOU WILT), I AM CYRUS, THE FOUNDER OF THE PERSIAN EMPIRE ; ENVY ME NOT THE LITTLE EARTH THAT COVERS MY BODY." Alexander was much affected at these words, which placed before him in so strong a light the uncertainty and vicissitude of things.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

2472. GREATNESS by Contrast. Charlemagne. The appellation of great has been often bestowed, and sometimes deserved ; but Charlemagne is the only prince in whose favor the title has been indissolubly blended with the name. That name, with the addition of saint, is inserted in the Roman calendar ; and the saint, by a rare felicity, is crowned with the praises of the historians and philosophers of an enlightened age. His real merit is doubtless enhanced by the barbarism of the nation and the times from which he emerged ; but the apparent magnitude of an object is likewise enlarged by an unequal comparison ; and the ruins of Palmyra derive a casual splendor from the nakedness of the surrounding desert.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39, p. 44.

2473. GREATNESS, Downfall of. Columbus. [Bobadilla had put him in irons on the accusation of adventurers.] So violently had he been treated, and so savage were the passions let loose against him, that he feared he should be sacrificed without an opportunity of being heard, and his name go down sullied and dishonored to posterity. When he beheld the officer enter with the guard, he thought it was to conduct him to the scaffold. "Villejo," said he, mournfully, "whither are you taking me ?" "To the ship, your Excellency, to embark," replied the other. "To embark !" repeated the admiral, earnestly ; "Villejo, do you speak the truth ?" "By the life of your Excellency," replied the honest officer, "it is true !" With these words the admiral was comforted, and felt as one restored from death to life. Nothing can be more touching and expressive than this little colloquy.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 13, ch. 7.

2474. GREATNESS, Dream of. Cromwell. Oliver himself "often averred, when he was at the height of his glory," that, on a certain night, in his childhood, he "saw a gigantic figure, which came and opened the curtains of his bed, and told him that he should be the greatest person in the kingdom, but did not mention the word king; and," continues the reverend narrator, "though he was told of the folly as well as wickedness of such an assertion, he persisted in it; for which he was flogged by Dr. Beard, at the particular desire of his father; notwithstanding which, he would sometimes repeat it to his Uncle Stewart, who told him it was traitorous to relate it.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 2, p. 31.

2475. GREATNESS, End of. Saladin. The Turks and Christians in Palestine were, in the mean time, mutually exterminating and destroying each other, when a new character appeared on the stage, who, in all respects, was one of the greatest men who have adorned the annals of the world; this was Saladin, the nephew of Noureddin, the sultan of Egypt. In a very short space of time he had overrun Syria, Arabia, Persia, and Mesopotamia, and now formed the design of the conquest of Jerusalem, then under the dominion of the Christian prince, Guy of Lusignan. . . . [He was defeated by Richard the Lion.] Soon after died the illustrious Saladin, leaving behind him the character not only of one of the most heroic, but of one of the best of princes. In his last illness, instead of the imperial ensigns which used to adorn the gates of his palace, he ordered a winding-sheet to be hung up, while a slave proclaimed, with a loud voice, "This is all that Saladin, the conqueror of the East, has obtained by his victories!" He bequeathed by his last will a large sum of money to be distributed equally among the poor, whether they were Mohammedans, Christians, or Jews, intending, as Voltaire well remarks, to teach, by his bequest, that all men are brethren, and that when we assist them we ought not to inquire what they believe, but what they feel. This great prince died in the year 1195.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 9, p. 162.

2476. GREATNESS, Fictitious. Alfonso d'Albuquerque. Three hundred and fifty years ago it was as familiar and famous as the names of Napoleon, Wellington, and Washington now are. He was generally spoken of as the great Albuquerque; sometimes as the "Mars of Portugal;" and to this day the Portuguese regard him as the greatest man of their greatest age. He was certainly one of the most successful of conquerors, and excelled all the commanders of his time, except Pizarro and Cortez, in battering down other people's towns, and carrying off their gold, silver, and diamonds. On one occasion, we are told, his booty amounted to a sum equal, in greenbacks to-day, to $100,000,000; but no historian has taken the trouble to inform us what offence the people of Malacca had committed, that they should be subjected to this heavy fine. At that day all Christians appear to have been fully convinced that the heathen had no rights which Christians were bound to respect.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 311.

2477. GREATNESS of Goodness. Cosmo de' Medici. Perhaps there never was a family which deserved better of mankind than that of the Medici. Cosmo de' Medici, who was born in the year 1389, lived as a private citizen of Florence, without courting rank or titles, though the wealth which he had acquired by commerce might have raised him to a level with the most powerful of the European princes. The use he made of his riches was to relieve the poor, to perform the most splendid acts of public munificence, to embellish and to refine his country, and to promote the cultivation of the sciences and fine arts, by inviting to Florence from every quarter men eminent for their learning and talents. He died distinguished by no diadems nor splendid epithets of honor, but known by that most honorable of human titles, the Father of his Country.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 13, p. 214.

2478. GREATNESS impossible. France under Charles IX. The colony of the Huguenots at the south sprung from private enterprise; a government which could devise the massacre of St. Bartholomew was neither worthy nor able to found new States.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., ch. 1.

2479. GREATNESS, Multiplex. Julius Caesar. Lord Byron wrote: "It is possible to be a very great man, and to be still very inferior to Julius Caesar, the most complete character, so Lord Bacon thought, of all antiquity. Nature seems incapable of such extraordinary combinations as composed his versatile capacity, which was the wonder even of the Romans themselves. The first general; the only triumphant politician; inferior to none in point of eloquence; comparable to any in the attainments of wisdom, in an age made up of the greatest commanders, statesmen, orators, and philosophers, that ever appeared in the world; an author who composed a perfect specimen of military annals in his travelling carriage; at one time in a controversy with Cato, at another writing a treatise on punning, and collecting a set of good sayings; fighting and making love at the same moment, and willing to abandon both his empire and his mistress for a sight of the fountains of the Nile. Such did Julius Caesar appear to his contemporaries, and to those of the subsequent ages who were the most inclined to deplore and execrate his fate, genius."—NOTE IN GIBBON, vol. 1.

2480. GREATNESS, Patriotic. Cromwell. Some have compared him with Napoleon—Napoleon I.—to his disadvantage. But we shall soon see the justice of that criticism which finds the greatness of Napoleon rather in that he did his work on stilts; he performed his work in a large, ambitious manner, and strode to and fro in self-conscious exaggeration before the eyes of Europe. Cromwell performed his work on our own island, but he did not leave it. He humbled the proud empires of Europe by a glance. It took battles to raise himself to his place of Protector, but he became the Dictator of Europe by the magnetism of a great intelligence. From his council-chamber in Whitehall he dictated his own terms. Always let it be remembered that Napoleon I., in order to retain his power, directed all the energies of his country away from any, even the slightest, attempt at domestic reform of his own land, where reforms of every kind were so much needed; and he decimated the unhappy people of his own land by embroiling them in wars with every nation in Europe; he kindled the conflagrations of martial glory, and carried everywhere the banners and eagles of conquest, in order that he might dazzle by the fame of his great military dictatorship. To our indignant humanity Napoleon looks like a poor, self-exaggerating child, contrasted with the farmer of St. Ives. Macaulay well points out how greatly it would have been to the interests of Cromwell's ambition to have plunged his country into a great European war, and how fertile were the occasions for such a war! And had he constituted himself the armed as he was the peaceful protector of Protestantism in Europe, like another Gustavus Adolphus, how prompt at his call for such a cause would have leaped up that mighty army of which he was the chief, and which had regarded his voice, through so many well-fought fields, as the very voice of the Lord of Hosts speaking to men. He had no such ambition; only to serve his country as best he could, and Protestantism always, in all peaceful sincerity.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 14, p. 185.

2481. GREATNESS, Proof of. Robert Burns. Great men, great events, great epochs, it has been said, grow as we recede from them; and the rate at which they grow in the estimation of men is in some sort a measure of their greatness. Tried by this standard, Burns must be great indeed; for during the eighty years that have passed since his death men's interest in the man himself and their estimate of his genius have been steadily increasing. Each decade since he died has produced at least two biographies of him.—SHAIRP'S BURNS, ch. 1.

2482. GREATNESS recognized. Richelieu. Although it was by no means intended to bestow on Richelieu the first place in the administration, he had not been six months in office before his supremacy was fully understood and recognized by the king, the council, the court, and the whole nation. Every department of the public service soon felt the irresistible energy of his character, and his extraordinary capacity for the great task of government.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 19, § 5.

2483. GREATNESS, Threefold. Francis I. "Three of this monarch's deeds," says Marshal Tavannes, "have justly procured for him the title of Great: the victory of Marignano, the restoration of letters, and his single-handed resistance to the combined powers of Europe."—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 14, § 16.

2484. GREATNESS with Vice. Hannibal. His boldness in undertaking a perilous enterprise was equalled by his prudence in conducting it. His strength, neither of body nor mind, was ever seen to yield to the severest labor. Insensible alike to heat or cold, his food and drink were limited to the necessities of nature, never indulged to gratification. All hours of the day or night were to him alike, whether for duty or repose; what could be spared from the former was given to the latter; no appliances were wanted—no soft couch or silent retirement. Often was he seen, amid the bustle of a military post, snatching a brief repose on the bare ground, his cloak his only covering. He affected no superiority of dress; valuing himself only on his arms and on his horses; himself the hardest foot-soldier and the most gallant horseman; the first to rush into combat, the last to quit the field. Yet were these high qualities counteracted by enormous vices, by the most inhuman cruelty, by worse than Punic perfidy, by the utter disregard of truth and of everything sacred—owning no fear of heaven, and regardless alike of promises and oaths.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 9, p. 272.

2485. GREATNESS by Wisdom. Alexander. Above twenty other cities bearing the name of Alexandria were reared in the course of Alexander's various expeditions. It is such works as these which justly entitle the Macedonian to the epithet of Great. By the cities which he built, by rearing in the midst of deserts those nurseries of population and of industry, he repaired the waste and havoc of his conquests. Without those monuments of his real glory, posterity might have agreed in bestowing on him an epithet synonymous to that by which he is yet known among the bramins of India—the mighty Murderer.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4, p. 186.

2486. GRIEF, Conjugal. Thomas Jefferson. One of her children has given a most affecting account of her last moments, and of Jefferson's grief at her death. "For four months," she says, "he was never out of calling; when not at her bedside, he was writing in a small room which opened close at the head of her bed. A moment before the closing scene he was led from the room almost in a state of insensibility by his sister, who, with great difficulty, got him into his library, where he fainted, and remained so long insensible that they feared he never would revive. The scene that followed I did not witness; but the violence of his emotion, when almost by stealth I entered his room at night, to this day I dare not trust myself to describe. He kept his room three weeks, and I was never a moment from his side. He walked almost incessantly, night and day, only lying down occasionally, when nature was completely exhausted, on a pallet that had been brought in during his long fainting fit. When at last he left his room, he rode out, and from that time he was incessantly on horseback, rambling about the mountain in the least frequented roads, and just as often through the woods."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 225.

2487. GRIEF, Fatal. Artaxerxes. Artaxerxes soon after died of a broken heart. Darius, his eldest son, together with fifty of his natural brothers, had conspired against their father, but their designs were defeated, and they were all put to death. Ochus, the third of his lawful sons, succeeded him. This monster had made his way to the throne by murdering his elder brother, and to secure his possession he murdered all that remained of his kindred.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3, p. 168.

2488. GRIEF, Public. Jerusalem taken. In 1187 Jerusalem was surrendered to Saladin. Then went forth deep lamentation throughout Europe. A pope died of grief. A king wore sackcloth. Other sovereigns trembled for the safety of their own possessions.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 21, p. 304.

2489. GROVES, Worship in. Ancients. The only temples in Germany were dark and ancient groves, consecrated by the reverence of succeeding generations. Their secret gloom, the imagined residence of an invisible power, by presenting no distinct object of fear or worship, impressed the mind with a still deeper sense of religious horror; and the priests, rude and illiterate as they were, had been taught by experience the use of every artifice that could preserve and fortify impressions so well suited to their own interest.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 270.

2490. GRUMBLING over Failures. Nelson. [He missed the French fleet carrying Bonaparte to Egypt; when he returned to Sicily to returnish, there was great complaint in England.] Journalists talked of naval mismanagement and of worn-out captains who were hanging about the Admiralty asking for employ; marvelled at the rashness of Lord St. Vincent [admiral] in sending so young a commander upon so great an enterprise.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 20, p. 355.

2491. GUARD, Insignificant. Cortez. Velasquez, the governor of Cuba, jealous of that success which he was informed had attended the Spanish arms in Mexico, sent an army of 800 men to supersede Cortez, and to assume the government of the country. This intrepid man, leaving his conquests to be secured by fourscore of his soldiers, attacked with the rest of his troops the army of Velasquez, defeated them, and forced them to submit to his command as their general. At his return to Mexico he found his Spaniards besieged in their quarters. The Mexicans had attempted to set at liberty their captive monarch, and on the sight of the Spanish army pouring down upon them in immense numbers they attacked them with the most desperate fury. A horrible carnage ensued, which Montezuma himself endeavored to put a stop to by offering himself a mediator between the Spaniards and the Americans. The pusillanimity of this proposal struck his own subjects with the highest indignation, and an enraged Mexican pierced him to the heart with a javelin.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 21, p. 310.

2492. GUIDE, The unseen. Constantine's. Writers describe the nocturnal vision which appeared to the fancy of Constantine as he slept within the walls of Byzantium. The tutelary genius of the city, a venerable matron sinking under the weight of years and infirmities, was suddenly transformed into a blooming maid whom his own hands adorned with all the symbols of Imperial greatness. The monarch awoke, interpreted the auspicious omen, and obeyed, without hesitation, the will of Heaven. The day which gave birth to a city or colony was celebrated by the Romans with such ceremonies as had been ordained by a generous superstition; and though Constantine might omit some rites which savored too strongly of their Pagan origin, yet he was anxious to leave a deep impression of hope and respect on the minds of the spectators. On foot, with a lance in his hand, the emperor himself led the solemn procession, and directed the line, which was traced as the boundary of the destined capital, till the growing circumference was observed with astonishment by the assistants, who at length ventured to observe that he had already exceeded the most ample measure of a great city. "I shall still advance," replied Constantine, "till He, the invisible guide who marches before me, thinks proper to stop." Without presuming to investigate the nature or motives of this extraordinary conductor, we shall content ourselves with the more humble task of describing the extent and limits of Constantinople.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 17, p. 95.

2493. GUIDES, Blind. Biblical. A learned Oriental, having been to visit the library of a French convent, writes thus to his friend in Persia concerning what had passed: "Father," said I to the librarian, "what are these huge volumes which fill the whole side of the library?" "These," said he, "are the interpreters of the Scriptures." "There is a prodigious number of them," replied I; "the Scriptures must have been very dark formerly, and be very clear at present. Do there remain still any doubts? Are there now any points contested?" "Are there!" answered he with surprise—"are there! There are almost as many as there are lines." "You astonish me," said I; "what then have all these authors been doing?" "These authors," returned he, "never searched the Scriptures for what ought to be believed, but for what they did believe themselves. They did not consider them as a book wherein were contained the doctrines which they ought to receive, but as a work which might be made to authorize their own ideas."

2494. GUILDS, Establishment of. Twelfth Century. In all of the trading communities there were stringent regulations for buying and selling, enforced by the universal machinery of guilds. This organization was as complete as that of the military system of feudality; and as the lord controlled his tenant and received his fealty, the tenant commanded his socman, and the socman his serf, so the chief of a guild ruled over his company, and his company over their apprentices, and their apprentices over their servants.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 22, p. 322.

2495. GUILT, Division of. Assassins. [By the enemies of Mahomet.] His death was resolved, and they agreed that a sword from each tribe should be buried in his heart, to divide the guilt of his blood and baffle the vengeance of the Hashemites. An angel or a spy revealed their conspiracy; and flight was the only resource of Mahomet. At the dead of night, accompanied by his friend Abubeker, he silently escaped from his house; the assassins watched at the door, but they were deceived by the figure of Ali, who reposed on the bed, and was covered with the green vestment of the apostle.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 124.

2496. GUILT, Evidence of. Sudden Death. [In 1052 Edward (III.) the Confessor was banqueting at Windsor.] At the king's banquet sat Godwin [a powerful Saxon noble], in the house where his daughter was again the queen. Edward in a dispute hinted that the earl was accessory to the death of his brother Alfred. He stood up to aver his innocence, and fell speechless to the earth. Other writers say that he invoked Heaven to choke him by the bread which he was about to swallow if that guilt was his; and that he was choked.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 13, p. 171.

2497. HABIT, Power of. *Civilization. [The early Greeks were cannibals.] Necessity only, in the most savage nations, could at first get the better of the strongest instinct; but that once overcome, a habit is soon acquired, and will not be laid aside as long as subsistence remains in any degree precarious.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book I, ch. 7, p. 60.

2498. HABITS, Personal. *John Milton. His habit in early life had been to study late into the night. After he lost his sight he changed his hours, and retired to rest at nine. In summer he rose at four, in winter at five, and began the day with having the Hebrew Scriptures read to him. "Then he contemplated. At seven his man came to him again, and then read to him and wrote till dinner. The writing was as much as the reading" (Aubrey). Then he took exercise, either walking in the garden or swinging in a machine. His only recreation, besides conversation, was music. He played the organ and the bass-viol, the organ most. Sometimes he would sing himself, or get his wife to sing to him, though she had, he said, no ear, yet a good voice. Then he went up to his study to be read to till six. After six his friends were admitted to visit him, and would sit with him till eight. At eight he went down to supper, usually olives or some light thing. He was very abstemious in his diet, having to contend with a gouty diathesis. He was not fastidious in his choice of meats, but content with anything that was in season, or easy to be procured. After supping thus sparingly, he smoked a pipe of tobacco, drank a glass of water, and then retired to bed. He was sparing in his use of wine. His Samson, who in this as in other things is Milton himself, allays his thirst "from the clear milky juice."—PATTISON'S MILTON, ch. 12.

2499. HAIR changed. *Early Gray. [Timour the Tartar is said to have been very beautiful in person during his early life.] One thing alone, according to the Tartar historians, contrasted with this youthfulness and grace of his countenance: it is the hair, which turned gray upon his head almost in the cradle. This phenomenon, which recalled, say his painters, the gray hair of the popular hero of the Persians, Sam, of whom the exploits are celebrated in the Shahnameh, had contributed to draw upon the young Timour the attention and respect of the Tartars. They saw in it a sign of precocious maturity, indicated by heaven in that crown of wisdom on the brow of a boy. They conceived it the augury of a consummate intellect, with a heroic heart. He prided himself on this disgrace of nature as a privilege of heaven. These white hairs on the cheeks of twenty set off the lustre of his complexion, and impressed a strange, but rather agreeable than ungraceful, character upon his beauty.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 305.

2500. HAIR, Manly. *Cutting. As it was then the custom for such as had arrived at man's estate to go to Delphi to offer the first-fruits of their hair to Apollo, Theseus, the legendary founder of Attica, went thither, and the place where this ceremony is performed, from him, is said to be yet called Thesea. He shaved, however, only the fore part of his head, as Homer tells us the Abantes did; and this kind of tonsure, on his account, was called Theseis. The Abantes first cut their hair in this manner, not in imitation of the Arabians, as some imagine, nor yet of the Mysians, but because they were a warlike people, who loved close fighting, and were more expert in it than any other nation. That they might not, therefore, give advantage to their enemies by their hair, they took care to cut it off. And we are informed that Alexander of Macedon, having made the same observation, ordered his Macedonian troops to cut off their beards, these being a ready handle in battle.—PLUTARCH'S LIVES.

2501. HAIR, Pride in. *Roman Emperor Julian. His body was covered with hair; the use of the razor was confined to his head alone; and [he] celebrates, with visible complacency, the shaggy and populous beard, which he fondly cherished, after the example of the philosophers of Greece. Had Julian consulted the simple dictates of reason, the first magistrate of the Romans would have scorned the affectation of Diogenes, as well as that of Darius.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 22, p. 398.

2503. HAIR ridiculed. *"Roundhead." Of the origin of the latter, Mrs. Hutchinson gives the following account: "When Puritanism grew into a faction, the zealots distinguished themselves, both men and women, by several affections of habit, looks, and words, which, had it been a real declension of vanity, and embracing of sobriety in all those things, had been most commendable in them. . . . Among other affected habits, few of the Puritans, what degree soever they were of, wore their hair long enough to cover their ears; and the ministers and many others cut it close round their heads, with so many little peaks, as was something ridiculous to behold. From this custom of wearing their hair, that name of 'Roundhead' became the scornful term given to the whole Parliament party, whose army indeed marched out so, but as if they had been sent out only till their hair was grown. Two or three years afterward, however," she continues (the custom, it may be presumed, having declined), "any stranger that had seen them would have inquired the reason of that name."—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 6, p. 98.

2504. HAIR, Uncombed. *Harald II. [Saxon King of England.] Legend told how one of its many rulers, Harald of Westfold, sent his men to bring him Gytha of Hordaland, a girl he had chosen for wife, and how Gytha sent his men back again with taunts at his petty realm. The taunts went home, and Harald vowed never to clip or comb his hair till he had made all Norway his own. So every spring-tide came war and hosting, harrying and burning, till a great fight at Hafursford settled the matter, and Harald "Ugly-Head," as men called him while the strife lasted, was free to shear his locks again and became Harald "Fair-Hair."—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 77.

2505. HAIR, Use of. Spartans. They let their hair, therefore, grow from their youth, but took more particular care, when they expected an action, to have it well combed and shining, remembering a saying of Lycurgus, that "a large head of hair made the handsome more graceful and the ugly more terrible."—PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

2506. HALLUCINATION, Realistic. Martin Luther. In October, 1521, . . . he passed many a day in melancholy and depression of spirits. At such times he believed himself tormented of the Evil One. . . . [He relates:] "It was in the year 1521 that I was in Patmos at the Wartburg, alone in my little room, no one being permitted to come to me save two pages of honor, who brought me food and drink. They had brought me a bag of hazelnuts, of which I ate from time to time, and which I locked up in a chest. One evening on retiring I heard some one at the hazelnuts, cracking one after another with force against the rafters; then the noise approached my bed, but I cared little for that. After I had fallen asleep there begun such a tumult in the stairway, as if threescore barrels were being thrown down. I arose, went to the stairs, and cried out, 'Art thou here (meaning the Evil One)? So be it!' I then commended my soul to the Lord Jesus Christ, of whom it is said . . . 'Thou hast put all things under his feet,' and retired to rest. For this is the best method to expel him (the devil)—despising him and calling upon Christ. That he cannot endure." But finally, when Satan exceeded all bounds, as the legend records, Luther threw his inkstand at him, and he never returned again.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 10, p. 97.

2507. HANDS, Fortune in. Omar. Omar amnestied all the Arabs who, after the death of Mahomet, had hesitated in their faith. This amnesty and the report of his triumphs led thousands of Mussulmans to flock beneath his banners. Amr, chief of those insurgents, a warrior of colossal stature and an arm of iron, brought him 2000 combatants. "What pay dost thou ask?" said Omar to him, joking, "since thou must by thyself be worth several men." "A thousand dirhems for this," replied Amr, with his head upon his left side; "a thousand for this," added he, striking upon the right side; "and in fine, a thousand for this," continued he, striking upon his heart. "Very well," said Omar, smiling, "I assign thee three thousand dirhems." Then surveying him from the head to the feet and admiring his gigantic height: "Praise be to God, who has created Amr!" cried the Khalif. He sent him to join the army then forming on the banks of the Euphrates to attack Persia.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 168.

2508. HANDS, Hundred. Vanquished. Ægeon, a famous giant of antiquity, was the son of Titan and Terra. He is described as having possessed one hundred hands. He was vanquished by Jupiter and loaded with chains.—AM. CYCLOPEDIA, "ÆGEON."

2509. HAND-SHAKING, Weariness of. General Grant. [When abroad he was] asked if he did not tire of so much hand-shaking. "Yes," said he, "I . . . think hand-shaking a great nuisance, and it should be abolished. In 1865 it was awful with me; I thought I could hardly survive the task. It not only makes the right arm sore, but it shocks the whole system, and unfits a man from writing or attending to other duties. It demoralizes the entire nervous and muscular system."—TRAVELS OF GENERAL GRANT, p. 57.

2510. HANGING, Forecast of. Patriots. When the members were signing the Declaration [of Independence] Benjamin Harrison, of Virginia, an enormously corpulent man, looking at the slender, withered form of Elbridge Gerry, of Massachusetts, said: "Gerry, when the hanging comes, I shall have the advantage; you'll kick in the air half an hour after it is all over with me." It was about this time, too, that Franklin achieved one of his celebrated witticisms. "We must all hang together in this business," said one of the members. "Yes," said Franklin, "we must all hang together, or, most assuredly, we shall all hang separately."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 349.

2511. HANGING, Public. Samuel Johnson. He said to Sir William Scott: "The age is running mad after innovation; and all the business of the world is to be done in a new way; men are to be hanged in a new way; Tyburn itself is not safe from the fury of innovation." It having been argued that this was an improvement—"No, sir," said he, eagerly, "it is not an improvement; they object that the old method drew together a number of spectators. Sir, executions are intended to draw spectators. If they do not draw spectators, they don't answer their purpose. The old method was most satisfactory to all parties: the public was gratified by a procession, the criminal was supported by it. Why is all this to be swept away?"—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 488.

2512. HANGING a Remedy. Cromwell's. Terrible also was the contest of Clonmell, before which Cromwell sat down with the resolution of fighting and of conquest. Many persons were here taken, and among them the celebrated fighting Bishop of Ross, who was carried to a castle kept by his own forces, and there hanged before the walls, in sight of the garrison; which so discouraged them that they immediately surrendered to the Parliament's forces. This bishop was used to say, "There was no way of curing the English but by hanging them."—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 11, p. 143.

2513. HAPPINESS vs. Amusement. George Story. He sought happiness in floriculture and angling, in cards and in drinking, without success. He went to the Doncaster races, and says: "As I passed through the company, dejected and disappointed, it occurred to my mind, What is all this immense multitude assembled here for? To see a few horses gallop two or three times around the course as if the devil was in them and their riders! Certainly we are all mad, we are fit for Bedlam, if we imagine that the Almighty made us to seek happiness in such senseless amusements. I was ashamed and confounded, and determined never to be seen there any more." [He became a faithful minister.]—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 3, p. 246.

2514. HAPPINESS compared. Samuel Johnson. I mentioned Hume's notion, that all who are happy are equally happy : a little miss with a new gown at a dancing-school ball, a general at the head of a victorious army, and an orator, after having made an eloquent speech in a great assembly. JOHNSON. "Sir, that all who are happy are equally happy, is not true. A peasant and a philosopher may be equally satisfied, but not equally happy. Happiness consists in the multiplicity of agreeable consciousness. A peasant has not capacity for having equal happiness with a philosopher."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 141.

2515. HAPPINESS, Constructive. Samuel Johnson. Pound St. Paul's church into atoms, and consider any single atom ; it is, to be sure, good for nothing ; but put all these atoms together, and you have St. Paul's Church. So it is with human felicity, which is made up of many ingredients, each of which may be shown to be very insignificant.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 121.

2516. HAPPINESS, Domestic. Reign of James II. [The Duke of Monmouth was banished at the time of the coronation of James II., his rival for the throne of England.] The prospect which lay before Monmouth was not a bright one. There was no probability that he would be recalled from banishment. On the Continent his life could no longer be passed amid the splendor and festivity of a court. . . . He retired to Brussels, accompanied by Henrietta Wentworth, Baroness Wentworth, of Nettlested, a damsel of high rank and ample fortune, who loved him passionately, who had sacrificed for his sake her maiden honor and the hope of a splendid alliance, who had followed him into exile, and whom he believed to be his wife in the sight of Heaven. Under the soothing influence of female friendship his lacerated mind healed fast. He seemed to have found happiness in obscurity and repose, and to have forgotten that he had been the ornament of a splendid court and the head of a great party, that he had commanded armies, and that he had aspired to a throne.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 496.

2517. HAPPINESS, Receipt for. Plato's. The maxim of Plato is, that the man who would be truly happy should not study to enlarge his estate, but to contract his desires. For he who does not restrain his avarice must forever be poor.—PLUTARCH'S SERTORIUS.

2518. HAPPINESS in Simplicity. Quakers. When Peter, the great Russian reformer, attended in England a meeting of Quakers, the semi-barbarous philanthropist could not but exclaim, "How happy must be a community instituted on their principles !" "Beautiful !" said the philosophic Frederick of Prussia, when a hundred years later he read the account of the government of Pennsylvania ; "it is perfect, if it can endure."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 16.

him for two hours, Lord Whitworth in vain trying to put in a word.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 24, p. 420.

2520. HARSHIPS, Military. Roman Legionaries. Besides their arms, which the legionaries scarcely considered as an encumbrance, they were laden with their kitchen furniture, the instruments of fortification, and the provision of many days. Under this weight, which would oppress the delicacy of a modern soldier, they were trained by a regular step to advance in about six hours near twenty miles. On the appearance of an enemy they threw aside their baggage, and by easy and rapid evolutions converted the column of march into an order of battle.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1, p. 19.

2521. HARSHIPS, Success by. Chauncey Jerome. [The inventor of machine-made Yankee clocks.] After working awhile at the dials, he started with two others on a tour to New Jersey—they to sell the works of clocks, and he to make the cases for them. They travelled in a lumber-wagon, and carried their own provisions. By this time the clockmakers of Connecticut had so systematized their business that they could sell a pretty good clock that stood seven feet high for $40. [Formerly costing about $150.] Chauncey Jerome worked about fifteen hours a day that winter at case-making. . . . He well remembers passing through New York, and seeing the crowds of people walking up and down Chatham Street stopping a man to ask him what was the matter. At New Haven—where he afterward lived in a splendid mansion—he walked about the streets eating bread and cheese, and carrying his clothes in a bundle.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 212.

2522. HARMONY, Fear of. Ancients. As the writers upon physics say that if war and discord were banished the universe, the heavenly bodies would stop their course, and all generation and motion would cease, by reason of that perfect harmony, so the great Lawgiver infused a spirit of ambition and contention into the Spartan constitution, as an incentive to virtue, and wished always to see some difference and dispute among the good and virtuous.—PLUTARCH'S AGESILAUS.

2523. HARVEST, A lost. Golden. Antigonus conceived some suspicion of Mithridates from a dream. He thought he entered a large and beautiful field, and sowed it with filings of gold. This produced a crop of the same precious metal ; but coming a little after to visit it, he found it was cut, and nothing left but the stalks. As he was in great distress about his loss, he heard some people say that Mithridates had reaped the golden harvest, and was gone with it toward the Euxine Sea.—PLUTARCH'S MARCUS CRASSUS.

2524. HASTE, Defective. Art. It is said that when Agatharcus the painter valued himself upon the celerity and ease with which he dispatched his pieces, Zeuxis replied, "If I boast, it shall be of the slowness with which I finish mine." For ease and speed in the execution seldom give a work any lasting importance or exquisite beauty ; while, on the other hand, the time which is expended in labor is recovered and repaid in the duration of the performance.—PLUTARCH'S PERICLES.

2525. HASTE, Needless. Admiral Drake. A match at bowls was being played, in which Drake and other high officers of the fleet were engaged, when a small armed vessel was seen running before the wind into Plymouth harbor with all sails set. Her commander landed in haste, and eagerly sought the place where the English lord admiral and his captains were standing. His name was Fleming; he was the master of a Scotch privateer; and he told the English officers that he had that morning seen the Spanish Armada off the Cornish coast. At this exciting information the captains began to hurry down to the water, and there was a shouting for the ships' boats; but Drake coolly checked his comrades, and insisted that the match should be played out. He said that there was plenty of time both to win the game and beat the Spaniards.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 398.

2526. HATRED, Savage. French vs. Italians Mary de Medicis disgusted the French, in the first place, by her partiality to her countrymen, the Italians. Concini, a Florentine, a high favorite of the queen regent, was advanced to the dignity of a marshal of France—a sufficient reason for rendering the queen and her minister odious to the nobility and to the kingdom. The Maréchal d'Ancre, for such was the title he assumed, trusted too much to the favor of his mistress and to the appearance of power, which was its consequence. The nobility combined against him, and he was assassinated in a most inhuman manner in the palace of the Louvre. The populace, in that spirit of savage cruelty which in all scenes of disorder seems to be characteristic of that nation, are said actually to have torn his heart from his body and devoured it.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 32, p. 442.

2527. HAUGHTINESS, Lordly. Sapor. [The Persian tyrant-king.] At the time when the East trembled at the name of Sapor, he received a present not unworthy of the greatest kings—a long train of camels, laden with the most rare and valuable merchandises. The rich offering was accompanied with an epistle, respectful, but not servile, from Odenathus, one of the noblest and most opulent senators of Palmyra. "Who is this Odenathus," said the haughty victor, and he commanded that the presents should be cast into the Euphrates, "that he thus insolently presumes to write to his lord? If he entertains a hope of mitigating his punishment, let him fall prostrate before the foot of our throne, with his hands bound behind his back. Should he hesitate, swift destruction shall be poured on his head, on his whole race, and on his country." [Odenathus resented the insult, and met the Persian king in arms, and compelled his retreat beyond the Euphrates.] The voice of history, which is often little more than the organ of hatred or flattery, reproaches Sapor with a proud abuse of the rights of conquest. We are told that Valerian, in chains, but invested with the Imperial purple, was exposed to the multitude, a constant spectacle of fallen greatness; and that whenever the Persian monarch mounted on horseback, he placed his foot on the neck of a Roman emperor.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 10, p. 318.

2528. HEALTH following Disease. Cholera. [In 1832 England was visited with the cholera, which] left a real blessing behind it. The care of the public health from that time became a duty which no ministry could neglect, and which placed us in a condition not only to mitigate the evils of any pest in recurring years, but to elevate the whole body of the people in habits of cleanliness and comfort, and to prolong the duration of life in village and in city, in the pleasant fields and in the close factories.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 16, p. 293.

2529. HEALTH, Heroism without. William III. William III. . . . had a thin and weak body. . . . He was always asthmatical, and the dregs of the small-pox falling upon his lungs, he had a constant deep cough.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 5, p. 65.

2530. HEALTH prized. Arabs. The custom of the sedentary Arabs in good circumstances and living in towns, was what it is at this day. They sent their sons to nurse into the families of the nomad Arabs living in tents. The object of this sort of adoption was twofold: in the first place, the child contracted amid this rural and pastoral life a sounder health and more masculine habits; and secondly, the affection that grew up between the child and the nomadic family wherein he had been suckled and had commenced his life gave to the powerful family to whom he owed his blood an indissoluble clientage among the tribes of the country.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 55.

2531. HEALTH by Travel. Washington Irving. I am too weak to take any exercise, and too low-spirited half the time to enjoy company. "Was that young Irving," asked Judge Kent of his brother-in-law, "who slept in the room next to me, and kept up such an incessant cough during the night?" "It was." "He is not long for this world." This lugubrious judgment of the great jurist was shared by the family of Irving, who determined to send him to Europe. . . . He started on the 19th of May, 1804. "There's a chap," said the captain, "who will go overboard before we get across." . . . Irving set out from Gravesend on the 18th of January, 1806, and reached New York after a stormy passage of sixty-four days. He had contradicted the prophecy of the captain with whom he originally sailed—that he would go overboard before he got across; and of Judge Kent, who declared he was not long for this world. He returned in good health, and resumed his legal studies.—STODDARD'S IRVING, p. 17, 18, 23.

2532. HEARERS, Unappreciative. Samuel Johnson. His noble friend, Lord Elibank, well observed that if a great man procured an interview with Johnson, and did not wish to see him more, it showed a mere idle curiosity, and a wretched want of relish for extraordinary powers of mind. Mrs. Thrale justly and wittily accounted for such conduct by saying that Johnson's conversation was by much too strong for a person accustomed to obsequiousness and flattery; it was mustard in a young child's mouth!—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 465.

2533. HEARING, Released from. Congregation. [King James II. commanded his Liberty of Conscience act to be read by the unwilling clergy in the churches to the unwilling hearers.] One, more pleasantly than gravely, told his people that, though he was obliged to read it, they were not obliged to hear it; and he stopped till they all went out, and then he read it to the walls.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 26, p. 426.

2534. HEART, A broken. Miss Perronet. A gentleman so called had, by the utmost assiduity and innumerable professions of the tenderest affection, gained by slow degrees her love. The time of the marriage was fixed, the ring was bought, and the wedding-clothes were sent to her. He came a week before the day, and continued to avow the most ardent regard; but at a later visit, sitting down very carelessly on a chair, he declared in the coolest manner that he had changed his purpose; that he had been mistaken, did not love her, and could not marry her. He walked away, leaving her dumb with grief. The sorrow which she endeavored to conceal preyed upon her spirits, till, three or four days after, she suddenly laid down, and in four minutes died. "One of the ventricles of her heart burst, so she literally died of a broken heart."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 2, p. 262.

2535. ———. By Washington Irving. [A friend handed Byron a copy of the "Sketch Book" shortly before his death.] He turned to the "Broken Heart." "That," said he, "is one of the finest things ever written on earth, and I want to hear an American read it. But stay—do you know Irving?" I replied that I had never seen him. "God bless him!" exclaimed Byron. "He is a genius; and he has something better than genius—a heart. I wish I could see him, but I fear I never shall. Well, read the 'Broken Heart'—yes the 'Broken Heart' What a word!" In closing the first paragraph, I said, "Shall I confess it? I do believe in broken hearts." "Yes," exclaimed Byron, "and so do I, and so does everybody but philosophers and fools!" While I was reading one of the most touching portions of that mournful piece, I observed that Byron wept. He turned his eyes upon me, and said, "You see me weep, sir. Irving himself never wrote that story without weeping; nor can I hear it without tears. I have not wept much in this world, for trouble never brings tears to my eyes, but I always have tears for the 'Broken Heart.'" [See No. 3351.]—STODDARD'S IRVING, p. 40.

2536. HEART, Hardened. James II. [Trial of Benjamin Hewling for rebelling under the Duke of Monmouth.] Even Jeffreys was, or pretended to be, inclined to lenity. . . . Time was allowed for a reference to London. The sister of the prisoner went to Whitehall with a petition. Many courtiers wished her success, and Churchill [the Duke of Marlborough], among whose numerous faults cruelty had no place, obtained admittance for her. "I wish well to your suit with all my heart," he said, as they stood together in the ante-chamber; "but do not flatter yourself with hopes. This marble"—and he laid his hand on the chimney-piece—"is not harder than the king." This prediction proved true. Benjamin Hewling died with dauntless courage, amid lamentations in which the soldiers who kept guard round the gallows could not refrain from joining.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 600.

2537. HEART, An honest. Fortress. The first of the family [of Stephen Colonna] in fame and merit was the elder Stephen, whom [the poet]

Petrarch loved and esteemed as a hero superior to his own times, and not unworthy of ancient Rome. Persecution and exile displayed to the nations his abilities in peace and war; in his distress he was an object not of pity, but of reverence; the aspect of danger provoked him to avow his name and country; and when he was asked, "Where is now your fortress?" he laid his hand on his heart, and answered, "Here."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 69, p. 463.

2538. HEART longing for God. Arumaga Tambiran. [He was a] Hindoo of high family, and celebrated for his knowledge; had made pilgrimages of many thousands of miles, to seek rest to his inquiring mind. He at last met with some native Christians . . . and with Carver the missionary. [He began to seek the truth,] when some of his disciples attempted to carry him off; he appealed to the magistrate at Madras, wearing his heathen robes in the court, for the last time, that he might be identified as the head of the order. Before the officer and a great multitude he bore this eloquent testimony for Christianity. Alluding to his pilgrimages, he said: "Fifty years of my life have been thus spent. I sought all heathen books, but found nothing for the soul. I have taught many hundred disciples, as you know. I discovered nothing in heathen books, in heathen temples, in heathen ceremonies, to satisfy my spirit. I met with this missionary, and he opened to my understanding the way of salvation. I determined to abandon heathenism. By heathenism I got money in abundance, and honors. I was worshipped by his disciples; but my soul shrunk back at its blasphemy against the God of whom I had heard. . . . I wish to be baptized in the name of Jesus, and to teach others also of this Saviour."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 3, p. 347.

2539. HEART, Obdurate. Murderer. The Earl of Ferrers, an infidel and a drunkard, . . . murdered his steward for rendering assistance to his lady, who had been compassionately separated from him by act of Parliament. The House of Lords condemned the wretched nobleman; he was to be executed and his body dissected. His brother . . . [and others, both men and women] sought to arouse him to a sense of his moral peril. He was prayed for in the churches; but he remained unmoved. He spent the evenings of his imprisonment in playing piquet; he demanded intoxicating drinks; the night before his execution he had Hamlet read while he was in bed, and half an hour before he was carried to the gallows he was employed in correcting verses which he had composed in the Tower. Dressed in his wedding clothes, decked with silver embroidery, he rode to the gallows in his carriage, drawn by six horses, and accompanied by troops and a hearse. He died without penitence and apparently without fear.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 2, p. 20.

2540. HEAVEN, A carnal. Mahomet. It is natural enough that an Arabian prophet should dwell with rapture on the groves, the fountains, and the rivers of paradise; but instead of inspiring the blessed inhabitants with a liberal taste for harmony and science, conversation and friendship, he idly celebrates the pearls and diamonds, the robes of silk, palaces of marble, dishes of gold, rich wines, artificial dainties, numerous attendants, and the whole train of sensual and costly luxury which becomes insipid to the owner even in the short period of this mortal life. Seventy-two hours, or black-eyed girls of resplendent beauty, blooming youth, virgin purity, and exquisite sensibility will be created for the use of the meanest believer; a moment of pleasure will be prolonged to a thousand years, and his faculties will be increased a hundred-fold to render him worthy of his felicity. Notwithstanding a vulgar prejudice, the gates of heaven will be open to both sexes; but Mahomet has not specified the male companions of the female elect, lest he should either alarm the jealousy of their former husbands or disturb their felicity by the suspicion of an everlasting marriage.—GIBBON'S MAHOMET, p. 30.

2541. HEAVEN, Division of. Swedenborg. The infinite variety of heaven thus arranges itself, in general, into two kingdoms; specifically into three heavens; and in particular, into innumerable societies. The two kingdoms are respectively called celestial and spiritual. The angels forming the celestial kingdom are characterized by their exceeding love of the Lord and of goodness; and the angels who form the spiritual kingdom are distinguished by their exceeding love of their neighbor and of truth. The celestial angels are immensely wiser than the spiritual, and their blessedness is ineffable. Specifically there are three heavens, perfectly distinct, called the first heaven, the second or middle heaven, and the third or highest heaven; or they may be called external, internal, and inmost; or natural, spiritual, and celestial. . . . The external, first, or natural heaven, is formed of those who, from a principle of obedience and duty, live in accordance with the Divine will. The second, spiritual, or middle heaven, is formed of such as love truth, delight in things intellectual, and at the same time are in disinterested love to the neighbor. The inmost, third, or celestial heaven is formed of those who, full of love to the Lord, are in innocence.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 13, p. 104.

2542. HEAVEN, Materialistic. Boswell. I remember, many years ago, when my imagination was warm, and I happened to be in melancholy mood, it distressed me to think of going into a state of being in which Shakespeare's poetry did not exist. A lady whom I then much admired, a very amiable woman, humored my fancy, and relieved me by saying, "The first thing you will meet in the other world will be an elegant copy of Shakespeare's works presented to you." Dr. Johnson smiled benignantly at this, and did not appear to disapprove of the notion.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 387.

2543. HEAVEN, Views of. Adaptation. "Grace and Peace in Christ. MY DEAR LITTLE SON: I rejoice to hear that thou art learning diligently and praying faithfully. Continue to do this, my son, and when I return home I will bring you some beautiful toys, representing an annual fair. I know of a delightful garden in which many children are found, dressed in golden clothing; they gather beautiful apples, pears, cherries, and plums; they also sing and leap, and are happy; they have beautiful little horses, with golden bridles and silver saddles. Thereupon I asked the man, whose garden it is, to whom these children belonged. He answered, 'These are the children that love to pray and learn, and that are pious.' Then said I, 'My dear sir, I too have a son, named Johnnie Luther; could not he also come into this garden and eat such beautiful apples and pears, and ride such little horses and play with these children?' And the man said, 'If he loves to pray and to study, and is pious, he shall likewise go to heaven, and with him Lippus and Jost [sons of Melanchthon and Jonas]. And when they all return they shall have fifes and flutes and drums, and all sorts of stringed instruments; they shall also dance, and shoot with small cross-bows.' And he showed me a beautiful plot in the garden set apart for dancing; there I saw hanging real golden fifes and drums, and fine silver cross-bows. But it was quite early, so that the children had not yet eaten their meal. Hence I could not wait to see them dance, and I said to the man, 'I will hurriedly go and write my little son Johnnie all about these things, so that he may pray diligently, study well, and be pious, and also come into this garden. But he has an aunt, Lena, whom he must take along with him.' Then the man replied, 'Let it be so; go and write him all about it.' Therefore, my dear little son Johnnie, keep on studying and praying, and tell Lippus and Jost that they also study and pray, and then you will all together come into this garden. Herewith I commend thee to Almighty God. Greet Aunt Lena with a kiss from me. Thy dear father, Martinus Luther."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 16, p. 149.

2544. HEAVEN visited. Mahomet. His dream of a nocturnal journey is seriously described as a real and corporeal transaction. A mysterious animal, the Borak, conveyed him from the temple of Mecca to that of Jerusalem; with his companion Gabriel he successfully ascended the seven heavens, and received and repaid the salutations of the patriarchs, the prophets, and the angels, in their respective mansions. Beyond the seventh heaven Mahomet alone was permitted to proceed; he passed the veil of unity, approached within two bow-shots of the throne, and felt a cold that pierced him to the heart when his shoulder was touched by the hand of God. After this familiar though important conversation he again descended to Jerusalem, remounted the Borak, returned to Mecca, and performed in the tenth part of a night the journey of many thousand years.—GIBBON'S MAHOMET, p. 26.

2545. HEAVEN, The Warriors'. Scandinavians. The way in which the departed heroes pass their time in Valhalla, or in the palace of Odin, is described in several places of the Edda. They have every day the pleasure of arming themselves, marshalling themselves in military order, engaging in battle, and being all cut to pieces; but when the stated hour of repast arrives their bodies are reunited, and they return on horseback safe to the hall of banquet, where they feed heartily on the flesh of a boar, and drink beer out of the skulls of their enemies, till they are in a state of intoxication. Odin sits by himself at a particular table. The heroes are served by the beautiful virgins, named Valkirie, who officiate as their cup-bearers; but the pleasures of love do not enter at all into the joys of this extraordinary Paradise. These notions of religious belief among the Scandinavians, arising from a native ferocity of character, had a strong effect on their national manners and on the conduct of individuals. Placing their sole delight in war and in the slaughter of their enemies, they had an absolute contempt of danger and of bodily pain.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 6.

2546. HEEDLESSNESS, Loss by. Goldsmith. I went to Cork and converted my horse, which you prize so much higher than Fiddleback, into cash, took my passage in a ship bound for America, and at the same time paid the captain for my freight and all the other expenses of my voyage. But it so happened that the wind did not answer for three weeks; and you know, mother, that I could not command the elements. My misfortune was that, when the wind served, I happened to be with a party in the country, and my friend the captain never inquired after me, but set sail with as much indifference as if I had been on board.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 3, p. 32.

2547. HELL necessary. President Andrew Jackson. [Here is] his famous reply to a young man who objected to the doctrine of future punishment. "I thank God," said the youth, "I have too much good sense to believe there is such a place as hell." "Well, sir," said General Jackson, "I thank God there is such a place." "Why, general," asked the young man, "what do you want with such a place of torment as hell?" To which the general replied as quick as lightning, "To put such rascals as you in, that oppose and vilify the Christian religion." The young man said no more, and soon after found it convenient to take his leave.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 538.

2548. HELL, Temporary. Mohammedan. According as the shares of guilt or virtue shall preponderate, the sentence will be pronounced, and all, without distinction, will pass over the sharp and perilous bridge of the abyss; but the innocent treading in the footsteps of Mahomet will gloriously enter the gates of paradise, while the guilty will fall into the first and mildest of the seven hells. The term of expiation will vary from nine hundred to seven thousand years; but the prophet has judiciously promised that all his disciples, whatever may be their sins, shall be saved by their own faith and his intercession from eternal damnation.—GIBBON'S MAHOMET, p. 30.

2550. HELPERS, Dependence on. "Auxiliaries." The safety and honor of the empire was principally intrusted to the legions, but the policy of Rome condescended to adopt every useful instrument of war. Considerable levies were regularly made among the provincials, who had not yet deserved the honorable distinction of Romans. Many dependent princes and communities, dispersed round the frontiers, were permitted for a while to hold their freedom and security by the tenure of military service. Even select troops of hostile barbarians were frequently compelled or persuaded to consume their dangerous valor in remote climates, and for the benefit of the State. All these were included under the general name of auxiliaries; and howsoever they might vary according to the difference of times and circumstances, their numbers were seldom much inferior to those of the legions themselves.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1, p. 17.

2551. HERITAGE of Disposition. Frederick II. Frederick, it is true, by no means relinquished his hereditary privilege of kicking and cudgeling. His practice, however, as to that matter differed in some important respects from his father's. To Frederick William the mere circumstance that any persons whatever, men, women, or children, Prussians or foreigners, were within reach of his toes and of his cane, appeared to be a sufficient reason for proceeding to belabor them. Frederick required provocation as well as vicinity; nor was he ever known to inflict this paternal species of correction on any but his born subjects.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 25.

2552. HEREDITY, Failure of. Earthquake of Lisbon. It was this catastrophe which was the means of calling into exercise the latent benevolence of John Howard, who is now styled in all lands and tongues "the philanthropist." The father of this benevolent being was noted for his penuriousness.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 31.

2553. HERESY fined. Donatists. [During the persecution of the Donatists by the Catholics, a] regular scale of fines, from ten to two hundred pounds of silver, was curiously ascertained, according to the distinctions of rank and fortune, to punish the crime of assisting at a schismatic conventicle; and if the fine had been levied five times, without subduing the obstinacy of the offender, his future punishment was referred to the discretion of the Imperial court. By these severities, which obtained the warmest approbation of St. Augustin, great numbers of Donatists were reconciled to the Catholic Church; but the fanatics, who still persevered in their opposition, were provoked to madness and despair, the distracted country was filled with tumult and bloodshed; the armed troops of Circumcellions alternately pointed their rage against themselves, or against their adversaries; and the calendar of martyrs received on both sides a considerable augmentation.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 33, p. 373.

2554. HERESY hunting. Roger Williams. The banishment of Roger Williams, instead of bringing peace, brought strife and dissension to the people of Massachusetts. The ministers were stern and exacting. Every shade of popular belief was closely scrutinized; the slightest departure from orthodox doctrines was met with the charge of heresy, and to be a heretic was to become an outcast. Still, the advocates of free opinion multiplied. The clergy, notwithstanding their great influence among the people, felt insecure. Religious debates became the order of the day. Every sermon had to pass the ordeal of review and criticism.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 13, p. 128.

2555. HERESY, Madness at. Philip II. Philip returned in triumph to Spain, where his active mind, now at ease from foreign disturbances, began to be disquieted on the score of religion, and he laid down a fixed resolution to extirpate every species of heresy from his dominions. The Inquisition was invested with all the plenitude of the powers of persecution. It is wonderful how much the spirit of this tyrant coincided with that of his consort, Mary of England; only Mary burnt the Protestants at once, and Philip prepared them for that ceremony by racks and tortures. The King of Spain, hearing that there were some heretics in a valley of Piedmont, bordering on the Milanese, sent orders to the Governor of Milan to despatch a few troops that way, and concluded his order in two remarkable words—"ahorcad todos"—hang them all. Being informed that the same opinions were entertained by some of the inhabitants of Calabria, he ordered one half to be hanged and the other burned; the consequences of these cruelties were what he did not foresee—the loss of a third part of his dominions.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 26, p. 362.

2556. HERESY, Suppression of. By Law. [William III. obtained the passage of an act of Parliament] by which it was provided that if any person who had been educated in the Christian religion, or had made profession of the same, should by writing, preaching, or teaching deny the Holy Trinity, or deny the Christian religion to be true, or the Holy Scriptures to be of divine authority, he should for the first offence be disqualified for any office; for the second, be rendered incapable of bringing any action, of purchasing lands, or of being guardian, executor, or legatee. He was, moreover, to be subject to three years' imprisonment. With the exception of the part relating to the denial of the Holy Trinity, "the law still remains un repealed or unmodified."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 13.

2557. HERETICS terrified. Cruelty. [In 1166 about thirty German men and women had settled at Oxford, whose] lives were perfectly blameless; and their opinions, whatever they might be, were not very attractive, for they had obtained only one proselyte, a woman of humble station. [They were brought before the Synod.] They answered perversely and erroneously concerning the sacraments. . . . This was the first ebullition of heresy in England since the differences of the days of Augustin. An example was to be made; and the wretched exiles were branded, whipped, and turned out naked and bleeding into the fields, in the depths of winter. None dared to succor them, none to pity, and they all miserably perished.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 20.

2558. HERETICS, Vengeance against. Corpse. [In 1556 the commissioners of Cardinal Pole] not only burnt all the English Bibles and other heretical books, but went through the farce of making a process against the body of Peter Martyr's wife, who had been buried in one of the churches. They could find no witnesses who had heard her utter any heresies, for she could speak no English. So under the direction of the cardinal they transferred her body to a dunghill, upon the plea that she had been a nun, and had died excommunicated. A scene equally disgusting was perpetrated by Pole's commissioners at Cambridge. They laid the churches of St. Mary's and St. Michael's under interdict, because the bodies of the great reformers, Bucer and Fagius, were buried in them. The dead were then cited to appear; but not answering to the summons, they were judged to be obstinate heretics, and their bodies were to be taken out of their graves and delivered to the secular power. On the 6th of February these bodies were publicly burnt, according to the ancient ceremonies, which Rome had found so effectual in the case of Wycliffe.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 7, p. 100.

2559. HERMIT, Mysterious. At Niagara Falls. His assumed name was Abbot. He occupied a hut on Goat Island. His appearance and accomplishments indicated that he had once been favored by fortune, but he would never give any clew to his past history. He was wont to write in English, Spanish, Italian, and Latin, and to destroy the compositions as soon as made. The island became too much frequented for him, and he removed to the mainland. It was his habit to bathe three times a day in the river; one morning in the year 1835 the ferryman saw Abbot's clothes lying on the bank, but no trace of their owner. He never afterward made his appearance, and no doubt was drowned.—APPLETON'S CYCLOPEDIA, "ABBOT."

2560. HERO, Patriotic. William Wallace. In this state of universal despondency arose William Wallace, a man who deserves to be numbered among the heroes of antiquity. With no advantages of birth or fortune, conscious of his personal merits alone, with an invincible spirit, a courage equal to the greatest attempts, and every requisite quality of a consummate general, he undertook to retrieve the honor and the liberties of his country. A few patriots joined him in that glorious attempt, and his confessed superiority of merit bestowed on him the rank of their chief and leader. Taking advantage of an expedition of the English monarch into Flanders, while the government of Scotland had been intrusted to an imperious viceroy, Wallace, with his associates, began hostilities by an assault upon some of the strongest castles which contained English garrisons. Of these they made themselves masters by force or by surprise.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 12, p. 191.

2561. HERO, Unsurpassed. Muley Moluc. [De facto king of Fez and Morocco.] This Muley Moluc was a prince who, in some circumstances of character, was equal to the greatest heroes of ancient Greece or Rome. There does not exist in history a nobler instance of intrepidity or greatness of soul than what this man exhibited in his dying moments, in that remarkable engagement. Moluc was in full possession of the empire of Morocco at the time when his dominions were invaded by Don Sebastian; but he was fast consuming with a distemper which he knew to be incurable. He prepared, however, for the reception of so formidable an enemy. He was indeed reduced to such weakness of body, that on the day when the last decisive battle was to be fought he did not expect to live so long as to know the fate of the engagement. He planned himself the order of battle, and being carried on a litter through the ranks, endeavored, by his voice and gesture, to animate his troops to the utmost exertions of courage. Conscious that the fate of his family and of his kingdom depended upon the issue of that day, he gave orders to his principal officers, that if he died during the engagement, they should conceal his death from the army, and that they should from time to time ride up to the litter in which he was carried, under pretence of receiving orders from him as usual. When the battle had continued for some time, Muley Moluc perceived with great anguish of mind that his troops in one quarter began to give way. He was then near his last agonies; but collecting what remained of strength and life, he threw himself out of the litter, rallied his army, and again led them on to the charge. Quite exhausted, he fell down on the field, and being carried back to his litter he laid his finger on his mouth to enjoin secrecy to his officers who stood around him, and expired a few moments after in that posture. [The Moors were victorious.]—TITTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 26, p. 368.

2562. HEROES, Dead. Turks. In their public perils the Turks make invocation to the name of Solyman. He appears sometimes in battle athwart the smoke of the cannon, mounted on a white steed and surrounded by divinified heroes. [Solyman was marvellously successful in the conquest of European cities.]—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 232.

2563. HEROES for Freedom. Toussaint L'Ouverture. [Toussaint L'Ouverture, a colored man, had the military genius and the political sagacity to establish the civil and military dominion of free negroes in the island of St. Domingo; he became the undisputed head of the government. Was conquered and taken to France by order of Bonaparte.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 24, p. 418.

2564. HEROISM, Admirable. Lafayette. The young and high-spirited Marquess de Lafayette, afterward so celebrated in the Revolution, equipped a ship at his own expense, and proceeded to join the army of the American patriots under General Washington.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 24, § 20.

2565. — — — Prince Condé. [In 1569, on] the 13th of March, Coligny [one of the Protestant leaders], with the rear guard only of his army, was surprised by the Duke of Anjou near Jarnac, on the Charente. Condé, summoned to the rescue, galloped to the scene of action with 300 cavalry, but found the admiral's troops already overpowered and in disorder. The gallant prince, though he had been wounded in the arm the evening before, instantly headed an impetuous charge, and at the moment of engaging received a kick from a vicious horse, which fractured one of his legs. "Nobles of France!" he exclaimed, "behold in what a condition Louis of Bourbon goes to battle for Christ and his country!" His horse was soon killed under him, and the prince fell helpless in the midst of the enemy. A desperate conflict took place around his body, but his defenders were borne down by numbers and slain almost to a man. Condé at length surrendered his sword.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 16, § 8, p. 388.

2566. HEROISM, Patriotic. Bayard. [The commander of the army of Francis I. against the Milanese was defeated, and in a combat on the Sesia [he] received a severe wound, which compelled him to resign the command to the Chevalier Bayard and the Count de St. Pol. A desperate struggle followed, in the course of which the noble Bayard, having resisted for some time the whole strength of the enemy, and thus secured the retreat of the French army, was mortally wounded by a musket-shot in the loins. He caused himself to be placed at the foot of a tree, with his face still turned toward the enemy, and in this position calmly prepared himself for death. The Constable Bourbon rode up soon afterward, in hot pursuit of his flying countrymen, and addressed the expiring hero in words of respectful sympathy. "I am no object of compassion," returned Bayard; "I die as becomes a soldier and a man of honor; it is yourself who are to be pitied—you who have the misfortune to be fighting against your king, your country, and your oath."—STUDENTS' FRANCE.

2567. HEROISM, Persistent. Mohammedan. The Mohammedans were invading, with 3000 soldiers, the territory of Palestine, that extends to the eastward of the Jordan. The holy banner was intrusted to Zeid. . . . Zeid fell, like a soldier, in the foremost ranks; the death of Jaafar was heroic and memorable: he lost his right hand; he shifted the standard to his left; the left was severed from his body; he embraced the standard with his bleeding stumps, till he was transfixed to the ground with fifty honorable wounds.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 141.

2568. HEROISM in Suffering. Lord Nelson. [Nelson was wounded in the battle of the Nile, and was carried below to the cock-pit.] The effusion of blood being very great, the wound was held to be dangerous, if not mortal. The surgeons left their wounded to bestow their care upon the first man of the fleet. "No," said Nelson, "I will take my turn with my brave fellows."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 20, p. 356.

2569. HEROISM, Tarnished. Benedict Arnold. In the midst of the general gloom the country was shocked by the rumor that Benedict Arnold had turned traitor. And the news, though hardly creditable, was true. The brave, rash man, who on behalf of the patriot cause had suffered untold hardships and shed his blood on more fields than one, had blotted the record of his heroism with a deed of treason. [He was promoted to major-generalship for gallant behavior. Marrying an extravagant wife, he] entered upon a career of luxury and extravagance which soon overwhelmed him with debt and bankruptcy. In order to keep up his magnificence he began a system of frauds on the commissary department of the army. His bearing toward the citizens was that of a military despot; the people groaned under his tyranny, and charges were preferred against him by Congress. . . . By a court-martial . . . he was convicted on two charges, and by order of the court was mildly reprimanded by Washington. Professing unbounded patriotism, [he betrayed the fortress at West Point to Major André for British gold, and fled to the enemies of his country.] —RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 43, p. 342.

2570. HEROISM, Unflinching. Captain James Lawrence. He received a challenge from Captain Broke, of the British frigate Shannon, to come out of [Boston harbor] and fight. Lawrence ought not to have accepted the banter, for his equipments were incomplete and his crew ill-assorted, sick, and half mutinous. But he was young, the favorite of the nation; fired with applause [over his recent successes], he went unhesitatingly to meet his foe. . . . The battle was obstinate, brief, dreadful. In a short time every officer who could direct the movements of the Chesapeake was either killed or wounded. The brave young Lawrence was struck with a musket-ball, and fell dying on the bloody deck. As they bore him down the hatchway he gave in feeble voice his last heroic order—ever after the motto of the American sailor—"Don't give up the ship!" The British were already leaping on the deck, and the flag of England was hoisted over the shattered vessel. —RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 50, p. 406.

2571. HETERODOXY, Evidence of. Photius. [The patriarch of Constantinople] assumed the title of Œcumenical or General Patriarch, and accused all the western bishops of heresy, not only for adhering to the Roman pontiff, but for various heterodox articles of doctrine and unchristian practices, such, for example, as using unleavened bread in the sacrament, eating cheese and eggs in Lent, shaving their beards, and lastly, that they prohibited priests to marry, and separated from their wives such married men as chose to go into orders. The last of these articles, he alleged, gave rise to the most scandalous immoralities. —TITLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 6, p. 95.

2572. HISTORY, Divisions of. Ancient and Modern. A remarkable revolution now awaited the empire, which, from a slender beginning, effected a surprising change on the great theatre of human affairs. This was the rise of Mahomet and his religion. But here we fix the termination of ancient history, and the commencement of the modern. Previous, however, to our entering upon this second and most important part of our work, we shall consider, with some attention, the manners, genius, laws, and policy of those Gothic nations who subverted the Roman empire in the West, and, establishing themselves in every quarter of Europe, are justly considered, at this day, as the parent stock of most of the modern European nations. [A.D. 575.] —TITLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 6, p. 26.

2573. HISTORY, Fictions of. Of ancient Britain. [From history of his times, by Laonicus Chalcondyles,] the most singular circumstance of their manners is their disregard of conjugal honor and female chastity. In their mutual visits, as the first act of hospitality, the guest is welcomed in the embraces of their wives and daughters; among friends they are lent and borrowed without shame; nor are the islanders offended at this strange commerce and its inevitable consequences. Informed as we are of the customs of Old England, and assured of the virtue of our mothers, we may smile at the credulity, or resent the injustice, of the Greek, who must have confounded a modest salute with a criminal embrace. But his credulity and injustice may teach an important lesson: to distrust the accounts of foreign and remote nations, and to suspend our belief of every tale that deviates from the laws of nature and the character of man. —GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 66, p. 304.

2574. — — —. Pocahontas. In short, of the events which occurred in Virginia during the first ten years of the colony's existence, we have seven distinct sources of information, all but one of which are the productions of men who had lived in the colony; but in none of them is there an intimation that Pocahontas saved the life of Captain Smith. Two of these narratives contain several particulars of the life and death of this Indian girl, and the authors of them had a strong interest in exalting her reputation. . . . I say, then, farewell the Pocahontas of romance! and approach the true Pocahontas, the dumpy, dingy little squaw whom John Rolfe married, and the council sent to England to advertise forlorn Virginia! —CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOGRAPHY, p. 656.

2575. — — —. Sir Isaac Newton. The story of his dog Diamond throwing down a lighted candle among his papers, by which the labors of years were consumed, and of Newton's calmly saying, "O Diamond, Diamond! thou little knowest the mischief thou hast done," is not true. The candle was left by his own carelessness in such a position that it set fire to the papers without the intervention of a dog—an animal he never kept. Nor did he contemplate his loss with the slightest approach to philosophic calmness. On the contrary, it almost drove him out of his senses, and it was a month before he had regained his tranquillity. The story also of his using his wife's finger, in a fit of absence of mind, to press down the tobacco in his pipe, is liable to two slight objections: 1, he never had a wife; 2, he never smoked. Being once asked why he never smoked or took snuff, he answered, "I will not make to myself any necessities." —PARTON'S NEWTON, p. 93.

2576. HISTORY, Influence of. Nicola Rienzi. The study of history and eloquence, the writings of Cicero, Seneca, Livy, Cæsar, and Valerius Maximus elevated above his equals and contemporaries the genius of the young plebeian; he perused with indefatigable diligence the manuscripts and marbles of antiquity; loved to dispense his knowledge in familiar language; and was often provoked to exclaim, "Where are now these Romans? their virtue, their justice, their power? why was I not born in those happy times?" [He became the deliverer of Rome.] —GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 69, p. 447.

2577. HISTORY misinterpreted. Cromwell's. We cannot readily find the instance of another personage in history whose acts and memory have been the subjects of such conflicting theories as those of Cromwell. The unphilosophical and paradoxical verdict of Hume, the historian of England, that he was a fanatical hypocrite, may now be dismissed; we suppose that by all parties it is dismissed, with the contempt to which it is only entitled, to the limbo to which it properly belongs, with many other of the verdicts this writer ventured to announce in his history. Hume's character as an historian has not only been long since impeached, but, by Mr. Brodie, reliance upon its veracity has been entirely destroyed; and even the Quarterly Review many years since distinctly showed in how many instances his prejudices have permitted him to distort evidence, and even to garble documents.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 1, p. 15.

2578. HISTORY, Mistakes of, Cromwell. The name of Cromwell up to the present period has been identified with ambition, craftiness, usurpation, ferocity, and tyranny; we think that his true character is that of a fanatic. History is like the sibyl, and only reveals her secrets to time, leaf by leaf. Hitherto she has not exhibited the real nature and composition of this human enigma. He has been thought a profound politician; he was only an eminent sectarian. Far-sighted historians of deep research, such as Hume, Lingard, Bossuet, and Voltaire, have all been mistaken in Cromwell. The fault was not theirs, but belonged to the epoch in which they wrote. Authentic documents had not then seen the light, and the portrait of Cromwell had only been painted by his enemies.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 1.

2579. HISTORY overlooked. Senator Yulee of Florida. [He withdrew from the Senate when his State seceded, and said in parting:] "The State of Florida . . . had decided to recall the powers she had delegated to the Federal Government, and to assume the full exercise of her sovereign rights as an independent . . . community." At what particular period in the history of the American continent Florida had enjoyed "sovereign rights," by what process she had ever "delegated powers to the Federal Government," or at what time she had ever been an "independent . . . community," Mr. Yulee evidently preferred not to inform the Senate. [Florida was not one of the original States.]—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS, ch. 11, p. 244.

2580. HISTORY, Partiality of. Thomas Cromwell. The history of this great revolution, for it is nothing less, is the history of a single man. In the whole line of English statesmen there is no one of whom we would willingly know so much, no one of whom we really know so little, as of Thomas Cromwell. When he meets us in Henry's service he had already passed middle life; and during his earlier years it is hardly possible to do more than disentangle a few fragmentary facts from the mass of fable which gather round them.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 556.

2581. HISTORY, Providence in. Battle. The French were defeated at Turin, and the whole country was abandoned to the emperor; while in the mean time his son, the archduke, was proclaimed at Madrid; and Philip V., on the point of losing his kingdom, had thoughts of evacuating Spain altogether, and establishing his dominion in America. This desperate resolution, however, was changed upon the victory of Almanza, where the Duke of Berwick, the natural son of James II., defeated the imperialists with their allies, and restored the spirits of the desponding monarch.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 34, p. 466.

2582. HISTORY, Rewritten. Oliver Cromwell. The evident contradictions of the historians of his own and other countries who had invariably exhibited him as a fantastic tyrant and a melodramatic hypocrite, induced Mr. Carlyle to think, with justice, that beneath these discordant components there might be found another Cromwell, a being of nature, not of the imagination. Guided by that instinct of truth and logic in which is comprised the genius of erudite discovery, Mr. Carlyle, himself possessing the spirit of a sectary, and delighting in an independent course, undertook to search out and examine all the correspondence buried in the depths of public or private archives, and in which, at the different dates of his domestic, military, and political life, Cromwell, without thinking that he should thus paint himself, has in fact done so for the study of posterity. Supplied with these treasures of truth and revelation, Mr. Carlyle shut himself up for some years in the solitude of the country, that nothing might distract his thoughts from his work. Then having collected, classed, studied, commented on, and rearranged these voluminous letters of his hero, and having resuscitated, as if from the tomb, the spirit of the man and the age, he committed to Europe this hitherto unpublished correspondence, saying, with more reason than Jean Jacques Rousseau, "Receive, and read; behold the true Cromwell!"—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 1.

2583. HISTORY, Romance of. Decisive Loves. Arletta's pretty feet twinkling in the brook made her the mother of William the Conqueror. Had she not thus fascinated Duke Robert, the Liberal of Normandy, Harold would not have fallen at Hastings, no Anglo-Norman dynasty could have arisen, no British empire. The reflection is Sir Francis Palgrave's; and it is emphatically true. If any one should write a history of "Decisive loves that have materially influenced the drama of the world in all its subsequent scenes," the daughter of the tanner of Falaise would deserve a conspicuous place in his pages.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 273.

2584. HISTORY, Slandered by. Christians. "Nero," says Tacitus, "exposed to accusation and tortured with the most exquisite penalties a set of men detested for their enormities, whom the common people called 'Christians.' Christus, the founder of this sect, was executed during the reign of Tiberius by the Procurator Pontius Pilate, and the deadly superstition, suppressed for a time, began to burst out once more, not only throughout Judæa, where the evil had its root, but even in the city, whither from every quarter all things horrible or shameful are drifted, and find their votaries." The lordly disdain which prevented Tacitus from making any inquiry into the real views and character of the Christians is shown by the fact that he catches up the most baseless allegations against them. He talks of their doctrines as savage and shameful, when they breathed the very spirit of peace and purity. He charges them with being animated by a hatred of their kind, when their central tenet was an universal charity. The masses, he says, called them "Christians;" and while he almost apologizes for staining his page with so vulgar an appellation, he merely mentions, in passing, that, though innocent of the charge of being turbulent incendiaries, on which they were tortured to death, they were yet a set of guilty and infamous sectaries, to be classed with the lowest dregs of Roman criminals.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 3, p. 34.

2585. HISTORY, Voluminous. Shakespeare. The catalogue of works about Shakespeare in the British Museum consists, I am told, of four folio volumes. The mere catalogue! We have in this city several collectors of Shakesperian literature, one of whom has got together a whole room full of books, numbering, perhaps, two thousand volumes, all of which relate, in some way, to Shakespeare. Nevertheless, the substance of what we really know of the man and his life can be stated in one of these short articles.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 23.

2586. HOAXES, Success by. Washington Irving. [Irving's humorous satire, "The City of New York."] A stupendous hoax, it was launched with a series of small hoaxes, the first of which appeared in the Evening Post of October 25, 1809, in the shape of a paragraph narrating the disappearance from his lodging of a small, elderly gentleman, by the name of Knickerbocker. He was stated to be dressed in an old black coat and a cocked hat, and it was intimated that there were some reasons for believing that he was not in his right mind. Great anxiety was felt, and any information concerning him would be thankfully received at the Columbian Hotel, Mulberry Street, or at the office of the paper. This feeler was followed in a week or two by a communication from "A Traveller," who professed to have seen him. . . . Ten days later (November 6th) Mr. Seth Handaside, landlord of the Independent Columbian Hotel, inserted a card in the same paper, in which he declared that there had been found in the room of the missing man, Mr. Diedrich Knickerbocker, a curious kind of a written book, in his own handwriting; and he wished the editor to notify him, if he was alive, that if he did not return and pay off his bill for board he would have to dispose of his book to satisfy him for the same. The bait took. . . . The "History of New York," which was published in this city on the 6th of December, 1809, was a success in more ways than one. Its whim and satire amused the lovers of wit and humor, and its irreverence toward the early Dutch settlers of the State annoyed and angered their descendants. Between these two classes of readers it was much talked about and largely circulated.—STODDARD'S IRVING, p. 28.

2587. HOBBYIST ridiculed. Columbus. During all this time he was exposed to continual scoffs and indignities, being ridiculed by the light and ignorant as a mere dreamer, and stigmatized by the illiberal as an adventurer. The very children, it is said, pointed to their foreheads as he passed, being taught to regard him as a kind of madman. The summer of 1490 passed away, but still Columbus was kept in tantalizing and tormenting suspense.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 2, ch. 4.

2588. HOLINESS, Fictitious. Mahomet. Such were the calm and rational precepts of the legislator; but in his private conduct Mahomet indulged in the appetites of a man, and abused the claims of a prophet. A special revelation dispensed him from the laws which he had imposed on his nation; the female sex without reserve was abandoned to his desires; and this singular prerogative excited the envy rather than the scandal, the veneration rather than the envy of the devout Mussulmans.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 149.

2589. HOLY Spirit professed. Mahomet. The piety of Moses and of Christ rejoiced in the assurance of a future prophet more illustrious than themselves; the evangelic promise of the Paraclete or Holy Ghost was prefigured in the name and accomplished in the person of Mahomet, the greatest and the last of the apostles of God.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 109.

2590. HOMAGE, Disgusting. James II. [Adda, the pope's nuncio, was consecrated archbishop of a fictitious bishopric.] Adda, wearing the robes of his new office, joined the circle in the queen's apartments. James fell on his knees in the presence of the whole court, and implored a blessing. In spite of the restraints imposed by etiquette, the astonishment and disgust of the bystanders could not be concealed. It was long, indeed, since an English sovereign had knelt to mortal man.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 249.

2591. HOMAGE unsurpassed. Samuel Johnson. His respect for the hierarchy, and particularly the dignitaries of the church, has been more than once exhibited in the course of this work. Mr. Seward saw him presented to the Archbishop of York, and described his bow to an archbishop as such a studied elaboration of homage, such an extension of limb, such a flexion of body, as have seldom or ever been equalled.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 491.

2592. HOME beautified. Sir Walter Scott's first. His first country home was the cottage at Lasswade, on the Esk, about six miles from Edinburgh, which he took in 1798, a few months after his marriage, and retained till 1804. It was a pretty little cottage, in the beautification of which Scott felt great pride, and where he exercised himself in the small beginnings of those tastes for altering and planting which grew so rapidly upon him, and at last enticed him into castle-building and tree-culture on a dangerous, not to say ruinous, scale. One of Scott's intimate friends, . . . Mr. Morritt, walked . . . with Scott four years after he had left it, and was taken out of his way to see it. "I have been bringing you," he said, "where there is little enough to be seen, only that Scotch cottage; but though not worth looking at, I could not pass it. It was our first country house when newly married, and many a contrivance it had to make it comfortable. I made a dining-table for it with my own hands. Look at these two miserable willow trees on either side the gate into the enclosure; they are tied together at the top to be an arch, and a cross made of two sticks over them is not yet decayed. To be sure, it is not much of a lion to show a stranger, but I wanted to see it again myself, for I assure you that after I had constructed it, mamma (Mrs. Scott) and I both of us thought it so fine we turned out to see it by moonlight, and walked backward from it to the cottage-door, in admiration of our own magnificence and its picturesque effect."—HUTTON'S LIFE OF SCOTT, ch. 7.

2593. HOME, Common. Roman. The houses of private citizens, and even those of the higher classes, were of a very moderate size during the times of the republic. The Romans appear to have lived much in the open air, as a great part of their buildings consisted of vestibules and porticos. The houses were detached from each other, and usually of one floor. The different apartments had each a single door, entering from the gallery or portico. These apartments, except the triclinium or hall, where they sat at meals, were generally small, and lighted only by one square window near the ceilings. The furniture of the house and its decorations were simple, the walls ornamented with fresco painting in a light and cheerful style. The larger houses had each a garden behind for the cultivation of vegetables, and a few trees to yield a refreshing shade in summer.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 6, p. 445.

2594. HOME deserted. Londoners. The coffee-house was the Londoner's home; . . . those who wished to find a gentleman commonly asked, not whether he lived in Fleet Street or Chancery Lane, but whether he frequented the Grecian or the Rainbow. [Reign of Charles II.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 342.

2595. HOME, A palatial. Roman. After dinner the youth repaired to the Campus Martius, and spent the hours till sunset in a variety of sports and athletic exercises. The elder class retired for an hour to repose, and then passed the afternoon in their porticos or galleries, which, in the house of every man of rank, formed a conspicuous part of the building. Many of these were open to the air, supported on pillars of stone or marble, under which they enjoyed the exercise of walking, and sometimes of being carried in their litters. Other galleries were sheltered from the air and lighted by windows of a transparent talc or lapis specularis, which supplied the place of glass. These covered galleries were ornamented in the richest manner and with the most expensive decorations—gilded roofs, paintings on the walls, and statues in the niches—and adjoining to them were their libraries, which, in the latter days of the republic, became an article of great expense, and on the furnishing of which the higher classes expended much taste.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 4.

2596. HOME, A shaded. Puritan's. Cromwell's . . . household was not so unpleasant for the imagination to linger upon as some may think. The life of the Puritan home reveals the Church life of the period; even the air was laden with mysticism—a floating mysticism pervaded almost the whole theology of the time; a mystic man can never be a very merry man. The recreations of the Puritan homes were reduced to the narrowest compass compatible with good sense and good taste. Wakes were abolished, May-poles pulled down, and cockfights and bearbaitings brought to an end. Meantime the Puritan was not destitute of recreation: there were nice flower gardens for the ladies and brave field sports for the gentlemen; but the daily life of the Puritan was brought within a compass which, while it did not prohibit the joke and the merry laugh, must, we fancy, have often and usually shaded down life to a sternness and habitual severity very much in harmony, it may be, with the seriousness of the times, but not reflecting that cheerfulness which a wiser and wider view of God and truth and nature would create and permit.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 15, p. 196.

2597. HOME, Thoughtful of. Abraham Lincoln. [In 1860 Mr. Lincoln was nominated for President by the Republican Convention at Chicago.] The superintendent of the telegraph company, who was present, wrote on a scrap of paper: "Mr. Lincoln: You are nominated on the third ballot," and a boy ran with the message to Mr. Lincoln. He looked at it in silence, amid the shouts of those around him; then rising and putting it in his pocket, he said, quietly, "There is a little woman down to our house who would like to hear this—I'll go down and tell her."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 3, p. 104.

2598. HOME-LIFE, Savages'. American Indians. The savages are proud of idleness. At home they do little but cross their arms and sit listlessly, or engage in games of chance, hazarding all their possessions on the result; or meet in council, or sing and eat, or play and sleep. The greatest toils of the men were to perfect the palisades of the forts, to manufacture a boat out of a tree by means of fire and a stone hatchet, to repair their cabins, to get ready instruments of war or the chase, and to adorn their persons. Woman is the laborer, woman bears the burdens of life. The food that is raised from the earth is the fruit of her industry. With no instrument but a wooden mattock or a shoulderblade of the buffalo she plants the maize, the beans, and the running vines. She drives the blackbirds from the cornfield, breaks the weeds, and . . . gathers the harvest. She pounds the parched corn, dries the buffalo meat, and prepares for winter the store of wild fruits; she brings home the game which her husband has killed; she bears the wood and draws the water and spreads the repast. . . . The Indian's wife was his slave, and the number of his slaves was the criterion of his wealth.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

2599. HOMES, Filthy. England, 1509. [Erasmus, the Dutch writer, describes the homes of the English as he saw them.] The English so constructed their rooms as to admit no thorough draft. . . . The floors are mostly of clay and strewn with rushes. Fresh rushes are periodically laid over them, but the old ones remain for a foundation for perhaps twenty years together. [The abominations which Erasmus mentions as collected in these successive layers need not be mentioned.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15, p. 254.

2600. HOMES, Robbed of. Cherokee Indians. These were the most civilized and humane of all the Indian nations. They had adopted the manners of the whites. They had pleasant farms, goodly towns, schools, printing-presses, a written code of laws. The Government of the United States had given to Georgia a pledge to purchase the Cherokee lands for the benefit of the State. . . . [Unjust State legislation robbed them of their rights.] The Indians then appealed to the President [Jackson]. . . . He recommended their removal . . . beyond the Mississippi. . . . More than $5,000,000 were paid them for their lands, but still they clung to their homes. At last General Scott was ordered to remove them to the new territory, using force if necessary.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 44, p. 430.

2601. HONESTY assumed. Oliver Goldsmith. The company was of a familiar, uncereceremonious kind, delighting in that very questionable wit which consists in playing off practical jokes upon each other. Of one of these Goldsmith was made the butt. Coming to the club one night in a hackney coach, he gave the coachman by mistake a guinea instead of a shilling, which he set down as a dead loss, for there was no likelihood, he said, that a fellow of this class would have the honesty to return the money. On the next club evening he was told a person at the street door wished to speak with him. He went forth, but soon returned with a radiant countenance. To his surprise and delight the coachman had actually brought back the guinea. While he launched forth in praise of this unlooked-for piece of honesty, he declared it ought not to go unrewarded. Collecting a small sum from the club, and no doubt increasing it largely from his own purse, he dismissed the Jehu with many encomiums on his good conduct. He was still chanting his praises when one of the club requested a sight of the guinea thus honestly returned. To Goldsmith's confusion it proved to be a counterfeit. The universal burst of laughter which succeeded, and the jokes by which he was assailed on every side, showed him that the whole was a hoax, and the pretended coachman as much a counterfeit as the guinea. He was so disconcerted, it is said, that he soon beat a retreat for the evening.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 19, p. 128.

2602. HONESTY confessed. Shovel. [When James II. sent his Jacobite emissary to seduce the commanders of the British navy, he reported that Sir Cloudesley Shovel was incorruptible. "He is a man not to be spoken to," was the emissary's tribute.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 21, p. 332.

2603. HONESTY of Convictions. Wm. Penn. A.D. 1671. Never fearing to openly address a Quaker meeting, he was soon on the road to Newgate, to suffer for his honesty by a six months' imprisonment. "You are an ingenious gentleman," said the magistrate at the trial; "you have a plentiful estate; why should you render yourself unhappy by associating with such simple people?" "I prefer," said Penn, "the honestly simple to the ingeniously wicked."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 16.

2604. HONESTY, Ludicrous. Diary. "A Spiritual Diary and Soliloquies, by John Rutty, M.D." Dr. Rutty was one of the people called Quakers, a physician of some eminence in Dublin, and author of several works. This diary, which was kept from 1753 to 1775, the year in which he died, and was now published in two volumes octavo, exhibited, in the simplicity of his heart, a minute and honest register of the state of his mind; which, though frequently laughable enough, was not more so than the history of many men would be, if recorded with equal fairness. The following specimens were extracted by the reviewers: "Tenth month, 1753—23. Indulgence in bed an hour too long. Twelfth month, 17. An hypochondriac obnubilation from wind and indigestion. Ninth month, 28. An over-dose of whiskey. 29. A dull, cross, choleric day. First month, 1757—23. A little swinish at dinner and repast. 31. Dogged on provocation. Second month, 5. Very dogged or snappish. 14. Snappish on fasting. 26. Cursed snappishness to those under me, on a bodily indisposition. Third month, 11. On a provocation exercised a dumb resentment for two days instead of scolding. 22. Scolded too vehemently. 23. Dogged again. Fourth month, 29. Mechanically and sinfully dogged."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 342.

2605. HONESTY, Official. Abubeker. When Abubeker assumed the office of caliph he enjoined his daughter Ayesha to take a strict account of his private patrimony, that it might be evident whether he were enriched or impoverished by the service of the State. He thought himself entitled to a stipend of three pieces of gold, with the sufficient maintenance of a single camel and a black slave; but on the Friday of each week he distributed the residue of his own and the public money, first to the most worthy, and then to the most indigent, of the Moslems. The remains of his wealth—a coarse garment and five pieces of gold—were delivered to his successor, who lamented with a modest sigh his own inability to equal such an admirable model.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51, p. 173.

2606. HONESTY, Promotion by. Pompey. History has dealt tenderly with him on account of his misfortunes, and has not refused him deserved admiration for qualities as rare in his age as they were truly excellent. His capacities as a soldier were not extraordinary. He had risen to distinction by his honesty. The pirates who had swept the Mediterranean had bought their impunity by a tribute paid to senators and governors. They were suppressed instantly when a commander was sent against them whom they were unable to bribe. The conquest of Asia was no less easy to a man who could resist temptations to enrich himself. The worst enemy of Pompey never charged him with corruption or rapacity. So far as he was himself concerned, the restoration of Ptolemy was gratuitous, for he received nothing for it. His private fortune, when he had the world at his feet, was never more than moderate; nor as a politician did his faults extend beyond weakness and incompetence.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 23.

2607. HONESTY, Public. Italy. [Early in the sixth century Italy, being a] country possessed of many valuable objects of exchange, soon attracted the merchants of the world, whose beneficial traffic was encouraged and protected by the liberal spirit of Theodoric. The free intercourse of the provinces by land and water was restored and extended; the city gates were never shut either by day or by night; and the common saying, that a purse of gold might be safely left in the fields, was expressive of the conscious security of the inhabitants.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39, p. 27.

2608. HONESTY in public Life. Oliver Cromwell. [Cromwell the Protector left no wealth to his family, notwithstanding the high positions which he occupied and the opportunities of enrichment at the expense of the State.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 14, p. 217.

2609. HONESTY punished. Greek Emperor Theodore Lascaris II. On a march in Bulgaria he consulted on a question of policy his principal ministers; and the Greek logothete, George Acropolita, presumed to offend him by the declaration of a free and honest opinion. The em peror half unsheathed his cimeter ; but his more deliberate rage reserved Acropolita for a baser punishment. One of the first officers of the empire was ordered to dismount, stripped of his robes, and extended on the ground in the presence of the prince and army. In this posture he was chastised with so many and such heavy blows from the clubs of two guards or executioners, that when Theodore commanded them to cease, the great logothete was scarcely able to rise and crawl away to his tent. After a seclusion of some days he was recalled by a peremptory mandate to his seat in council ; and so dead were the Greeks to the sense of honor and shame, that it is from the narrative of the sufferer himself that we acquire the knowledge of his disgrace.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 62, p. 144.

2610. HONESTY, Scarcity of. Plato. [Plato was invited to lecture before Dionysius the tyrant.] Justice was the . . . topic ; and when Plato asserted the happiness of the just and the wretched condition of the unjust, the tyrant was stung ; and being unable to answer his arguments, he expressed his resentment against those who seemed to listen to him with pleasure. At last he was extremely exasperated, and asked the philosopher what business he had in Sicily. Plato answered that he came to seek an honest man. "And so, then," replied the tyrant, "it seems you have lost your labor."—PLUTARCH'S DION.

2611. HONESTY, Unquestioned. Washington's. So noted for excellence was everything bearing his brand, that a barrel of flour stamped "George Washington, Mount Vernon," was exempted from the customary inspection in the West India ports.—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 2.

2612. HONOR, Appeal to. Roman Emperor. Gallienus often displayed his liberality by distributing among his officers the property of his subjects. On the accession of Claudius an old woman threw herself at his feet, and complained that a general of the late emperor had obtained an arbitrary grant of her patrimony. This general was Claudius himself, who had not entirely escaped the contagion of the times. The emperor blushed at the reproach, but deserved the confidence which she had reposed in his equity. The confession of his fault was accompanied with immediate and ample restitution.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 11, p. 334.

2613. HONOR, Dangerous. Emperor of Rome. [The preceding emperors had been murdered each in their turn during fourscore years.] The troops, as if satiated with the exercise of power, again conjured the senate to invest one of its own body with the Imperial purple. The senate still persisted in its refusal, the army in its request. The reciprocal offer was pressed and rejected at least three times, and while the obstinate modesty of either party was resolved to receive a master from the hands of the other, eight months insensibly elapsed ; an amazing period of tranquil anarchy, during which the Roman world remained without a sovereign, without a usurper, and without a sedition.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12, p. 367.

2614. HONOR, Debts of. Gambling. [The German barbarians were deep gamblers.] Their debts of honor (for in that light they have transmitted to us those of play) they discharged with the most romantic fidelity. The desperate gamester, who had staked his person and liberty on a last throw of the dice, patiently submitted to the decision of fortune, and suffered himself to be bound, chastised, and sold into remote slavery by his weaker but more lucky antagonist.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 261.

2615. HONOR, Humility with. Lord Byron. He was a schoolboy, ten years old at the time, living in Scotland with his mother, who had an income of £135 a year, equal to about $25 a week in our present currency. All at once came news that Lord Byron, the grand-uncle of the boy, was dead, leaving no heirs to his title and estates except this poor widow's son. Imagine the effect upon a forward, sensitive, bashful, imaginative boy—painfully ashamed because he had a lame foot. It seems that he was puzzled at first with his new lordship. The day after the news arrived he ran up to his mother, and said, "Mother, do you see any difference in me since I became lord ? I see none."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 289.

2616. HONOR misplaced. Major Andre. [Having been executed by Washington as a confessed spy,] his king did right in offering honorable rank to his brother, and in granting pensions to his mother and sisters, but not in raising a memorial to his name in Westminster Abbey. Such honor belongs to other enterprises and deeds. The tablet has no fit place in a sanctuary, dear from its monuments to every friend to genius and mankind.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 10, ch. 18.

2617. HONOR, National. Romans. [During the reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius] the Roman name was revered among the most remote nations of the earth. The fiercest barbarians frequently submitted their differences to the arbitration of the emperor, and we are informed by a contemporary historian that he had seen ambassadors who were refused the honor which they came to solicit, of being admitted into the rank of subjects.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1, p. 10.

2618. HONOR, Test of. John II. the Good. John was sent back to his dominions on promise of a large ransom ; but he was without finances, without soldiers, for they refused to obey him, and without credit ; yet he had a strong principle of honor, for, being unable to satisfy the conditions of his liberation, he returned to England, surrendered himself once more a prisoner, and died soon after in London. NOTE.—It was a noble maxim of this prince, "That if good faith should be totally forgotten by the rest of mankind, it ought still to find a place in the breast of princes." It has, however, been conjectured that John's strongest motive for returning to England was a passion he had conceived for the Countess of Salisbury, one of the most beautiful women of that age.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 12, p. 199.

2619. HONOR, Vanity of. Queen Mary. [Mary Queen of Scots, in her illness, was subject to great melancholy, which she expressed often by the exclamation,] I could wish to be dead !—KNIIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 9, p. 144.

2620. HONOR in War. Napoleon. [When he escaped from exile at St. Elba the army welcomed him, and Louis XVIII. fled. At the Tuileries, in Napoleon's former cabinet, were found] a portfolio . . . containing the private and confidential papers of the king. They were safe in the keeping of Napoleon; his pride of character and delicate sense of honor would not allow him to pry into these disclosures of the private life of his enemies. He ordered them all to be sealed, and to be sent by a despatch to their owner.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 26.

2621. HONORS, Burdensome. Grant—Alfonso. [When General Grant visited Alfonso, King of Spain,] Grant spoke of the sympathy the death of his wife created in America. The king said . . . they had been very happy together, and she had helped him bear the burdens of the kingly office, which were extremely irksome to him. Grant replied that the eight years of his Presidency had been the most harassing and weary ones of his whole life.—GENERAL GRANT'S TRAVELS, p. 259.

2622. HONORS, Compulsory. Saturninus. [He was appointed to command the Eastern Empire under Emperor Probus.] That general, a man of merit and experience, was driven into rebellion by the absence of his sovereign, the levity of the Alexandrian people, the pressing instances of his friends, and his own fears; but from the moment of his elevation he never entertained a hope of empire or even of life. "Alas!" he said, "the republic has lost a useful servant, and the rashness of an hour has destroyed the services of many years. You know not," continued he; "the misery of sovereign power; a sword is perpetually suspended over our head. We dread our very guards, we distrust our companions." [He was soon destroyed.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12, p. 383.

2623. HONORS demanded. Cromwell. Not an iota of the honors due to a crowned head would he dispense with when negotiating, as the Protector of England, with the proudest monarchs of Europe. Spain yielded, with little hesitation, to accord to him the same style as was claimed by her own haughty monarchs; but Louis [XIV.] of France sought, if possible, some compromise. His first letter was addressed to "His Most Serene Highness, Oliver, Lord Protector," etc., but Cromwell refused to receive it. The more familiar title of "Cousin" was in like manner rejected, and Louis and his crafty minister, the Cardinal Mazarin, were compelled to concede to him the wonted mode of address between sovereigns: "To Our Dear Brother." "What!" exclaimed Louis to his minister, "shall I call this base fellow my brother?" "Ay," rejoined his astute adviser, "or your father, if it will gain your ends, or you will have him at the gates of Paris!"—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 16, p. 215.
